The Week.

THE WEEK has been singularly barren of exciting events. It is curious to see, however, what a stimulus the return of peace has given to political agitation. As nothing is now dependent on the fortune of war, orators and writers are entering the arena with a confidence which they never displayed as long as their arguments and predictions were liable to reversion or falsification at the hands of Lee or Grant.

THE negro's success in assuming a prominent position in the political arena, seems to be in the inverse ratio of the earnestness with which it is sought to suppress him and put him out of sight. Everybody is heartily tired of discussing his condition and his rights, and yet little else is talked about, and none talk about him so much as those who are most convinced of his insignificance.

THE news from Europe is unimportant, unless we except the doubt which rest upon Napoleon's course in regard to Mexico. The Moniteur asserts that the present force in that country will not be increased, but will be kept at its maximum. The English papers borrow their chief topic of discussion from this country, and declaim on the proper treatment of the subjugated rebels. Lord Brougham, whose advice we notice in another column, lifts up his voice for clemency, and finds an echo, we are told, in the Paris press. His lordship's impertinence is imitated by "Historicus," the law-writer for the Times, who did us good service in the piratical season. He undertakes to define for this country the relation of the Government to its late enemies in arms, but manifestly travels beyond his sphere. The question is one of American Constitutional law, to be decided here, and, we apprehend, with as little respect to the authority of "Historicus" as if he were merely a crier in court, instead of the able barrister that he is. He has an undeniable right to his opinion, but to force it upon the Government of the United States is to insult its capacity for determining the laws by which it exists. "Historicus" has forgotten a similar ill-advised intrusion by Earl Russell, at an earlier stage of the rebellion, when he ventured to inform Mr. Seward of the British Attorney-General's opinion that this Government had no right to suspend the habeas corpus. Our Secretary rightly applied the snub direct to such gratuitous instruction. The argument drawn from expediency or humanity may fairly be offered to affect our disposal of Jeff. Davis and his compeers,—for nothing that concerns man anywhere is foreign to the rest of mankind, and international law is simply the product of a free exchange of opinion among nations, which is neither to be deprecated nor avoided,—but every government must be presumed the best, and of course the ultimate, judge of its own powers in dealing with its subjects.

"IT is a marvel," said Cato, "that a couple of soothsayers can look at each other without a grin;" and President Johnson quotes this expression to a South Carolina delegation, in order to disclaim any conspiracy with them to deceive the public. He avows more distinctly than heretofore his motive in hastening reconstruction—that "the loyal men, who were compelled to bow and submit to the rebellion, may, now that the rebellion is ended, stand equal to loyal men everywhere." The war has effected a twofold emancipation—of blacks and whites. It is absolutely necessary for South Carolina, before she can hope to return into the Union, to abolish slavery within her territory by legislature or convention, and likewise to ratify the amendment of the United States Constitution, which abolishes and prohibits slavery everywhere. His reluctance to establish or favor—for, on this point, his language is not unmistakable—the enfranchisement of the blacks, arises from a fear lest the landed aristocracy control their votes to the prejudice of the poor whites, whose freedom the President is anxious to confirm. He therefore leaves it to the States, or to that loyal minority in each which he assumes to have constituted the State without intermission, to determine the qualifications for suffrage. At the same time, as a democrat, he is "opposed to class legislation." Such, substantially, is the position now occupied by our Chief Magistrate, though not, we may trust, unchangeably, except in respect of the doom of the slave system. The delegation, in reply, could naturally but assent to the latter condition of restoration, however unwelcome it might be. Their spokesman, Judge Frost, admitted that he and his associates, present and at home, had been cured of three delusions by the war: first, "that slavery is an element of political strength and moral power;" second, that the States' Rights doctrine is a sound one; and, third, that cotton is king. The people of South Carolina, having been defeated and conquered, will acknowledge the painful fact: already they have submitted to great sacrifices "from their fidelity to honor." "And," continued the Judge, "the same good faith which animated them in the contest will not be found wanting in their pledge of loyal support to the Government." If this assurance were not enough, the delegate was willing to add: "I suppose the oath of allegiance will be taken with as much unanimity in South Carolina as anywhere else." As this cannot possibly be doubted, we suppose the Palmetto gentry will not long be in lack of the Governor for whom they applied.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON has given the finishing touch to the war by abolishing all restrictions on trade East and West. But if some means are not devised of protecting him from "personal interviews" with office-seekers, pardon-seekers, delegations, and busybodies of both sexes, they will make an end of him. It is lamentable that some way cannot be hit on of sifting the President's business before it comes before him. This is done to a certain extent with his letters, but the men and women who want to see him reach him, chaff and all. The easiest way of doing it would be to render access to him more difficult. Whether this could be arranged without raising doubts of his "democracy," we must leave it to others to determine. The present system, under which everybody can reach him who takes the trouble to go to Washington, if not suspected of designs on his life, is anything but democratic. For his time belongs to the whole nation. As matters stand, it is largely consumed in attending to the affairs or listening to the bad speeches of a few hundreds.

FROM an Augusta newspaper we have what purports to be an account of the peace conference at Fortress Monroe in January, by Alexander H. Stephens, one of the Southern commissioners on that occasion. Except certain strictures upon Jefferson Davis for his conduct before and after the colloquy, and certain professions of a genuine desire for peace on the part of Mr. Stephens, there is little that is new in his narrative. He tells, however, a capital story of President Lincoln, who, having at the outset declared that he could not consent to treat with the rebel authorities as such, was confronted by Mr. Hunter with an historical precedent. This was the action of that constitutional ruler, Charles I., in treating with his rebellious parliament. Mr. Lincoln's rejoinder was characteristic: "Upon questions of history I must refer you to Mr. Seward, for he is posted in such things, and I don't profess to be bright. My only distinct recollection of the matter is, that Charles lost his head." Subsequently, when the Constitutional Amendment just passed had suggested the topic of emancipation, the President is reported to have said he hoped slavery would be abolished by the people, within six years at the farthest; and added that four hundred millions of dollars might be offered as a compensation to the owners. Perhaps observing some incredulity at this statement, he continued: "You would be surprised were I to give you the names of those who favor that." The letter of Mr. Greeley, since published, recommending this policy to the President, makes it clear that he was one of the persons alluded to.

THE Message of Gov. Pierpont to the Virginia legislature is remarkable for the instruction which that body receives in contemporaneous history and the first principles of government. We decline to decide between affronting the intelligence of the teacher and that of his pupils. Only we must consider it a very strong argument against the resurrection of the Old Dominion, if its legislators need to be acquainted with the facts of secession, or to be told that "The people of a State may be divided into two classes during a rebellion, the one class loyal, the other disloyal. The loyal are the true and faithful to the government; the disloyal are the unfaithful, and those in opposition to the government. The loyal are entitled to the protection of the government; the disloyal are not entitled to the protection, but are subjects of the punishment denounced by the laws against those who disobey."

We had supposed it equally true and manifest that the people of a State may be divided into two classes, styled the good and the bad, respectively. The good are those who heed the laws; the bad are those who evade or violate them. The good are entitled to the protection of society; the bad are not so entitled, but are subjects of the penalties provided for their transgression, etc., etc., in this message-made-easy strain.

THE political campaign opens with the hot weather in Ohio, where a Union State Convention has met, selected a candidate for Governor, passed resolutions, heard speeches, and adjourned. The enemies of this assembly hoped that it might be divided upon the questions of reconstruction and negro suffrage. They were disappointed. The resolutions were not dogmatic or even explicit in these particulars, but by inference were strongly in favor of deliberation and equal justice in restoring the rebellious districts to political existence. With considerable emphasis they enforced the necessity of reverting to the first principles of our Government as set forth in the Declaration of Independence; and beyond this, it is difficult to see what ground the Convention could have taken, while Ohio herself is in need of the advice which they offer to the nation at large. Gen. Schenck delivered very fully his views upon reconstruction, and was followed by Senator Sherman, who spoke rather to the resolutions than to the general topic. He applauded the caution displayed by the Convention in avoiding a split, and contended that the issue which had been declined by them was to be taken up and settled in due time, when victory could attend a united front. It is noteworthy that the gubernatorial nominee, Maj.-Gen. J. D. Cox, entertains convictions that agree with the best interpretation of the resolutions of his party, and is connected by marriage and friendship with the advocates of impartial legislation for black and white.

THE President has been doing a very extensive business in pardons; but, as it has been evident for a week or two past that there is not a man in the South who is not ready to be pardoned at any moment, and take any steps that may be necessary for that purpose, the very salutary precaution has been taken of requiring in each case a report from the provisional governor of the State in which the applicant resides, upon (1) the probability of his proving a useful, peaceable citizen in future; (2) the existence of any proceedings in confiscation against him; (3) and the possession or non-possession of his abandoned property by the United States. The Attorney-General's circular, we are glad to say, expresses very fully the expectation of the Government that the colored population will prove in the not far distant future intelligent and loyal citizens.

C. J. FAULKNER, who was United States Minister at Paris when the war broke out, is amongst those who have been pardoned, and we are sorry for it. It is but justice to the President to say that it was done in fulfilment of a promise made by Mr. Lincoln to Mr. Faulkner's daughter. A more unworthy object there is not in the whole South. He used his official position at Paris up to the day of his departure in discrediting in the eyes of the French Court the Government which he represented and to which he had sworn fidelity. If rebellion be not an unpardonable crime, perfidy accompanied by perjury ought to be.

GENERAL TERRY has found it necessary to promulgate an order in his department forbidding combinations of the planters to keep down the wages of labor, and to place restrictions on the movements and agreements of the colored people with their employees. In addition to this, a newspaper has been suppressed at Petersburg, and an "avertissement" has been sent to another at Richmond, both for the use of rebellious and disloyal language. The question at once suggests itself on reading this, who is to look after the planters and the newspapers when the State is handed over, as we may fairly expect it shortly will be, to the "loyal voters?"

ROBERT DALE OWEN addresses President Johnson a letter through the Tribune, on a somewhat neglected Constitutional issue. He shows that by one of the original compromises of that instrument, each Southern voter before the war possessed one-fifth more political power than his Northern fellow, in all Congressional or Presidential elections. This resulted from enlarging the basis of Southern representation by an addition to its free inhabitants of three-fifths of all other persons, to wit, the slaves. This palpable inequality was endured because it was sanctioned by the Constitution. Now that we have abolished slavery, the obligation to respect it ceases, and the wrong should terminate. For, first, to withhold suffrage from the blacks is to leave them at the mercy of those who have despoiled them in the past, and who still retain their old malice; and, second, is to make their permanent disqualification conducive to the political aggrandizement of the whites. As nought but freemen are left, the people of color are reckoned no longer at three-fifths but at five-fifths, so that, while as unrepresented as before, they increase the representation of the whites by two-fifths of their own number. Consequently, a white voter in any Southern State whose population is about equally divided, is armed at the ballot-box with double the power of any voter at the North. Assuming, with Mr. Owen, as a liberal estimate, that two-thirds of the whites are sufficiently loyal to be admitted to vote, and that the ravages of war have reduced blacks and whites to numerical equality at the South, then each voter there will have, at a national election, three times the power of one at the North. This, says Mr. Owen, is dangerous and undemocratic; and he proceeds to ask what kind of men are to be thus entrusted with such extraordinary powers, citing Jefferson for the inevitable effects of slavery upon the community in which it flourishes, Mrs. Kemble's description of the poor whites, and his own observations while a member of the Freedmen's Commission. As for the right of determining the franchise, he argues that it inheres in the right of the United States to pardon the rebel States on condition—say, for example, that there shall be no more slavery; and that no discrimination against color shall be allowed to affect civil rights. If the first were neglected, it would involve a second rebellion; if the second be, it will create an oligarchy on an extended scale, and prevent either harmony or permanent peace between North and South. He concludes that though States have in general a right to regulate suffrage for themselves, this matter is beyond their province: first, because the seceded States should begin de novo, and not resume their old constitutions; second, because the Federal safety is imperilled, as it was by the existence of slavery.

MR. JAY COOKE has been seduced into authorship by his success as a broker, and has written a pamphlet to prove that the national debt is a clear addition to the national capital. Considering the amount of nonsense which has been written about national debts for the last hundred years, there is nothing very wonderful in this; what is wonderful is that several of the morning papers, in spite of the pressure on their space, should have thought his disquisition worth republishing. Mr. Cooke's success as a seller of Government bonds no more qualifies him to instruct the public on the nature and uses of a national debt, than success as an engine-driver would qualify a man to lecture on the nature of elastic vapors. There is a very simple antidote for his really mischievous delusion. It consists in remembering that what has been lent to the Government during the war was really not the money, but the things that the money purchased—the powder, lead, iron, forage, and other stores, as well as the labor of a million of men, all of which have been destroyed, and the national capital has therefore been diminished by the exact amount of their value. The individuals who supplied them have lost nothing, but the community has—a distinction which Mr. Cooke has failed to perceive.

The holders of Government bonds will be alarmed on hearing that the New York Herald has announced that it has not "given up its project with regard to the national debt," viz., that of paying it off by voluntary subscriptions. We had hoped the money would be allowed to lie a little longer.

In spite of the disproportionate increase in the colored population of the District of Columbia on account of the war, it is an instructive fact that the local demand for domestic and farm servants is greater than the supply. One occasion of this is the long ago predicted drift of the freedmen toward their old homes in the South, very few being drawn in the opposite direction. Hence those Maryland farmers who voted last winter to pay their hands $10 a month, without regard to the other party to the bargain, are now unable to obtain help at a much higher figure; and this experience may serve as a warning or a precedent to the still more close-fisted cultivators of Virginia, who think that the advantages of free labor are to be purchased at half the rate just mentioned. The only class in the District whose prospects are not good, are the women with families of dependent children, the fathers being soldiers in the Union army, or scattered none knows where in the South, or perhaps no longer living. These cases are numerous, are with difficulty provided for by employment, and were productive of infinite distress last winter.

In the two days' review of our armies in Washington, it was noticed that the Western troops had a longer, more swinging gait than the Eastern, and that their beards had a strong disposition to redness. The report of the Secretary of War for the year 1864 furnishes some additional grounds of comparison for the study of the curious. Eleven States, of which, however, only three were strictly Western, kept statistics of their recruits. In height, Michigan excelled the rest, while Ohio was sixth, and Minnesota ninth. Vermont, which stood second in this respect, was first in breadth of chest, her average measurement being a little more than thirty-six inches at inspiration. Singularly enough for a mountainous region, one would suppose, New Hampshire was least capacious in lungs, and eighth in respect of height; but her northern counties, which are most rugged, are least populous, and sent fewest men to the war. New York and Delaware furnished the shortest men, and agreed upon the average—five feet five inches. The recruits from all sections between Nov. 1, 1863, and Nov. 1, 1864, amounted for the land service to 650,769, and for the naval to 24,683. At the latter date there were 102,000 colored troops enrolled, and perhaps this number remains substantially unchanged at the present time, none having been mustered out or being likely to be. The revenue derived from commutation was fifteen millions, against ten and a half for the previous year. Of military telegraph there were 6,500 miles in operation, and of this 78 miles submarine. Half of the whole extent was constructed during the war. A thousand persons have been constantly employed in the telegraphic service, and during the year transmitted one million eight hundred thousand messages. At a pinch, every second man in the army might have been mounted, for there were no less than 300,000 horses and mules, the former somewhat preponderating. One cannot help admiring the abundant resources of a free nation in the time of her greatest trouble, and the tireless energy of the man who has directed them into their proper channels of feeding, clothing, arming, and transportation, so that no general in our armies has been able to complain of Mr. Stanton's ability to discharge his office, or his readiness to facilitate the operations in any section of the field.

The career of the late Rear-Admiral Du Pont, up to the outbreak of the rebellion, was more creditable to himself than known to his countrymen. He began at twelve as a midshipman. In 1861 he had advanced to captain, and in April was in command of the Philadelphia Navy Yard. He knew no divided allegiance as an American, but ably and promptly seconded the Government in its efforts to maintain its authority. He was destined to achieve his greatest renown at Port Royal, by a naval exploit which exhibited prudence, daring, and originality in rare proportions. After the conflict of the Monitor and Merrimac had revolutionized the building of war-vessels, Captain Du Pont was directed to conduct the first assault of iron-clads upon forts and land-batteries. Where he, or rather his resources, failed, no other succeeded, and Sumter, impregnable oceanward to the last, capitulated to the shots which reduced Atlanta. Still brighter laurels than those of courage and victory were won by Du Pont along the coast of Carolina. He claims the grateful remembrance of the nation for his humanity, which, as it showed itself in his intercourse with his subordinates, was displayed as sincerely toward the despised blacks with whom he came in contact personally or through his fleet. He protected them from outrage on every occasion, dealt to them the same justice, accorded to them the same respect, as to other men; and this in advance of public sentiment, and by marked exception to the behavior of most of our commanders by sea and land. He was, in a word, a democratic gentleman, having the graces derived from his French descent, and the moral breadth of a believer in the republican institutions under which he was educated to usefulness and fame. His death is sadly premature, whether we consider his three-score years or the wishes and anticipations of those who survive him.

Mazzini writes to Mr. Fisher, the London agent of the United States Sanitary Commission, that this country has done more for the cause of republicanism in four years than has been achieved in fifty by European discussion. He adds that her task has hitherto been self-organization—a realizing within her own boundaries of the principle of her existence. That established, by the abolition of slavery, a new duty devolves upon her: she ceases to be merely American, and becomes cosmopolitan. He would have her lead in the progress of mankind, and assist in the great battle that rages everywhere, between liberty and tyranny, equality and privilege. The Italian patriot may count upon our support in the sense in which he invokes it. His appeal is not, as it has been construed in some quarters, for material aid—for ships, powder, bayonets, men, or armed intervention such as Kossuth prayed for, and prayed in vain. Not less vain will be all similar solicitations in the future. What Mazzini craves, however, is sure to be granted, and that is sympathy, encouragement, and all the aid that flows from the conspicuous example of a successful, enduring republican society, consistent, above all, and true to its fundamental idea. We had in the past a rapidity of development, an extraordinary though superficial prosperity, a degree of public intelligence, an orderly submission to law, and an apparent stability, that served the republicans of the Old World in good stead for nearly half a century, and helped the South American republics into being. But these arguments were effectively resisted in Europe by pointing to the contradiction of slavery. Hereafter there will be no hollowness in the professions of this nation when it answers the cry of the struggling people in any land. The Union exists by, and in consequence for, the equal brotherhood of man. Republican propagandism is inseparable from a republican establishment.

We publish in another column a letter originally addressed to R. H. Dana, of Boston, on "State Sovereignty," which is worthy of great attention, both on account of its intrinsic value and the writer's character and standing. We regret that we are not at liberty to reveal his name.

THE ESSENCE OF THE RECONSTRUCTION QUESTION.

It is easy to see from the discussion which is going on on the question of reconstruction, that there is not in any quarter any opposition worthy of note to the abstract right of the negroes to the franchise. Nobody, whose opinion is of any consequence, maintains any longer that their claim to political equality is not a sound one. The agitation that is now raging is not about the principle of the thing. The question which is debated is whether President Johnson has any power to meddle in the matter, and if so, whether it would be expedient for him to exercise it. The pagan doctrine which Judge Taney propounded, and of which Mr. Douglas made himself so conspicuous an exponent, that this Government was formed for the benefit of white men exclusively, or in other words, that one portion of the inhabitants of a country can set up a political fabric which need not furnish to the rest even the poor boon of protection for person and property, is now never heard of from the lips of anybody but a few of the worn-out and decrepit veterans of the old pro-slavery army.

The view the President takes evidently is, that it is not necessary to the work of reconstruction that he should undertake to fix the political status of the negroes in the restored States. In the absence of any authoritative declaration to the contrary, we are justified in inferring from the plan which he is now carrying out, that his refusal to touch it is not due to doubts of his power to do so. It will hardly be pretended that he considers the provisions of the old State constitutions of 1861 binding on him, in view of the fact that he is exacting qualifications from the voters for the coming conventions which these instruments did not prescribe; that if the State constitutions spring into force by the mere fact of the termination of the war, his interference with State affairs now is illegal as well as anomalous; and that by calling what he is now doing an "experiment," he plainly reserves to himself the power to annul everything that the conventions so constituted may decide upon. In short, there is not a single feature of the scheme which is bringing back the revolted States to the Union so rapidly, which does not contain evidence that the authority to carry it out is, in the President's own estimation, derived from the necessities of the case. He is, in fact, doing whatever he considers essential to the securing to the various States a republican form of government and protection from domestic violence, with just as much regard to constitutional form as he thinks advisable and no more. The pretence that he may disfranchise two-thirds of the white population for an offence of which they have not been legally convicted, as he is now actually doing, and yet cannot take upon himself to consider the freedmen as a portion of "the people" of the State in which they live, will deceive nobody, and it is but just to him to say that he has never put it forward.

The negroes are evidently being shut out from the polls, as traitors are being shut out, on grounds of expediency. These are, partly, the fear of doing too great violence to the feelings of the "loyal" whites, and partly, the fear that the ignorance and want of training of the blacks will cause them to abuse the franchise after they have got it. The first of these was the Protestant argument in Ireland against the emancipation of the Catholics; it is at Rome the Catholic argument for oppression of the Jews, and in Constantinople the great Mussulman reason for allowing true believers to kick, cuff, and rob the rayahs, and is usually the reason given everywhere for having a weak and helpless class at the mercy of those who hate or despise it. The feelings of any large body of men, even of defeated rebels, are certainly entitled to consideration at the hands of any government laying claim to statesmanship, but only in so far as this consideration works no substantial injury to other people.

The argument drawn from the ignorance of the blacks would be forcible if it were not capable of general application. A proposal to exclude from all share in the government of the South those who are unable from want of education to form an intelligent judgment on measures or men, would be worthy of consideration. We are satisfied, as everybody is, that the rebellion was the fruit of ignorance, and that the declamation we now hear against the guilt of the leaders, is in reality a roundabout way of expatiating on the mental darkness of the masses. Davis, Toombs, Wise, Cobb, and Company have been able to do what they have done simply because the vast majority of the Southern whites were unable to read the newspapers. We would therefore willingly avoid trying over again the experiment which resulted in the civil war; and we believe for our part, that part of the remedy for the Southern troubles would be found in the exclusion of everybody from the polls who was unable to read as well as the disloyal. This, however, has not been suggested by those who are most alarmed by the negro's want of education; though they have as yet not offered to explain in what the ignorance of a poor white differs from the ignorance of a poor black, or to tell us what worse consequences to the State could possibly result from the voting of half-a-million of benighted Africans than have already resulted from the voting of a million of benighted Caucasians. If greater calamities can come on a State than the "superior race" recently brought on the South, we do not know what they are.

The points we have to consider at the North, in deciding which course we ought to take in fixing the status of the negro at the South, are really reduced to two—the effect upon his condition of leaving him at the mercy of a hostile and semi-barbarous race, and the effect upon the national rule of shutting him out from all share in the local government. To suppose that he will receive fair play from white legislators, who are not responsible to him, who have no sympathy with him, and who, in their secret hearts, consider him a beast of the field, is to violate every rule of democratic government, and to make an open and shameless declaration of want of faith in our own principles. It is, moreover, to be guilty of cruelty as well as perfidy; for freedom bestowed on a man left in the position in which we have placed the freedmen, only increases the number of points at which he can be assailed and tormented. There is an alternative for those who fear to arm him for his own protection with the franchise, and it is one from which there is no honorable escape, and that is to continue, by some mode or other, to cover him with the sword of the national Government until he is either considered competent to take charge of his own interests, or his white neighbors can offer proof of the possession of humanity or of a sense of justice. The community in whose hands we now propose to place him and his family is, it ought not to be forgotten, that in which our prisoners were tortured only six months ago, and in which the St. Albans raid was considered honorable warfare.

Of the probability of our being able to dispense, in the restoration of the Union upon the present plan, with the political support of the colored population, we shall not say much, because on this point the events of each day are speaking volumes. The credulity of those who suppose that the effect of defeat in a bloody war has been to convert the Southern people into devoted admirers of the North and its institutions and its rule, and that all the traitorous and disaffected portions of it can be shut out from political influence by wholesale administration of oaths, for one month after the control passes from our hands, is one of the most singular phenomena in the history of either this or any other country.

There is one other objection to the President's policy which, in our opinion, is also very weighty. In leaving the "negro question" still unsettled, it bids fair to launch the country on another period of long and bitter "sectional agitation." It is useless to deprecate this, and beg Northern orators and writers not to exasperate the South by their declamation on negro wrongs. If appeals of this sort were of any use, the anti-slavery agitation would have ceased years before the war. As long as there is in any portion of the Union a state of things by which the moral sense of the people of another portion of it is outraged, or their fears excited, and that state of things can be changed by legislation, there will be agitation about it, come what may. In a free country there is no way to prevent men from talking loudly over what they feel deeply except to leave them nothing to feel deeply about. The true way to prevent "sectional feeling" and "sectional agitation" is to abolish sectional institutions, to make the bases of society and government the same in all parts of the Union, or in other words to render it thoroughly democratic. We have the chance of doing this now, and we ought to take care that we do not leave it in the power of posterity to heap on us the worst reproach which statesmen can incur, of having allowed a great opportunity to perish in our hands.

The notion is very prevalent and is very earnestly preached, that with the destruction of slavery all danger of the re-establishment or perpetuation of an aristocratic class at the South has passed away. This is a most mischievous delusion. There is no country in the civilized world in which the social organization is so intensely aristocratic, in which class government is more firmly established, and in which the working population is more powerless and degraded, than England, and yet there has not been a slave on her soil for five hundred years. To establish and maintain an aristocracy, with all its consequences, both political and social, all that is necessary is that the power of government should be lodged in the hands of a single class, strong enough and energetic enough to retain its hold on them; and this is the very thing which a large number of intelligent people in the free States propose that we should now do at the South.

THE GREAT FESTIVAL.

Before this meets the eyes of our readers, the Fourth of July will have been celebrated, as it was never celebrated before, and with good reason, for never before have we had such cause of rejoicing. It is not simply the birth of the nation which we now commemorate, but its regeneration; and even more than its regeneration. We celebrate not only the close of a long and bloody civil war, but the close of the contest which preceded and led to it, that, as it was well called, "irrepressible conflict" which for half a century absorbed all the intellect of the country, perverted its understanding, corrupted its morals, and employed most of its moral and mental energy, either in the attack or defence, in the nineteenth century of the Christian era, of one of the worst forms of barbarism;—a conflict, too, which, during the last twenty years, began to exercise a paralyzing influence on industry and to poison social intercourse. We celebrate, in short, not simply the national independence, or the return of peace, but the close of the agitation about slavery, and the extinction of slavery itself. How tremendous an influence this fact is likely to have on our moral and intellectual progress, we can now only conjecture; we for our part believe that the next quarter of a century will have a wondrous story to tell on this point.

There is one other feature of our fête which is too marked to be overlooked or forgotten. It is not simply the triumph of American democracy that we rejoice over, but the triumph of democratic principles everywhere, for this is involved in the successful issue of our struggle with the rebellion. We need have little hesitation in predicting that the effects of the revolution through which we are now passing upon European politics will be still more marked than the effects of the revolution of 1776. It is evident already that the reaction of 1849 has been arrested, and that the tide is turning in favor of liberalism with resistless force. The French democrats already begin to show signs of life and activity, and the English Tories are retiring to their inner line of defence before the persistent assaults of the non-electors on the citadel of privilege. "Cæsarism" has received from our successes, in what it considered its proudest moment, a fatal blow. The wonderful vigor of popular government, the prodigious national vitality which it develops and fosters, received its most splendid illustration in our last campaign, within a few weeks of the publication of the work which the French Emperor intended to be an elaborate declaration of its failure. There is, in short, no believer in the capacity of the human race for greater happiness and greater virtue than it has yet attained, in the existence of a wider field for its powers, and a nobler goal for its striving than it has yet looked upon, who cannot and will not rejoice with us this week. We utter no idle boast, when we say that if the conflict of ages, the great strife between the few and the many, between privilege and equality, between law and power, between opinion and the sword, was not closed on the day on which Lee threw down his arms, the issue was placed beyond doubt.

Of the extent of the material prosperity which is opened up to us by the final cessation of domestic strife, and the final disappearance from our soil of a form of industry which has in every age blasted all that it touched, and pulled down political fabrics that seemed even stronger and better cemented than our own, thousands of willing tongues will this week tell. The theme is a grateful and a popular one. For our part, we love better to dwell on the possible moral and intellectual and æsthetic results of the wealth which awaits us, of all that it may enable us to do for religion, for art, for literature, and for science. For we are satisfied that democracy has in it, in a still larger degree than any other form of society, in spite of all that has been said and written to the contrary, the seeds of the highest excellence in every field of culture and research. The world has yet to see what a free people can achieve with great wealth, the results that the general diffusion of material comfort can produce in stimulating the pursuit of knowledge, and in intensifying the pleasures of the understanding and of the taste. We have already furnished an indication of what we may accomplish in other and nobler fields by the extraordinary amount of success in the cultivation of one of the most difficult of the sciences—that of war—which has been revealed by the military operations of the last four years. We cannot help believing that the national genius has a still stronger bent and a nicer adaptation for the victories of peace.

If we cared just now to play the part of the slave behind the Consul in his chariot in the triumphal progress, we might say much of the risks we still run, of the stumbling-blocks which still bestrew our path, of the temptations to which we may succumb, or of the thousand sins that will assuredly beset us. We prefer to reserve this less agreeable portion of our task to some season when it will be listened to with more attention, and will not be liable to damp honorable and fairly won rejoicing. There are few who celebrate the Fourth of July this year, who do not find, in the recent history of their own families or those of their friends, reminders enough that the brightest picture has its dark side. For how many thousands who went forth to hasten the great consummation over which the nation is singing pæans, do the bells ring, and the banners wave, and the music swell in vain!

WERE THE STATES EVER SOVEREIGN?

In most of the discussions which have taken place on the question of reconstruction it has been assumed that any admission that the organizations known as the States have been in any locality destroyed by the rebellion, involved also the admission that a State could get out of the Union. It has been maintained, therefore, very stoutly, that the only way of escaping the conclusion that a State could secede, was by affirming that it was indestructible, that it was not only sovereign, but immortal. There is, however, another mode of getting out of the difficulty, which is ably discussed in the subjoined letter, addressed to Mr. R. H. Dana by one of the most vigorous thinkers and ripest scholars the country has produced, and now resident in Europe. We do not adopt all his conclusions, but his argument with regard to State sovereignty possesses at this juncture the highest importance.

"Slavery has always been a veiled, half-legalized form of rebellion against the fundamental principles of our Constitution. So long as it was, in a certain degree, quiescent, we were unhappily bound by national compact to tolerate it as a sort of prisoner of war upon parole. There was, in all the negotiations which resulted in the Constitution of 1787-9, an implied understanding, a virtual pledge, on the part of the South, that the institution which the whole nation, with scarce a dissentient voice, acknowledged to be both a crime and a curse, should soon be abolished, and there is little doubt that all parties looked forward to the cessation of the slave trade in 1809 as the beginning of the era of emancipation. But when slavery declared itself to be not a wrong but a right, a divine ordinance above the jurisdiction of earthly legislators, a social relation more sacred than any claim, possession, or duty sanctioned by human law, or derived from human compact; when it became aggressive and proclaimed a holy war, a Mohammedan jehad, against the principles and the institutions on which not our Union alone but all truly Christian society is based, it violated its parole and forfeited the indulgence which in an hour of extremity had been granted to it. It was thereafter entitled to no courtesy, to none of the privileges of honorable warfare; it wore the wolf's head of the outlaw, and stammered out the righteous self-imposed doom of Cain: Every one that findeth me shall slay me!

"At the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1789, we were one people, one nation, one commonwealth. Slavery always secretly tended, and ever since the annexation of Texas has openly aimed, to make us no longer one harmonious organization but two hostile states. It has well-nigh accomplished that end. The North and the South have become conscious of an element of reciprocal repulsion that must be neutralized, or rather expelled, or it will rend us asunder were we to bind ourselves together with chains of adamant. It has long been felt that barbarism and civilization cannot breathe a common air or live a common life. The barbarian principle must be eliminated from our system and cease to taint our vital blood, or the cause which has already half brutalized the South will sink our whole nation to a lower level than that of the red man whom we have supplanted.

"These considerations force themselves so imperiously upon every man who engages in the discussion of this subject that you cannot have overlooked them, and I have no doubt you have given your verdict upon the issue in some unreported part of your discourse. The question: Shall slavery live, or shall it die? is a point on which every man's mind is made up, and it would be but arguing after judgment were I to propose to debate it with you. But it is quite otherwise with the questions: Shall we content ourselves with the assurance that the wound which slavery has received is certainly mortal and will extinguish its hated life before it can gather strength and create fresh venom to give us yet another scorpion-sting? Shall we trust its own promise to atone for its crimes, and save us the pain of inflicting the coup de grace, by a voluntary self-immolation, or shall we pronounce its sentence and deliver it over to the finisher of the law? I most fervently hope and confidently believe that the loyal people of the Union will award no new lease, grant no reprieve, but let the just judgment which has been already entered of record be followed by swift execution.

"The most obvious and perhaps the only really practicable method of accomplishing the great result is by constitutional amendment, federal and local. The refusal of the three McClellan States, hide-bound New Jersey—which, to borrow a phrase well understood in that State, is run by a corporation—Delaware, and Kentucky, to concur in the proposed amendment, has somewhat disappointed the hopes and embarrassed the policy of the friends of emancipation and the Union, and it is evidently wiser to take proper measures for securing the requisite number of States elsewhere, than to wait for the conversion of that trio of 'wayward sisters.' The attitude of the Federal Government towards the rebel States, and its authority over them with respect both to this and to all other points, must depend upon the legal position and the local relations of those States to the Federal Government. What then is the political status of the territory lately in open rebellion against the Union and now in reluctant submission to its authority?

"I am aware that the views which I understand you to entertain of this subject are those of a great number, perhaps the greater number, of American statesmen. It seems to be generally admitted, but so far as I have seen without sufficient examination, that because a State has, under the Federal Constitution, no power to secede from the Union, an ordinance of the State legislature or of a State convention to that effect, even though practically obeyed by the whole people of the State, is not only void as to the object sought to be accomplished by it, but has no effect whatever on the political rights and relations of the State or of the citizens. It is said that it neither creates nor releases rights or obligations of any sort, involves no disabilities, works no political disfranchisement or forfeiture, but the State remains, to all intents and purposes, so far as respects its relations to the Union, and even its own municipal organization, as if no ordinance of secession had been framed, no actual withdrawal from its practical connexion with the Federal Government had taken place. This view of the subject evidently assumes that the political rights of a State are appurtenant to its soil, and can perish only with it, not franchises and privileges of its citizens, to be enjoyed on condition of their fulfilment of corresponding duties. In many of the arguments I have seen on the question, the above theory seems to be held, not as a conclusion founded on any known principles of constitutional law, but because it has been thought that the doctrine of a lapse or forfeiture of the constitutional rights of a State—the proposition that rebellious South Carolina, for instance, is not still a co-equal member of the Federal Union, and as such entitled to all the powers and privileges of loyal Massachusetts or New York—implies the admission that she no longer territorially belongs to the Union. This I hold to be a grave and dangerous error, and I believe it is one of the fruits of that most false and pernicious heresy—the doctrine of State sovereignty, or rather of State supremacy.

"The old States which formed the original American Union, and the State of Vermont—which never had a colonial government—have had two stages of political existence since they ceased to be colonies of a foreign power; the embryonic or inchoate period, extending from the repudiation of the authority of Great Britain to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and the period of developed organization and mature life which they have enjoyed under that frame of government. The new States never passed through the intermediate stage, but rose at once from the dependent territorial or colonial condition to that of equal members of the Federal Union. It has been too generally assumed that, by the act of throwing off their allegiance to Great Britain, the provinces became, each, to all intents and purposes, an independent, free, and sovereign State, with all the rights, powers, and prerogatives appertaining to any existing political organization; that they were absolutely foreign and unrelated to each other as well as to the rest of the world, and bound by no common political tie; that they might freely consult, each, the individual interest and inclinations of its own citizens, without reference to the opinions, the interests, or the wishes of those of the other provinces; that whatever common rights and interests are vested in the Federal Union are enjoyed solely by compact between the States, and are defined by the Federal Constitution, which witnesses, and in fact exclusively embodies, that compact; and that the States have, severally or collectively, absolutely no rights with respect to each other, except such as they derive from the individual assent of the States to the Constitution of 1789, and from the general principles of international law.

"This view of our domestic relations is, I believe, both irreconcilable with historical fact and erroneous in point of law, and I maintain that the several States never were sovereign in any proper sense of that term. I am not ignorant that the epithet sovereign was often applied to the States in the early days of our national history, but it will be found that even then it was much more frequently used of them collectively than individually. And when it was employed in this latter way, it was used rather from want of a more appropriate term than as an epithet truly descriptive of their political status.

"At that period, the nomenclature of political science was much more vague and indefinite than in our day. Free discussion of political questions cannot be said to have anywhere existed before the American Revolution, and an appropriate dialect for such discussion had not yet grown up. Hence the publicists of the Revolutionary period were often obliged to employ the vocabulary of their predecessors in senses different from those which long usage has now conferred upon its technical terms. The word sovereign, then, as applied to the nascent American States, had not, in the mouths of those who first employed it, the comprehensive meaning which theorists of the State-rights school have since striven to affix to it, and the influence which the abuse of this unlucky word has had upon public opinion is the most remarkable instance of 'cheating with a name' to be found in our history, except that other of power acquired by the Northern pro-slavery party from the assumption of the title of 'the Democracy.'

"All this is most clearly shown by the conduct of the people and the local governments during the War of Independence. Doubtless they often acted without immediate reference to each other, just as separate army corps must sometimes do, from the mere necessity of the case. But whenever concert and joint action were possible, they never failed to consult and act together. They did not consider themselves as, for a moment, an unrelated group of independent commonwealths temporarily banded together to accomplish an object in which they had no common, but each a separate interest, nor did they believe that the one supremacy of Great Britain had been divided into thirteen new and distinct supremacies, of the same order not only as each other but as Great Britain herself. Whatever, here and there, a crazy theorist, even at that early day, may have dreamed about State sovereignty, the American people entertained no such idea, nor did they suppose that the States could, by any individual action, release themselves from the common bond, created by common origin, common allegiance, common interest, common aims, and a common country.

"The true technical sovereignty was, indeed, for a time in abeyance, and until it was definitely lodged in an organization constituted by the will of the one whole people, the new States were like minors lawfully emancipated from the tyranny of an unnatural parent, but who have not yet chosen a legal guardian.

"The uprising of the American people in 1775 was not a succession of independent municipal insurrections; it was a national act. The Declaration of Independence in 1776 was not a chorus of thirteen voices accidentally falling into the same melody; it was a national anthem. The Revolutionary war was not a chaos of exasperated and vindictive mobs, of predatory raids and guerrilla forays; it was a justum bellum whose strategy was planned by national generals, and whose great operations were conducted under the authority of Congress. The conventions by which France in 1778, and Great Britain in 1783, recognized our independence, were not negotiated between those powers on the one hand and thirteen individual sovereignties on the other, but between European monarchies and a single American republic. The Constitution of 1787–9 was not a purely voluntary league between independent realms, but was, and declared itself to be, the solemn act of the people of a commonwealth, geographically and politically known as the United States, establishing a frame of government adopted by that people for that and all coming ages. The first and most sacred of all our political acts, the Declaration of Independence, does not even name or enumerate the individual States, and the specification of them, in the international treaties to which I have alluded, is only for the purpose of distinguishing them from all other British-American colonies whose independence was not acknowledged. So with those treaties, mention is made of the 'two parties;' that is to say, the monarchy on one side, the republic on the other; and all the stipulations are framed accordingly.

"As soon as the term of abeyance ceased, as soon as the guardian was chosen, the United States, as impersonated by the Declaration of Independence, succeeded to the sovereignty of Great Britain, and the Constitution of 1789 confirmed and perpetuated the sovereignty of the people of the nation over all local organizations, and made the constitutionally expressed will of that people the supreme law of the land. Thus far, then, the former colonies, though they had ceased to be provinces, and had become what we in American political phraseology call States, had never severally assumed the rank technically designated as that of a sovereign State in the general dialect of political writers.

"Until the adoption of the Constitution, and before the universally recognized common sovereignty had been fully organized and developed in its several departments, the States had, from necessity, exercised certain powers always properly belonging—and, by the terms of the Constitution, now definitely committed—to the Federal Government; but the adoption of that Constitution involved, by the very force of its provisions, a final and perpetual surrender of the prerogatives of sovereignty universally recognized by publicists in all ages as not merely indicia, but as necessary elements of independent supremacy; and when the people of the Union, through its organs, the public authorities of the several States, signified its acceptance of the Constitution which its delegates in convention had framed for it, the very shadow of that hydra sovereignty which had never had a substantial existence, vanished for ever!

"The States, then, were not sovereign before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and certainly that instrument did not make them so. They are municipal bodies, having no legal existence or attributes, except such as are expressly defined by the Constitution, or as result from the nature of the purposes for which they exist, and there is no more ground for ascribing sovereignty to the old States than to the new, which latter, surely, have no source of power above the Constitution.

"I am wholly unable to see how the doctrine, that a particular State can no longer exercise its rights and privileges as a technical member of the Union, involves the admission that it is no longer subject to the authority of the Union. The theory of an indefeasible State sovereignty seems to have led very many politicians to reason that every State must be lawfully in the Union as a co-equal member of it, or altogether out of its jurisdiction, and hence, that to deny to a State, under any circumstances, power to act as a branch of the Federal Government, is to admit the right of secession. This is altogether a non sequitur, and to draw such a conclusion is to maintain that a crime which works a forfeiture of particular rights confers ipso facto yet greater rights upon the offending party. There is no apparent reason why Virginia or North Carolina, having disfranchised themselves as States, should not still belong to the Union as Territories; and, indeed, this is the strongest ground upon which the recognition by Congress of the new State of Western Virginia can be justified. A municipal corporation—and the States are nothing more—may surrender its charter, or it may forfeit it by abuse of power. Nobody would contend that the voluntary surrender or the forfeiture of the charter of the city of Boston would exempt that city from the jurisdiction of the State legislature. On the contrary, the power of the State over its territory and its citizens would be greater than before, because prerogatives enjoyed by it under the State would then lapse back again to the higher jurisdiction. Still less would it be maintained that, because an insignificant minority of the citizens had cast their ballots against the surrender, or were, otherwise than by unresisting acquiescence, innocent of the acts which created the forfeiture, those citizens, however few, became thereby invested with the corporate powers originally belonging to the whole body of inhabitants. The rebel States have lost their corporate charter both by voluntary surrender and by forfeiture, and I have no manner of doubt that the Federal Government may accept the surrender or enforce the forfeiture, and that, in either case, that which was a State becomes a Territory, subject in all things to the legislative power of Congress, just like any other technical Territory of the Union.

"When the political reorganization of the Southern territory becomes a practical question, as it soon must do, there will be conflicts of jurisdiction. Such, indeed, have arisen already. There are two claimants to the executive chair, two legislatures, in Virginia, not to speak of a third government in Western Virginia. There are two governors in Tennessee, two in Louisiana, and two in Arkansas, and there will soon be like cases in other rebel States. In the portion of your speech which I have seen, no method of settling which is the true prince, which the pretender, is hinted at; but this is a question which must be met at once.* The power of deciding between rival claims of this character, it appears to be conceded, belongs not to the judiciary but to the Federal Government, Congress, and the Executive. Congress and the Executive are in no case judicial authorities, and whenever an officer, a magistracy, or a deliberative body is entrusted with absolute power, independent of control or revision by courts of law—as the decisions of the Federal Governments on such points are declared to be—then such power becomes a discretionary one, and may be exercised with such limitations, and upon such conditions, as the authority invested with it chooses to impose upon itself or upon the subjects of its jurisdiction. The Federal Government, then, may lawfully pronounce decisions, which shall bind all the world, as between rival claimants to State authority, and it may impose on either claimant just such terms of recognition—the direct abolition of slavery, the adoption of the proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution, a change of State name or of State boundaries even, for instance—as it shall deem the public good to require.

"Were the question now first presented for discussion, I should hold it the wiser course to enforce the forfeiture of the corporate rights of the rebel States, reduce the whole to the territorial condition, divide the soil into convenient jurisdictions for that purpose, cutting off Panhandles, Eastern Shores, and other geographico-political absurdities, and finally admitting as States the territories so constituted, whenever they should have framed and adopted constitutions consonant to the principles of American liberty. This course would relieve us from many perplexing embarrassments, and be attended with many positive advantages, among which not the least conspicuous would be the legal consequence, that the constitutional anti-slavery amendment is already accepted by a sufficient number of States. It is, perhaps, now too late to adopt so sweeping a measure as this, as one of universal application; but the power of the Federal Government to decide which, in any given case, is the lawful State organization, enables it to secure most of the advantages of a more radical plan of operation, and besides, this latter may, in extreme cases, still be resorted to whenever it is found necessary.

* Mr. Johnson has met it by putting one of the two governors in jail.—Ed. Nation.

"Instead, then, of leaving the whole matter to take care of itself, and maintaining the status quo in order that the slavery question may form a basis for the organization of a new 'Democratic' party, North and South, I would propose:

"I. Examples of salutary severity, sufficient both in the number and in the position of the criminals to teach the people of the Union that disappointed politicians cannot be permitted to play at treason, rebellion, robbery, and assassination with impunity.

"II. The holding of the 'rebels and their territory in the grasp of war,' as you well suggest, either governing them by territorial organizations, supported by martial law administered by a competent force, until they shall be content to return to loyalty and submission, with free State constitutions, or encouraging the election of State governors and legislatures by the loyal inhabitants, and the adoption of the constitutional amendment by such legislatures, making this and the constitutional repudiation of the rebel debt, in all cases, conditions precedent of recognition by the Federal Government, and relaxing 'the grasp of war' only when these objects shall have been accomplished.

"III. The inexorable treatment of all rebels found in arms hereafter, by land or sea, as traitors and pirates, and their condign punishment by military tribunals.

"This policy would, I believe, secure the immediate legal abolition of slavery throughout the land, and thereby affect a permanent pacification of our distracted country. If, on the other hand, we hold that though every citizen of a State may have individually committed a treason which involved the forfeiture of all rights, life itself even, and though every authority of the State has not only officially participated in that treason, but has voluntarily surrendered the corporate rights of the State, yet, notwithstanding all this, the mere soil of the State retains all the ancient powers, privileges, franchises, immunities, and even local institutions of its once loyal citizens, we have gained nothing by the sacrifice of half a million of lives and of uncounted millions of treasure.

"Proclamations, amnesties, fraternizations, conciliations, have not as yet touched the root of the evil. They will not touch it hereafter. Our lenient treatment of rebels and the rebellion has excited no compunctious visitings, no gratitude for unmerited indulgence. Let us remember as a guide for future dealings with treason, that 'the tender mercies of the weak,

As of the wicked, are but cruel.'"

A CASE IN POINT.

The British West Indies have been used a great deal by the opponents of emancipation as an illustration of what negroes come to if allowed to be their own masters. It now furnishes a useful illustration of what government comes to when legislation is left in the hands of one class. Emancipation found the colored population of Jamaica in a state of gross ignorance. Popular education has, however, been all but totally neglected by the legislature, though thirty-five years have elapsed since emancipation. It has spent over $200,000 in the erection of a so-called penitentiary, and that institution and the other prisons throughout the island are supported at a yearly outlay of full $100,000, while, with a population of nearly half a million, the munificent sum of $20,000 per annum is voted for educational purposes. When the Government is pressed on the subject by persons who are anxious to see the work of popular education taken vigorously in hand, the reply always has been, "We are going to do something; but means are required, and it is not easy to find the money." It is worthy of note that, in certain other matters, there is never any lack of promptitude and energy, nor is any difficulty ever raised with regard to finding means for carrying them out. If, for example, it is desired to import Coolie immigrants to aid in the cultivation of the sugar plantations, loans are at once raised for the purpose; and fully three-fifths of the present island debt, amounting to nearly a million of pounds sterling, and which the entire people of Jamaica are now contributing to pay off, has been incurred in immigration schemes, set on foot to supply the planters with cheap labor. But as for education, it is urged that the poverty of the country makes it impossible to do anything on a proper scale.

The natural consequence of all this is, that the great bulk of the black people of Jamaica are, as regards mental culture, in a state but little removed from that in which slavery left them and emancipation found them nearly thirty years ago; that only two blacks have ever sat in the legislature of the colony; that out of the hundreds of magistrates on the island, there are not more than four black men holding commissions of the peace; that among the ninety-odd clergymen belonging to the Anglo-Jamaican Established Church, supported at the public expense, there is only one black minister, and he is without an incumbency; and that in the civil service of the colony there is but one negro, and he has been recently appointed to the subordinate post of tide-waiter in the Customs.

It is true that the legislature makes liberal provision for the support of an Established Church in the colony. But this fact, instead of serving to extenuate its conduct in regard to popular education, only tends to bring out the dereliction of duty in stronger relief. The Jamaica Church establishment is supported at a cost to the tax-paying public of the island of $200,000 per annum. That Church, be it known, is the Church of the minority, not more, on the outside, than one-fourth of the population being members of it, and it is the Church of the higher classes. Its members, too, with a few honorable exceptions, are not educators of the masses. They are not pastors of the Neff and Oberlin stamp, adapting themselves in their teachings and labors to the mental and social condition of the people, and acting the part of pioneers in the work of civilization. They are rather of the aristocratic order of clergymen, and generally content themselves, as the principal part of their duties, with reading prayers and preaching a sermon once or twice a week—their discourses being as a rule composed in language altogether above the comprehension of the illiterate portion of their congregations. Yet to support this Church, which costs the country annually $200,000, the people of the other religious denominations, who have to maintain by voluntary contributions their own ministers and to build and repair their own places of worship, are heavily taxed. And it is to be observed that the blacks are nearly all dissenters. So much for the question of popular education.

Let us now see how the electoral rights of the people have been dealt with. A short time after emancipation took place, an election law was passed by the Jamaica legislature, giving the franchise to owners of freeholds of the annual value of six pounds sterling and upwards. Under that law a considerable number of the freed blacks became entitled to vote; but as the negro in numerous instances showed quite a disposition to think and act for himself as a voter, or at any rate to follow other leaders than the men of the old dominant party, it was discovered that the law was a great deal too liberal, and so, after several alterations had been from time to time made in it, all of a restrictive tendency, the happy expedient was at length hit upon of imposing a tax on the suffrage while retaining the property qualification. The tax is two dollars and a half a year, and in addition to any other taxes a man may have to pay. What makes the matter worse is, that this impost falls only on the poorer classes of tax-payers. Every man paying taxes to the amount of seven dollars and a half as a minimum is exempted from it; but those ranging under that sum must pay the voting tax before they can exercise the elective franchise. The result of this legislation has been to render popular representation in Jamaica a mockery and a delusion. There are several of the parishes on the island, numbering respectively a population of from twenty-five thousand souls to thirty thousand and upward, whose voting lists, year after year, do not show more than thirty or forty registered votes; and from a return presented to the House of Assembly two years ago, it appeared that the number of registered voters for the whole island of Jamaica did not then exceed two thousand. And this with a population of nearly half a million! Thus it will be seen that the great body of the people are not represented in the legislature; and in a dispute between the late Colonial Secretary, the Duke of Newcastle, and the House of Assembly, which took place shortly before his death, that nobleman brought the fact forcibly to the attention of the House, and on the ground which it furnished justified the interference of the Imperial Government, acting on behalf of the people, with the local legislation of the colony.

THE EMPEROR AND THE TWO SOUS.

The two-sous subscription in France, towards the purchase of a medal to be presented to Mrs. Lincoln, has, after two weeks of reflection, been relieved from the prohibition placed upon it by the police, and is now in process of collection once more. But the fact that at the outset it should have filled the Imperial Government with alarm is one of the most singular and suggestive facts of contemporaneous history.

It would look, at first view, as if there were nothing in it that should perplex, with fear of change, so mighty a monarch as the Emperor. Had it been proposed to strike the medal in honor of Booth as a tyrannicide, who had laid low a usurper guilty of the murder of the Republic he had sworn to preserve, one might better understand the philosophy of the prohibition. For the imperial historian of the first Roman emperor must feel a shuddering horror at the image of Brutus which ever stalks inseparable from the shade of his great victim in the memory of mankind. That were of evil ensample. But a testimony of grief and loathing for the act which had reddened the annals of mankind with the blood of a great magistrate, a protest of labor against murder disguised as patriotism, a breathing of respectful pity for the bitterness of the private sorrow which waited upon this public crime—might not this be allowed without endangering the foundations of the Second Empire? One would think so. But instinct is a great matter now, as in Falstaff's time, and especially the instinct of despotic power. The existing condition of things being accepted, what the preservation of that condition demands cannot be refused. If plantation slavery were right and necessary, then the scourge, the manacle, the branding-irons, the auction-block, were all of them necessary and right too. It is common sense, as well as common law, which says that the possession of a right implies the possession of everything that is necessary to the enjoyment and security of that right.

"Refulgent from the stroke of Cæsar's fate,"

And thus if imperialism be accepted as the highest development of human government on earth, the fitting image and expression of the Divine polity, the necessary incidents of the condition must be accepted also. If France admits that the first Bonaparte, by virtue of the greatness of his genius, became the legitimate and natural master of her destinies, and that this autocracy descended of right to his putative nephew—that the Second of December was the necessary sequence of the Eighteenth Brumaire—she must consent to the censorship of the press, to the restriction of freedom of speech, to arbitrary arrests, to deportation without trial, and whatever else is necessary to the maintenance of this divine order of things. And, looked at from this point of view, the prohibition of the testimonial medal to Mrs. Lincoln is not so unaccountable or unreasonable as it looked at the first blush. It was, unquestionably, a political movement—at least, a political sign. It was the heart of laboring masses that are the objects of government, speaking to laboring masses that are the originals of government. It was not merely an offering to Mrs. Lincoln, as the widow of the one man who had been murdered for his fidelity to his public duty, that was proposed. It regarded her as typifying the nation that was sitting in the weeds of widowhood for the loss of her head, who died for his devotion to the principles which are the life-blood of her being. It was an offering of republicans to a republic—for the workmen of France are republicans, who bide their time with such patience as they may. It was a sincere tribute of respect and sympathy to Mrs. Lincoln, undoubtedly; but it was, at the same time, an ingenious and effectual political engine. It was miching malicho. It meant more than met the ear. There was an esoteric, as well as an exoteric, significancy attached to it. Its word of promise was not to be broken to the hope while it was kept to the ear. This it was that sealed its fate. This was the mischief that vitiated the transaction, and made the Imperial Government see in what was on the face of it a harmless and touching embodiment of an honorable feeling, an infernal machine designed for the destruction of the throne. So the die was broken before the medal was struck, and the hard-earned moneys given toward it swept for the moment into the public fisc.

It is edifying, and not unpleasing to the carnal man, to consider that the most serious dangers that threaten Napoleon III., and the annoyances that most vex him, have sprung directly from his false calculations of our calamities and the advantages he promised to himself from them. He would never have erected Mexico into a Spain for his dynasty, had he not been assured in his own mind of our national disintegration. He saw Texas and Louisiana conceded to him, or to his Mexican dependency, as the remuneration for his recognition of the Confederacy, which he did not intend should be long delayed. The Pall Mall Gazette, in recent articles, to show the obligations of America to England, in the new spirit of civility which has come over the English press since the downfall of the rebellion became an accomplished fact, affirms, on what seems good authority, what we have had reason to believe from other sources, that Napoleon urged upon England a joint intervention in our affairs and armed compulsion to a settlement by separation. And a correspondent declares that a Frenchman of high rank, a senator and personal friend of the Emperor, had denounced in his hearing the refusal of England as the greatest blot on the administration of Lord Palmerston. This was the general tone of conversation in high French political circles. We fully believe this to be true, and are confident that when the history of these last four years comes to be written authentically, it will be found that we were all along in greater danger from France than from England. The community of language, the unbridled license of the English press, the arrogance and ill-manners of public speakers in and out of Parliament, excited natural resentment, just indeed, but even more merited by the better bred and more controlled malignity of the French Government. It is taken for granted that such intervention would have resulted inevitably in the success of the rebellion. We submit that it would have done nothing of the kind. The war, thus supported, would have been much more disastrous to us than it has actually been; but it would have been still more so for the intervening powers, especially for England. Not a shred of commerce would have been left for either of them at the end of it. The proof of this is to be seen in what we have done, and with how moderate and tolerable a strain upon our resources of men and money. We think English statesmen chose the better part in refusing to join in such an adventure, and we believe, too, that the throne of the Second Empire was saved from going to wreck in the tempest by their refusal.

All this, however, lies in the province of what the schoolmen used to call the Media Scientia, or the science that treats of what would have happened had events gone differently from what they did. We cannot but think that the prestige of the Emperor for sagacity must suffer loss from the miscalculation of our horoscope which led him into the Mexican entanglement. That Prince Napoleon thinks this last what Lord Derby would consider "a blunder" is evident from his speech at Ajaccio, in which he comes out for the Monroe doctrine. This must be no small addition to the vexations growing out of our affairs which make the head lie uneasy that wears the imperial crown of France.

SOME REASONS FOR DELAY.

If we are to believe the correspondents, even of those journals which are best satisfied with the course things are taking at the South, the condition of the society there is something very nearly chaotic.

Without officers or legislators, without courts, without authorities to keep the peace, with agriculture unsettled, the labor question undetermined, property insecure, trade paralyzed for want of the products of exchange and the means of purchase, the social status of every class undefined; with proscription, death, or disfranchisement ever present to the people's imagination, violence lurking in the air, and threatening to burst now upon the leaders of secession, now upon the negroes, and now upon the populace, who welcome coldly the disbanded hosts of the defunct Confederacy,—such is the picture of the South that one finds drawn in the morning papers. From every subjugated State, and from some which were none the less rebellious because not technically subjugated, there comes very general testimony that the abolition of slavery, which was the consummation of the war, is to be resisted and thwarted by the whites in every possible way. Enraged that the object for which they courted poverty, famine, exile, and death, has been for ever removed from their ambitious machinations, they seem determined that the new order of things shall not be made pleasant.

In Virginia, the last State to capitulate and the first to get upon its legs again without a military Governor, we see the planters assemble and resolve, in one county, that the laborers shall be paid starvation wages; that none shall be employed unless recommended by their previous employers, or shall have access to the plantations except on business; in another county, that to hire a negro without the consent or unless on the terms of his "owner" shall be a "social misdemeanor"—which, according to former custom, would subject the offender to any of the rigors of lynch law. In the interior of North Carolina, whose loyalty has been so boasted, the condition of the freedmen is scarcely better than that of slaves. Many are in fact still held under the lash, as is true to a great extent in South Carolina, and even in West Tennessee, where masters continue to hire out their slaves as of old.

A spirit so obstinate as this, in a community where the oppressor has not yet learned his weakness, nor the oppressed his rights, where naught is fixed but the determination to persist in injustice, where it is morally impossible without perjury to swear to support the national enactments for the destruction of slavery—a spirit, we repeat, of such a cast appears not only incapable of ruling others but of ruling itself. And yet, so far from being put on probation, subjected to restraints, and above all shorn of the power which has corrupted and seduced them, the Southern people find self-government forced upon them with such rapidity, that we shall, to all appearances, have the Union restored by the first of August. This haste on the part of the Executive must outstrip the expectation of the seceded States themselves, as of course it does their just claims to restoration to the Union. Would it not have been more seemly, as well as wiser, to have waited till society could accustom itself to its new basis of free labor and equality, till the penalties of rebellion had been determined upon and applied, till accurate statistics could be procured of the material, intellectual, and moral capacity of the South, including both races, and until, in fact, those charged with the work of reconstruction had some better light to guide them than the theories concocted in Washington?

LORD BROUGHAM ON THE QUALITY OF MERCY.

Lord Brougham has made, at a banquet given to the Prince of Wales in the Fishmongers' Hall in London, the following extraordinary remarks:

"If my voice could reach across the Atlantic, it would tell our kinsmen that their best friends, those who have been their advocates through good report and through bad report, now pray and beseech them to use the victory which, by great courage, great perseverance, and no little military skill, they have gained, in mercy as well as in justice (cheers); that they should not stain the scaffold with the blood of their prisoners (cheers); that they should recollect that those prisoners whom they call rebels were treated by them as warriors (cheers); that truces were made with them, agreements made with them, submissions received from them, and that they ought not to think of rendering their cause, which is now triumphant, hateful, as well as triumphant, by spilling the blood of those captives they have now in their power. (Loud cheers)."

It will probably be a satisfaction to him to know that his voice "has reached across the Atlantic," but we regret to add that there is very little probability that anything he can say on the subject of the treatment of the rebel prisoners, or on any other political subject in which Americans are interested, will produce the smallest impression on either the Government or people. He has not grown grey in courts without learning that, to be listened to at all, a judge must be supposed to be impartial, and a counsellor to be friendly. He has since the outbreak of the war, we must suppose deliberately, disqualified himself for assuming either of these positions towards us in the settlement of our differences with the South. By nobody has the cause of the North been denounced, and its motives impugned, with more violence, and, we may add, indecency of language. He assumed from the very outset, not simply that the conduct of the South was excusable, but that our conduct was criminal, and has throughout acted and spoken on this assumption. He has in more than one speech ascribed the war, which the whole people of the North were waging for an idea, to mere love on our part of plunder and bloodshed. He has treated our anti-slavery zeal as so much artful hypocrisy, and our devotion to the Union as so much insane lust of power. If we were, now that the struggle is over, to turn to him for advice as to the use we should make of our victory, whatever he might say, he would certainly in his secret heart be amused by our stupidity.

Lord Brougham's course on the American struggle has simply furnished a fresh illustration of that absence of judicial power which has marred his career ever since he left the bar. He is by nature an advocate, and has all the defects as well as all the excellences belonging to that character. He owed a large portion of his professional success to a constitutional incapacity to see more than one side of any question, and this of course enabled him to bring to the service of his client more of his highest powers than men gifted with more of the critical faculty can ever place at the disposal of any cause or any person whatever. Luckily a nature inherently noble, and an ingrained horror of whatever bore the appearance of wrong, in seven cases out of ten kept him on the right side of politics, and made him one of the ablest and most successful of English reformers.

But even in this field he has always been too much of an advocate to attain the highest position. His knowledge has never kept pace with his zeal. He has had that amount of cultivation which every lawyer ought to have, but which most lawyers get along without, and which consists in knowing enough of everything to cross-examine an expert with credit and effect; but this is not knowledge which it does to air out of court, and Lord Brougham's confidence in producing it on every occasion has brought on him the imputation of being, if not shallow, not thorough. His peculiar defects of character and training showed themselves more conspicuously, of course, when he mounted the bench than they had ever done before; but they show themselves perhaps still more conspicuously in his attempts to play the Nestor in his old age. That is a part for which his unfitness is pre-eminent. Advancing years have certainly not whitened the light in which he sees things, and whatever respect people have retained for him in this country, is certainly due, not to the opinion they entertain of the effects of time on his judgment, but to the memory of the great services rendered to freedom and humanity in the days of his hot youth.

THE AMERICAN STRUGGLE.

I.

Sword! ere the sheath that hid thy light so long
That splendor quench, go thou like lightning forth,
High bride of Justice, not of South or North,
And lift, as now, the weak, and quell the strong!
Advance till from the black man's hut the song
Rises to God, and by the black man's hearth
Humanity hath leave in godly mirth
To sit forgetful of her ancient wrong.
Then sleep for ever; for to work like thine
While the worlds last no other can succeed
Equal or second. Hang a starry sign
In heaven! but rather wear a widow's weed
On earth than break that primal troth and trust
For second nuptials base and prone ambition's lust.

II.

Lo! as an eagle battling through a cloud,
That from his neck all night the vapor flings,
And ploughs the dark, till downward from his wings
Fierce sunrise smites with light some shivering crowd
Beneath a blind sea-cavern bent and bowed;
Thus through the storm of war, the night of things,
That Principle to which the issue clings
Makes fateful way, and spurns at last its shroud.
There were that saw it with a skeptic ken;
There were that saw it not, through hate or pride;
But conquering and to conquer, on it came,
No tool of man, but making tools of men,
Till nations shook beneath its advent wide,
And they that loosed the portent rued the same.

Aubrey De Vere.

CRITICS AND CRITICISM.

One principal object of The Nation is to promote and develop a higher standard of criticism. The question may be asked, Cui bono? and the appearance of our first number is therefore a proper occasion for saying somewhat on the value and proper position of critics.

The opinions on this subject are opposite as the poles. Some authors, and distinguished ones, too—Irving was one, Bulwer is another, Lowell another, though professing to be also of the "ungentle craft" himself—maintain that your critic is a most unnecessary nuisance, a pestilent fellow, who tears the works of better men to pieces, because he can produce nothing good himself, and makes it his business to look for spots in the sun, and calumniate the icicle on Diana's temple. On the other hand, the critic not unfrequently proclaims himself a fine gentleman, for whose amusement the author writes. He discusses the book as he would a newly furnished house or a state dinner. Talk to him of writing books himself! Must Amphitryon be able to fry an omelette or Lucullus to concoct a méringue before he ventures to find fault with Soyer's cotelettes à la Reforme? Is Brummell disqualified for passing judgment on Stultz's coats because he has never handled the shears himself?

Equally opposite are the theories about the critic's genesis. There was the old one of Queen Anne's time, that he owed his life to the corruption of an author, and merely sought to revenge his own failures on more successful rivals. There is the modern theory, upheld, if not suggested, by Thackeray, that the critic is generally an immature author, who jests at scars because he never felt a wound, and is prone to exaggerate the errors because he has never experienced the difficulties of serious authorship.

On this debatable ground we shall be more likely to go safely by taking a middle path. In political difficulties the boldest course is sometimes the most prudent, and nothing short of "thorough" will carry us through; but in questions of taste it is always wise to keep clear of extremes, for taste is eminently eclectic. It is quite possible for a man to become a competent critic without ever passing, or intending to pass, through the stage of authorship. It is no paradox to call criticism a very subordinate and yet a very important branch of literature, just as the constable, though of no exalted official rank, is an indispensable portion of the political framework. A man may be born with a large share of the appreciative and discriminative faculties, which may have been, as they most certainly are, capable of being largely improved by education, at the same time he may be entirely destitute of the creative and imaginative faculties, which, unless given by nature, no education can implant. Indeed, there must be such men, since the former qualities, though rare enough, are less rare than the latter. A man thus intellectually furnished can never write anything like a first-class novel or poem; indeed, he is not very likely to make the attempt; but he can criticize novels and poems to any extent.

The case of translators is analogous. We often hear it said that none but a poet can translate poetry. The assertion is plausible; but who would maintain that none but a historian can translate a historian; that it requires a Macaulay or a Merivale to render a Michelet or a Thierry? Yet the rule ought to hold good for both, if at all, although the author's temptation to improve on his original shows itself differently; the poet's alterations would be made in the text, the historian's would be expressed in notes and comments. It is unfortunate that as a musician who plays well enough to accompany nicely will seldom condescend to accompaniment, so those whose talents and education best fit them for translating are generally prone to aim at original composition. Or take a work of learning and research. The critic may be the author's superior in knowledge of the subject, yet may never think of writing such a book, either for want of the steady industry necessary, or from the press of other avocations, or even from deficiency in pecuniary means, since learned authorship in most countries is generally a rich and sometimes a very expensive luxury.

But why not give up the business of criticism to authors themselves? For various reasons. In one sense they are much too good for it—that is, the best of them are. It is cutting blocks with a razor, and putting Pegasus into harness. A man of real, original creative power is better employed in producing something himself than in criticizing the productions of others. Here again translation furnishes us with analogies. Thus it is highly probable that Tennyson might have achieved the best English version of the "Iliad" ever written, but how much better for the reading public and the world of letters that he wrote Maud and the Princess!

In other cases, they are not good enough. And the reason is twofold. In the first place, authors, like the rest of mankind, are subject to the influence of professional jealousy. In nine cases out of ten such a charge against the critic would be absurdly irrelevant. He might as well be taxed with envying a general or a congressman. The only circumstances under which a critic can be reasonably suspected of attacking an author from this motive are these: Either he has written a work on the same subject, and failed—for if he has succeeded he passes into the class of authors, as the greater takes precedence of the less—or he has a work on the same subject in contemplation, and may feel annoyed at the wind being taken out of his sails. But the author is always tempted to find another author on similar subjects a possible rival in his way.

Then, putting all bad motive out of the question, the author is less apt to criticize fairly than the critic, because he is more apt to be one-sided. His very ability is likely to make him intense in one direction, so that he will overvalue his own method of treatment. The critic is, by profession, as it were, many-sided, a proposition which we have already expressed in other words by saying that taste is eminently eclectic. If, though one-sided, he obtains a reputation, as in Ruskin's case, it is because his excellences of style give him a position as an author independent of the value of his critical opinions. Byron strikingly illustrates both these disqualifications. The former affected his judgment of Shelley, the latter his judgment of Wordsworth.

It is often assumed that the relations of critics are only to authors, or at most to authors and the public. This is a very inadequate statement; their relations to publishers are even more important. From one point of view the publisher is the public's natural enemy, and the critic their natural protector. Now and then we find a chivalric Moxon, who publishes a whole generation of poets from pure love of poetry. But such are exceptions. Publishers, like most men, usually pursue their calling from a desire to make money by it, nor is this fact more discreditable to them than to any other class. But, like all dealers, the publisher is sometimes mistaken in the quality of his wares; he sometimes buys or agrees to print a work which would not find favor on its own merits. This want of merit he is too often tempted to supply by systematic and unblushing puffery. In this country (and England and France are no better off) there is quite as much "shoddy" literature as any other kind of deceptive goods disposed of under the falsest pretences. To take the lowest view, this is an imposition on the public. Every man who pays a dollar or two for a worthless book is directly swindled by the puffing publisher and the venal "notice-writer" who have deluded him into the purchase.

It must not be inferred from anything which has been said that we accept the ungracious theory of those who make it the critic's business always and solely to find fault. But the multitude of sham reviewers, whose chief stock in trade consists of unmeaning adulation, may well make us forget that the American critic has any laudatory functions. And at present, we believe that these are more wisely employed on subjects than on individuals. There are some branches of literature and learning (classics and general philosophy, for instance) in which the scarcity of valuable American works is deplorable, and this is in a great measure owing to the want of accomplished critics, who might awaken a public curiosity in that direction. The special branch of art-criticism has some peculiarities arising from the nature of its subject-matter. Every critic is in some sense an author—that is, he writes for publication; the art-critic may also be an artist, but it is not considered necessary that he should be in any sense. But we can only allude to this division of our subject, the proper handling of which would require a separate paper to itself.

In a new country like ours, the public mind passes through three stages before it is fully prepared to furnish or appreciate complete and well-balanced criticism. First, there is the chaotic or embryo period, when the whole energy of the people is employed in overcoming physical obstacles. Literature and art are then rare exotics, and their votaries run the risk of being considered very eccentric, if not absolutely mad. There are men enough living who recollect this stage. Then succeeds the childish age, or that of promiscuous and often silly admiration. The last stage before reaching the day of true criticism is a reaction from this, a period of indiscriminate censure. In art-criticism we seem to have arrived at the third stage, or at least to be very near it. In literature we are not yet well out of the second, though many spirited attempts have been made at intervals for thirty years or more to push us out of it; usually, as in Park Benjamin's case, for instance, they failed to make any permanent impression or meet the appreciation which they deserved. We really think that before our criticism comes to merit the name, it will have to pass through this stormy and belligerent stage, a period like that of English criticism during the first quarter of the century. The great mischief has always been that whenever our reviewers deviate from the usual and popular course of panegyric they start from and end in personality, so that the public mind is almost sure to connect unfavorable criticism with personal animosity. Any review thus inspired is worth exactly its weight in Confederate paper. The critic ought to know the author only through his book; he should have the least possible personal knowledge of him, should be ignorant (or at least affect to be ignorant) whether he is rich or poor, handsome or ugly, married or single, whether his grandmother was a President's sister, or his second cousin is a New York alderman. Above all, it is absolutely necessary that there should not be a shadow of personal difficulty between them. With this proviso, we believe our authors themselves would not be sorry for a little less butter and a little more pepper; we are certain it would do them good, whether they liked it or not.

CLUB LIFE.

BARELY twenty years ago that shrewd thinker and bold speaker, Fenimore Cooper, stigmatized New York society as provincial. Though expressed with unnecessary vehemence, the charge was at the time true in the main; but were our great novelist now living, he would see abundant reason for changing his opinion. And among the many symptoms of metropolitanism which our city displays, none is more striking than the multiplication of clubs. Every interest, from the highest art to the lowest sport, is already represented or preparing to represent itself in this way. Clubs actually duplicate one another, sometimes in object merely, sometimes in the name itself. It looks as if we were, to use a popular phrase, running the thing into the ground; but this very repetition and duplication are a characteristic of club life in European capitals. Herein, as in most matters, our other chief cities are following the lead of New York, and the club may now be considered a recognized feature of American town life.

We shall resist the temptation to display a little very cheap learning by going into the origin and history of clubs here and elsewhere. Our present intention is merely to show that these associations are not only natural but desirable products of advancing civilization, not a necessary evil but a necessary good.

To appreciate properly the intellectual and social effect of clubs, we should look back a moment to the period of their infancy or that just preceding their introduction. What were the resources of those classes and sets from among whom the members of our clubs are chiefly supplied? The very "Upper Ten" largely patronized balls, at which there were many tureens of oysters and baskets of champagne consumed, many waltzes and polkas danced (it was just about the epoch when Cellarius immortalized himself by inventing the latter choregraphic performance), very little conversation, and that of the most frivolous. Those lords of creation who were too clumsy or too ungallant to attend balls, lounged much in the bars, reading-rooms, and ten-pin alleys of fashionable hotels. Those who were too poor or too pious for either of these luxuries, had a great habit of going to lectures, a very innocent amusement or occupation, in most cases, but not over apt to illumine or develop a man's mind.

The first and third of these practices are still in vogue. The social wants vaguely and erroneously seeking relief in the second, found that relief in club life. Every respectable club is an entelechy, bringing out into action and strengthening by mutual encouragement the independent thought, the honorable feeling, the critical acumen of its members.

We yield to no one in our affection and reverence for all that is comprised in the good old English word home. We could indite a panegyric on it which, however wanting in eloquence, would equal in sincerity all that the most gushing sentimentalists from Dickens down to Dr. Holland have written on the subject. But sentiment apart, it is certain that the intellectual wants of a thinking man are apt not to be satisfied within the circle of his household, even with the reinforcement of a library. The most loving and witty couple must in time exhaust each other's resources, and there are senses in which a man's children can never be his companions. Consider too the case of those unfortunates who have no homes. A state of society may indeed be imagined in which every boy marries as soon as he comes of age, and every widower as soon as he is out of mourning; we believe something of the kind does exist in portions of the West; but it is not to be looked for in a large city.

There are many things which men do not care to talk about before women. And the topics are numerous which women, however clever, are rarely fond of discussing, and more rarely qualified for discussing. To expand his intellectual self properly a man must get out of drawing-room society into some other where he can put his mind, so to speak, into shooting-coat and slippers.

But when he goes out into the mixed crowd of his fellow-citizens, he is more tongue-tied than ever. There are occasions—we have seen a few of them lately—when an American crowd is talkative and demonstrative, because the whole nation acts and speaks in it as one man; but apart from these exceptional periods, it is the last place in the world wherein to seek any kind of mental expression or development. It is brooded and shadowed over by a dim fear of that tremendous abstraction the public, sometimes reduced to the concrete of a newspaper reporter. Add to this the very uncertain manners of a large class of our population, and it is not surprising that we find among nearly all accidental assemblages a reticence and taciturnity scarcely equalled by English or Dutch exclusiveness, by Polish or Venetian distrust.

Now the club is exactly the place where a man may let out his thoughts and compare his opinions and ideas freely with those of others. He is not afraid that a bird of the air, or a beast of the earth, may carry the matter. Club men do not tell tales out of school. In this respect (as in some other important ones, such as talking to ladies and about ladies), American gentlemen are among the most honorable on earth. The composition of a club is generally such that its members have common ground enough to meet on and differences enough to argue about. And the material and food for meditation and discussion are always at hand—the chief specimens of periodic literature, native and foreign, daily, weekly, monthly, and quarterly. Few men are rich enough to buy all these; no man, however rich, would care to litter up his house with them all. Some of them he may not read once in ten numbers, but he wishes to have the chance of seeing every number. He may indeed find them at a reading room, but there he gets only a benefit of reading without talk, while at the club the latter naturally flows out of and is suggested by the former. At the same time, while the club is the place where most newspapers are read, it is the place where individual opinion is most independent of newspapers—the only place, we must say, where they are brought to their just level. Reading and comparing so many journals, club-men correct one by another, and criticize them all. Referring occasionally to the foreign article, they can better judge the weak points of the domestic. And this is no small recommendation of clubs. When we consider the immense power of the press, and its frequent abuse, it is well that there should be some circles not under its absolute dominion.

And while clubs develop the intellectual character of their members, they do so without forming petty cliques and camaraderies. The club is too large a body to be at the mercy of any one man or any few men. Mutual admiration societies do not find their origin there.

There is no lack of fancy learning and high scholarship at our clubs. The erudition of the members does not bristle out like that of Bostonians, but is hid in odd holes and corners, and flashes forth when you least expect it. You shall find a lion of the trotting turf who is an authority on mediæval Latin, and a crack billiard player who is great at annotating Virgil.

The direct political influence of our clubs is not, we believe, in proportion to their intellectual power. That tremendous agency which has left to this day such reminiscences on the European continent, that, in some places, the very name of club is forbidden by authority, does not so readily associate itself with the name in the Anglo-Saxon mind. Political bodies are more properly designated as leagues or societies; and those clubs which were distinctly instituted for political ends, however well adapted to promote their special purpose, are failures as clubs. For the essence of the club, as we understand it, is variety; that of the political league, unity.

We have said nothing of the obvious physical advantages. If an American takes his ease anywhere, it is at his club. But there is one set of mortals to whom these privileges are peculiarly grateful. Our readers may have heard of the Can't-get-away Club—a cant expression for those whom business of any kind detains to swelter in town during the whole or the greater part of our long summer. The members of this mythical body derive their chief comfort and support from the real associations to which they belong. His club is to such a man what Hector was to Andromache, "father and lady mother, brother and blooming spouse."

The picture would not be complete without some shadows. We cannot altogether pass over in silence the objections sometimes urged against clubs. Curious women are apt to suspect that something very wrong may be going on where they are not admitted. Curious donkeys are apt to think that something very wrong must be going on where they are not admitted. It is said that club life encourages dissipation of various sorts, to wit: drinking, smoking, and gambling, and generally that it disposes men to a life of selfish luxury, while their mothers and sisters are battling with Bridget or Barbara at home.

That the club men of New York are not generally aquarians may be acknowledged at once. But—terrible as is the tableau of social depravity which the admission involves—we are constrained to avow our conviction that a decided majority of all classes of Gothamites (except, perhaps, the clergy) are in the same bond of iniquity.

Of smoking there is too much at clubs—and where is there not? The artist smokes in his studio, the editor in his sanctum, the parson not unfrequently in his study, the merchant in his counting-house, the lawyer in his office, the groom at his stable-door, the out-door laborer at his work, the very soldier on parade, the model husband in the bosom of his family, and we have known cases in the best society where the wife herself smoked, in self-defence, as it were. Nothing illustrates the power of the city railroad companies better than the fact that they are able to expel the practice from the inside of their cars, some of them allow it on the platform. We may partially console ourselves with the reflection that there are people farther gone than ourselves, for (rejecting as apocryphal the stories of Dutchmen who smoke in their sleep) the Havanese light up in their opera-house during the entr'actes. Men do not learn to smoke at clubs, and the man smoking at a club annoys fewer people than he would almost anywhere else, out of doors or in.

In some cities clubs are thoroughly infected with gambling. It is emphatically so in Paris. The only American institution ever naturalized in the metropolis of pleasure was the noble game of poker—pocaire, as the Parisians call it. The manner of its introduction was curious. The growth of the evil, and the menace of legal interference, obliged the Parisian clubs to interdict games of pure chance, or in which chance largely predominated, and, as it was a mooted point what constituted a game of this description, a detailed list of the forbidden fruit was drawn up with the approval of the ubiquitous "authorities." Of course, no one thought of putting poker into the list, for nobody had ever heard of it; so, when the little stranger arrived fresh from the Western wilds, the Parisian gamblers seized on it as a god-send.

Most happily such is not our case. There is a great deal of whist and billiards played in the clubs of New York; but whist and billiards, as American gentlemen play them, are not gambling games.

As to the charge that a man is luxuriously selfish because he dines better at a club than he could do habitually in a private house or a boarding-house, we deem this a favorable opportunity for enunciating a great proposition too often lost sight of, namely, that the principle of true democracy and progress is to level up, not down; to help all along, and put none back. If through paucity of cooks and deficiency of culinary knowledge all cannot be properly fed, it is better that some should be than none. If Smith eats a better dinner at his club than his mother and sister can get at home, the remedy is not to deprive him of his good dinner, but by judicious use of M. Blot and any other attainable means, to try and provide that his mother and sister shall also dine well.

There is, however, one point in which our club life is defective; it is not sufficiently economical. In London, the city of clubs par excellence, economy is one of the first recommendations of club life. Here this essential feature has been almost lost sight of. Our oldest club has long been famous for providing its members with better and dearer dinners than Delmonico prepares. Frequently the provender department is farmed out to a restaurateur. When it is not, and also in the case of articles dispensed by the club steward, the leading idea seems to be not so much to furnish the members at cost price as to increase the finances with a view to some future expenditure. Now a man of limited means naturally desires some immediate pecuniary return for his annual dues. He does not want to pay fifty or sixty dollars annually in order that ten years hence the club may have a new building further up-town, but in order that he may breakfast and dine more cheaply, as well as more comfortably, than at a hotel. This, however, is only a natural result of national extravagance. Club life has been expensive because everything was. The taxes are giving several lessons of economy and frugality; we presume that the clubs will not be slow to learn them.

THE MARCH OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT TO WASHINGTON.

[This story has been already told, and well told, by Theodore Winthrop. The following letter, however, derives an interest of its own from the fact that it was written by another distinguished member of the regiment, then a private, Colonel Robert G. Shaw, who fell at Fort Wagner].

ANNAPOLIS, Tuesday, April 23, 1861.

DEAR ———:—You have probably received the note I wrote you from New York the day before we left. Our march down Broadway was a thing I shall never forget. The crowd and the enthusiasm were tremendous—the people would hardly let us pass, actually catching hold of our hands and slapping us on the back, yelling and screaming like wild men. At every station along the road up to 3 o'clock in the morning, we were received with cheers and booming of cannon. We went to Philadelphia by rail, and from there by the steamer Boston to this town, where we landed at 6 o'clock last night, and are quartered in the Naval School. About 800 Massachusetts men are here too, so with them and the students, making nearly 2,000 men, we can drive off any who venture to make an attack upon us here. We had beautiful weather on board—if it had been rough, we should have had a fearful time, as we were piled together like pigs on the two upper decks and in the lower cabins, filling the boat entirely. Our food was not very satisfactory, as the rations we had with us were pretty old, and the meat furnished on board was very horse-y. We were short of water at last.

When we arrived, we found the Massachusetts men all run aground by the pilot, whom they immediately put in irons and wanted to kill; he is a secessionist. They had been trying to get off for three days, and our boat got them off at last. General Butler, their commander, is an energetic, cursing and swearing old fellow. As soon as they got ashore, he sent a company into the town, took possession of the railroad station, and set his men to work laying down the rails, which had been torn up by the secessionists. He says "he'll be d——d if he's going to be stopped by a lot of Maryland men." There is an old fellow among them with ten sons, all shoemakers, who say they have "had no work for so long, they are going to lick those chaps into buying their shoes."

More than half the Massachusetts men were without water for two days, and had only two crackers per diem for some time. They are in all sorts of uniforms; they are principally fishermen from Marblehead, and shoemakers from Lynn, and look upon the men here with about as much respect as we would accord to a toad.

This is a lovely place, and the weather is magnificent. We had a parade this morning, and the "middies" had one in the afternoon. All the evening our band has been playing under the trees—we hear the national airs, and look at the "stars and stripes" with new emotions. There are about 120 midshipmen at the school, twenty or thirty Southerners having resigned. The youngest class is kept aboard the Constitution, school-ship, and the others live here. They are all dressed in dark navy-cloth, well-fitting jacket and trowsers, with pistol and sword in their belt. The dress sets off their figures very well, and they give the impression of a remarkably fine-looking body of young men. There are rumors that we start for Washington to-morrow.

WASHINGTON, April 25.

We arrived here at noon to-day, and dined in detachments at the different hotels in the city, and so had our first regular meal since leaving New York—crackers and salt-beef, in not very large quantities, having composed our rations hitherto. We had three hours' sleep on Tuesday night, and since then have not shut our eyes, having been under way from 4 P.M. Wednesday. We had to proceed very slowly, as there was so much work to be done on the railroad. Our regiment and the Massachusetts men under Butler have the honor of opening and taking possession of the Annapolis Railroad for the Government. I shall write you a detailed account soon, but am in a great hurry now, as we are just going into quarters.

April 26.

Just after writing to you at Annapolis, our company (6) got orders to fill their water-canteens, and be ready to receive three days' rations, as we were to start at 4 o'clock the next morning. We turned in to get a little sleep, but had hardly got our blankets about us when all the drums of the regiment began to beat, and our officers came rushing in and bundled us all out on to the parade-ground. All the "middies" and every man of our regiment turned out, ready for a fight, and the four howitzers were hauled up and down the brick-walks like mad. It didn't take long to get us all ready, as every one had his belt and accoutrements on. The sentinels had seen sky-rockets and heard guns in the bay and along shore, and we thought we were going to be attacked by a large force, but it turned out to be eleven steamers with New York and Rhode Island troops; so, after standing for some time under arms, we returned to our quarters in the recitation rooms all over the buildings. By this time it was nearly midnight, and the rations were ready, so we had to fall into line to receive and pack them in our provision boxes. This took an hour for our company, and we didn't lie down until 2 o'clock. We were aroused again at 4, and having everything in readiness, were soon out on the green. We then found that Company 2 and Company 6 (ours) were to start for the Junction as advance-guard, and the others were to follow at 9 A.M. We considered this a great honor, and stepped off through the town for the railroad in good spirits, waking up all the people as we went. At the station we found the Massachusetts company which had taken possession. There was an old engine out of order, and half-a-dozen cars. A man had stepped up the night before, and said he could put it in order, because he had helped to build it. It came from New England of course. Another man jumped on when it was mended, got up the steam, and in a little while we were ready to start, so we packed our knapsacks into one car, and set off in the other. The Massachusetts boys had been laying the track where it was torn up, for about a mile ahead, during the night, having in the meantime had nothing to eat, to which they appeared to have got quite accustomed, for they were almost famished on board their steamer, and some of them actually drank salt-water. When we had gone about a mile by rail, we had to get out, as the track was torn up in many places. We left our knapsacks on the train, which went back for the luggage of the rest of our men, while we trudged forward under a fearfully hot sun with muskets loaded, and cartridge-boxes full, ready for a brush at any moment. We had scouts and skirmishers all around and about us, for we had been positively assured that we should be attacked by a large body of cavalry. Not a shot was fired, however; though, as we saw principally only women and negroes, it made the reports of a body of men being assembled somewhere on the road seem true. We marched slowly along, pushing our howitzers on two baggage-cars, and stopping again and again to lay rails and make repairs on the road. A length, about 2 o'clock, we came to a halt, and waited for the main body to come up, working meantime on a bridge which had been completely broken down, helped all the while by the Massachusetts boys, with whom we divided our rations, gaining thereby their enthusiastic admiration. Neither they nor we could have got through without each other's assistance, for though they did a great deal of the labor, our officers directed the building of the bridge, etc., and we fed them from our knapsacks. They arrived at Washington the day after us, and we all (being off duty) rushed out and cheered them, and they never let us go by now without clapping and hurrahing. They are rough fellows, but of the best kind. When the rest of our men had got up to where we stopped, and we had all rested and taken a nip at our crackers and beef (six crackers and three pieces of dried beef for three days), we started off again, our two companies still in advance as scouts; but we had to wait until 6 P.M. before the bridge was mended. In the mean while we had some very nice singing, patriotic songs being preferred, and at last got our howitzers over the bridge, and trudged along under a clear sky and splendid moon. But four hours' sleep the night before and four or six a night since we left New York, had not been sufficient to keep up our strength. However, we went on and on as before, stopping every half hour and starting again, pushing and pulling our old baggage-cars sometimes up some very steep grades. Gradually, as time wore on, the men began to lie down every time we stopped, in larger and larger numbers, until at last every one who was not at work was catching a sort of a nap by the roadside. We had scouts out, as I said before, so we should have been warned in time of any enemy, but I don't believe it would have been possible to keep the men on their feet unless there had been an enemy really in sight. We actually fell asleep standing up, and scores of men would drop their pieces and just catch themselves as they were toppling over. We went through all sorts of defiles, where the Marylanders might have pounced upon us with great advantage, but though we had good evidence of their being about, from fresh tracks and newly-torn up rails, they took good care to keep well out of our way. I suppose they were frightened by our numbers, and by the fact of there being 7,000 troops on board the steamers at Annapolis. We went into several farm-houses along the road, and were treated very well. We paid for everything we got, which pleased the people amazingly, for they expected, so they told me, to be robbed. We hear now that other regiments which have come through since have acted in a different manner, shooting pigs and chickens, and taking forcible possession of what they wanted. I don't know how much of the report is true—but the people couldn't expect much else, after trying to run us off the track on the very edge of a high precipice. At daybreak, 4.30, we came to a halt about two miles from the Junction, perfectly overcome with sleep, shivering with cold, and a good many of us grumbling in quite a mutinous way. We built a dozen large fires, for the night air had gone through and through us (we had moved so slowly), and stood about them cogitating on the gloomy prospect before us. Provisions all gone; a good chance of having to march to Washington, 20 miles farther, as we heard no train had come up to the Junction for us, and the expectation of being attacked in a little while, before we could get any rest. But some of us ventured off, being well armed, and got breakfast at a farm house near. The lady of the house was a really pretty, nice woman, and though she seemed frightened at first was soon reassured, and furnished us with hoe-cake, pork, bread and butter, potatoes, coffee, tea, and milk, in abundance. This worked a wonderful change in us, and we took an entirely new view of life. Getting back to camp, we found a party had been up to the Junction, found a train ready for us, and the coast clear. The men were lying about the road and field in the most ridiculous positions, having fallen asleep where they dropped, and the air was filled with snorings in every key and of every variety. Soon we fell into line, marched two miles farther, got on to the train, and whirled on to Washington. The nodding and snoring went briskly on for an hour in the cars, and then we all turned out for a parade just as we were, covered with dust and with our blankets slung over our shoulders. We parted with the "National Rifles," a Washington company that had gone up to the Junction to meet us, and then marched straight up to the "White House" and through the grounds, where the President and family stood at the doors and saw us go by; we were then distributed at the different hotels in companies. That evening we marched up to the Capitol and were quartered in the "House of Representatives," where we each have a desk, and an easy chair to sleep in, but we generally prefer the floor and our blankets, as the last eight days' experience has accustomed us to hard beds. The Capitol is a magnificent building, and the men all take the greatest pains not to harm anything. Jeff. Davis sha'n't get it without trouble. Troops from New England are quartered all over it. We have a great deal of fun here, but I have no doubt we are the best behaved Congress that has been in session for a good while, though we were waked up this morning by cock-crows, cats, dogs, and cows all howling together. They give us our liberty about the grounds, but don't let us out often, and then only a few at a time. The lights are put out at 10. P.M., and the drums beat at 5 A.M. Those who are not waked up by the latter are soon aroused by the racket and rumpus.

April 27.

Yesterday afternoon at 3 o'clock we had a grand parade, and were all sworn into the service of the United States Government. It was a very impressive scene, as we all held up our hands and repeated the oath after the magistrate. We are Uncle Sam's men now for the next 30 days. The President stood out in front of us, looking as pleasant and kind as possible, and took off his hat when we presented arms. I couldn't help thinking of the immense responsibility he has on his shoulders as he stood there laughing and talking. We drill every morning in companies, and parade every afternoon. While we are stationed here, we take our meals at the hotels, but we shall soon go into camp, and have to take care of our own cooking.

A STRANGE STORY.*

In the form of a letter addressed to Major-General Butler, dated at New York, January 4, 1865, but only recently published, the Rev. Henry N. Hudson, chaplain of the First New York Volunteer Engineers, makes an interesting statement of facts, which we shall give partly in the words of the author and in part condense.

Before going to the seat of war in February, 1862, Mr. Hudson entered into an engagement with Mr. Godwin, of the New York Evening Post, to write for that paper. While in the Department of the South, under Generals Hunter, Mitchel, and Gillmore, he made this arrangement known to them. Soon after landing at Bermuda Hundred, in May, 1864, he informed General Butler's Provost-Marshal of his engagement with the Post, and enquired whether there were any restrictions upon or regulations concerning newspaper correspondence; understanding the Provost-Marshal to say that there were none, he continued to write for the paper under the signature "Loyalty," besides writing occasional private letters to Mr. Godwin. One of these private letters, containing an account of General Butler's defeat near Drury's Bluff, appeared in great part in the Evening Post for May 24. It was printed without any signature, the editor introducing it with "a sort of voucher for its authenticity." On the 29th of May, Mr. Hudson was ordered to New York on special duty by General Gillmore, for the purpose of superintending the publication of some official documents, the General promising to send to the publisher for Mr. Hudson instructions as to what he was to do. Having received news the night before that his son was dangerously ill, he also received permission from General Gillmore to visit his family in Massachusetts. His son died the first week in June; his wife, broken down by grief and care, was ill nearly all the summer—so ill that at one time she was hardly expected to live; he was also very much out of health himself, from the effect of a bilious intermittent fever contracted while on duty in South Carolina. No instructions came to him through the publisher, and General Gillmore being relieved of the command of the Tenth Army Corps, Mr. Hudson was no longer subject to his order.

Early in July, receiving an order from General Butler remanding him to his regiment, he called on his colonel, who happened to be in the city, to know where the headquarters were, in order to report there. Colonel Serrell replied, in effect, that he could not tell, and that the regiment was so scattered that "he did not know but he was as much the headquarters as anywhere." "The next day," Mr. Hudson says, "I learned that my wife was a good deal worse; and being somewhat perplexed as to my duty, I ventured to return to my family, where I was soon after so prostrated with illness as to be unable to travel. Owing to these causes, I was delayed from day to day, till I became discouraged, and resolved to offer my resignation. Accordingly I went to New York, and on the first of September, handed my resignation to Colonel Serrell, who said he would forward it to you [General Butler], and that he thought there was no need of my going on to the seat of war." But General Butler was evidently determined that he should return to the army, and on the 13th of September the following telegram was received in New York:

"Butler's Headquarters, Sept. 13, 1864.

"To Colonel Serrell, 57 West Washington Place:

"Find Chaplain Hudson, of your regiment, who has been ordered to report to his regiment, and has failed to obey the order. Take his parole in writing forthwith to appear at these headquarters: if he fails to give his parole, have him sent here to me under guard. Your special attention is called to the executing of this order.

(Signed) "B. F. BUTLER, Major-General."

Hastening to obey the order, Mr. Hudson reached the army on the nineteenth, and at once had an interview with the commanding general. The latter first taxed him with being absent without leave, but on hearing his explanation turned at once to another subject, the letter published in the Evening Post, before referred to, criticizing the operations near Bermuda Hundred. Apparently confident in the belief that the information contained in it had been furnished by General Gillmore, and determined to force a confession of this from Mr. Hudson, he proceeded to do so in a manner which is, to say the least, unusual in examinations of subordinate officers by their superiors; he repeatedly denounced General Gillmore as "a liar" and a "damned scoundrel," and told Mr. Hudson in one case that what he said was "a lie, sir!" "a damned lie!"

But it was impossible for Mr. Hudson to say that the information furnished him came from General Gillmore, as all the statements in his letter with regard to General Butler's defeat had been derived from Colonel Serrell and other officers of the regiment. This he stated. The interview, which must have been a long one, was closed by General Butler's ordering Mr. Hudson under arrest. He was handed over to Captain Watson, commandant of the headquarters guard, was carried to the provost guard prison, and placed in a magazine tent. The nature of this imprisonment is best described in his own words. "This was a tent nearly filled with open boxes of powder and other explosive ammunition, or what seemed such, and among the rest a considerable heap of large shell, charged, as the captain said, with Greek fire. There was little more than vacant room enough for me to lie down, and that was close beside the heap of loaded shell. The captain cautioned me not to allow a spark of fire in the tent, and especially not to disturb the shell, lest they should explode and blow me up. What may have been the motive of this warning I cannot say, but it had the effect of the most studied inhumanity: I could not help being in continual apprehension lest some unlucky step of mine should set the shell a-tumbling; but I found out afterwards that they would bear much rougher handling than I had been led to suppose."

After two days Mr. Hudson—a clergyman, be it remembered, in the service of his country, in feeble health—was carried to a guard-house, which appears to have gone by the name of the "Bull-pen," where he was confined together with rebel prisoners and the offscourings of the army, and suffered many hardships, of which the impossibility of escaping from vermin was by no means the least. "It was nearly dark when Captain Watson got me housed in the prison. The weather was more than cool; the ground in the tent was so wet as to be almost muddy, and there I was left without a rag of a blanket to put under me, or over me, and with nothing to lie on but some barrel staves, spread out on the ground. I had told the captain that I was somewhat out of health, and rather old [Mr. Hudson's age is fifty-one years] for such hardships, and had asked him to procure me a blanket or two, offering to pay for them. He said he would try to do so; I waited, but no blanket came. At last a corporal of the guard, a very civil, kind-hearted man, named Jones, managed to borrow me a single blanket, which I wrapped round my shoulders, and spent most of the night in walking to and fro over the square of ground in front of my tent, not being allowed to walk beyond it. Even at that I shivered through hour after hour till near morning, when the same gentle corporal took me out to the cook-house, and let me sit by the stove and warm myself. The corporal seemed fearful lest these deeds of charity should come to the knowledge of his officers." The return of day did not improve his condition.

He requested to have his trunk, and was told, first, that he should have it; then, that it had disappeared and had probably been reshipped down the river, a statement which he discovered afterwards to have been false; he was told that he might send unsealed letters in for examination and that they would be either forwarded to their address or returned to him; the promise was not kept; he might have found ways to supply himself with wholesome food, but he was "not allowed at first to speak with any but officers of the guard, and these were all afraid to do anything for me, or let anything be done."

Such was his treatment during the first three days after reporting at headquarters. Meanwhile, some members of his regiment received news of his situation, and soon found means of supplying several comforts of which he was much in need.

Sunday, the 25th of September, had been appointed by the President as a day of general thanksgiving for Union victories, and Mr. Hudson requested permission to hold religious services in the prison on that day. The application came back to him with the following endorsement:

"Respectfully returned. By military usage, an officer under arrest on charge cannot exercise any of the duties of his office. Such permission would be a virtual release from arrest. That your functions are of a high and sacred nature, should have made you more careful in getting under arrest for absence without leave; the penalty of which is reduction to the ranks.

(Signed) "BENJ. F. BUTLER, Major-General Commanding."

This was the first authentic notice Mr. Hudson received that he was under arrest on charges for absence without leave. Nothing of importance appears to have transpired after this until, having spent some four or five days in the bull-pen, he was visited by Colonel Serrell. "Colonel Serrell came to me, and said he had been having a long talk with you [General Butler] about me. That you disclaimed all hard feelings towards me; had no wish to injure me; desired to save me from a court-martial. That you thought I had better write out for you a statement of my case, covering the main points which had come up in our interview; as this might open the way for a settlement without a trial. That if a trial were had, it would be mainly with a view to bring out what I knew about General Gillmore; and you advised me, in that case, to plead guilty to all the charges and specifications, as I would fare better by doing so than by attempting any defence. That, as for my absence without leave, you did not consider this, in the circumstances, any great offence; while the fact of my having been all along a known and allowed correspondent of the press left you little cause against me on that score." Colonel Serrell is charged with acting, whether consciously or blindly, as General Butler's decoy. The above quotation gives the gist of what he said; the main purpose being to induce the prisoner to "come out and make a clean breast of it" with regard to General Gillmore. The means used, according to Mr. Hudson's account, were a promise on the General's part to stand his friend in case he criminated General Gillmore; an implied threat to punish him as severely as possible if he did not.

He now drew up a statement of the facts in his case, which he sent with many misgivings to General Butler. His apprehensions proved well founded. Week after week passed away, and no charges were made. Meanwhile Colonel Serrell wrote several notes, expressing a lively interest in his misfortunes, inquiring whether any progress had been made in the matter, and saying that General Butler had promised to take it up and dispose of it; but nothing came of this, and an order was issued for the removal of prisoners to a new bull-pen, six miles distant. Worn out with suffering and anxiety, Mr. Hudson was compelled to walk these six miles. The new prison proved even worse than the old one; "the enclosure being much smaller, and crowded with men of the worst description; the ground, too, being so level that it was impossible to keep my quarters from being flooded whenever there was any considerable fall of rain." "It was an uncleaned stable, the beasts having lately been taken out to make room for us men; such a place, in fact, as, at that season, no good farmer would think of keeping his cattle in." To add to the misery of such an imprisonment, Mr. Hudson was kept there from week to week, while the others were in general confined there but for a short time. That these were no fancied horrors, but real sufferings, and so considered by other men, is shown by an expression of Captain Watson's, when, some time after his release, Mr. Hudson asked if he knew that his orders had been illegal. He knew it perfectly, he said; but even protesting against the execution of orders on such grounds would have been sufficient reason for sending him to the bull-pen; and in reply to another question as to the choice between a clear conscience and such imprisonment, answered very candidly, "Oh! I don't want to be in there, anything but that!"

On the 8th of November, having been held in confinement for fifty days, he was placed in the guard-house, an improvement no doubt on the bull-pen, although the noise here was such as made sleep almost impossible. But the end of his troubles was near at hand. On the 8th inst., General Butler being absent on special duty in New York, Mr. Hudson addressed an application for release to General Terry, then in temporary command of the troops on the field, grounding his application on the fact that he had been kept a close prisoner for fifty days, and that "the law is very clear and positive that in case of any officer thus under arrest, the arrest shall cease at the end of forty-eight days." On the 10th inst., General Terry returned an answer, stating that "your arrest was made by General Butler, as commanding officer of the Department; and it would be manifestly improper for General Terry, or any one not acting as Department commander, to give any order in relation to it." On the 8th inst., however, General Butler, influenced by motives which may be guessed at, but are not known, wrote to

General Terry from New York, directing him to issue the following order:

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES, Nov. 8, 1864.

"SPECIAL ORDER No. —

"Chaplain Henry N. Hudson, having remained under arrest for some time because of the impossibility of convening a court-martial to try him, because of movements in the field, is released from close arrest, and will report to his regiment for duty; but will upon no pretence leave it."

Mr. Hudson states that notwithstanding this alleged impossibility, a court-martial was in session during a large part of the very time at army headquarters, which tried persons whose arrest was subsequent to his; and points out the incongruity of this order to report to his regiment for duty with the endorsement on his application for leave to perform service in prison, "Such permission would be a virtual release from arrest." General Terry's order, issued in pursuance of General Butler's instructions, reached him on the 11th of November, and after remaining a "sort of prisoner" in his regimental camp till the middle of December, he received orders to report in person at the Lieutenant-General's headquarters. General Grant gave him leave of absence, and he tells his readers in a postscript, that when General Butler was relieved, charges were preferred against him for the first time; that no copy was ever served on him; that although he has tried, he has never been able to find a copy; that he learns on good authority that these charges were ante-dated several days, and that on the 26th of January, his leave having expired, he returned to his regiment, where he remained till the day on which the postscript was written, still waiting to hear from General Butler.

The only criticism on the conduct of General Butler which we propose to make are the following quotations from the Articles of War and a recent Act of Congress:

Art. 77. "Whenever any officer shall be charged with a crime, he shall be arrested and confined in his barracks, quarters, or tent."

By Section 11 of an Act of Congress approved July 17, 1862, it was enacted that "whenever an officer shall be put under arrest, except at remote military posts or stations, it shall be the duty of the officer by whose orders he is arrested to see that a copy of the charges on which he has been arrested and is to be tried shall be served upon him within eight days thereafter, and that he shall be brought to trial within ten days thereafter, unless the necessities of the service prevent such trial; and then he shall be brought to trial within thirty days after the expiration of the said ten days, or the arrest shall cease: Provided, that if the copy of the charges be not served upon the arrested officer, as herein provided, the arrest shall cease."

Mr. Hudson's pamphlet is so badly written that criticism upon its literary style would be thrown away; but the facts which he states are so important, the charges he makes so grave, that General Butler will find himself obliged, if we are not much mistaken, to attempt at least a defence. The fact that our army will always be in the main a volunteer army, renders it all the more necessary that the rules formed by Congress for its government should literally be obeyed by all, high and low; the fact, too, that every case of arrest and imprisonment under martial law is likely to form a precedent, renders it necessary that no case whose legality is doubtful should be allowed to drop out of sight simply because the war is over.

PROFESSOR CLEVELAND'S SCHOOL AND HOUSEHOLD LIBRARY.

I.—A COMPENDIUM OF ENGLISH LITERATURE from Mandeville to Cowper.

II.—ENGLISH LITERATURE OF THE XIXTH CENTURY, embracing the chief authors, living and deceased, of this century.

III.—A COMPENDIUM OF AMERICAN LITERATURE, upon the same plan.

IV.—A COMPENDIUM OF CLASSICAL LITERATURE, consisting of choice extracts, translated from the best GREEK and ROMAN writers, with accounts of their works, best editions, etc., etc.

V.—THE POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN MILTON, with a LIFE, NOTES, INDEX TO THE SUBJECTS OF PARADISE LOST, and a VERBAL INDEX to all the poems.

VI.—Also, HYMNS FOR SCHOOLS, with appropriate selections from Scripture, and tunes suited to all the metres.

These books have been warmly commended by a large number of the first scholars, critics, and educators of our land, and have been introduced extensively into our high schools and colleges. The MILTON has been republished in London, and noticed in very flattering terms in many of its literary periodicals, such as the Reader, the Athenæum, the Examiner, etc.

Besides the school editions of the five first works, others in future will be published upon a finer quality of paper, and bound in various styles of beauty, for the Household Library.

VOLUME FOR 1864.

THE ANNUAL CYCLOPÆDIA
AND
Register of Important Events for the Year.

In presenting to the public a new volume of the Annual Cyclopædia, containing the record of another eventful year, no efforts have been spared to secure its completeness and accuracy, and to preserve it free from every mark of partisanship.

The work was commenced in the year 1861, and is published one volume annually, in the same style as the "New American Cyclopædia." Each volume is intended to be a Cyclopædia of the material and intellectual development of the year, and embraces the civil, military, and social affairs of all countries; important Public Documents; Biography; Statistics; Commerce; Finance; Literature; Science; Agriculture; Mechanical Industry, etc. In a word, it covers the same field as the "New American Cyclopædia," but each volume is confined to the results of its year.

The portions of each volume devoted to the United States embrace the operations of the armies, step by step and day by day, and the causes and consequences of their movements; also, their organization, numbers, and condition. The debates of Congress on all important questions; the Messages of the President, and public documents of the Government; finances; commercial and diplomatic intercourse; emancipation, peace, etc.; the internal affairs of all the States; their miliitary enterprise, industry, and prosperity.

Under Foreign Affairs, all those countries are noticed which have attracted attention during each year. Commercial interests, in all their branches, including petroleum, are discussed.

The developments of mechanical industry are shown by details of important results and inventions patented.

Those branches of natural science in which progress has been made are noticed each year, and the developments fully brought up.

The condition of the principal religious denominations, with their branches, membership, numbers, views on civil affairs, and the spread of their opinions among the nations, is presented.

The geographical explorations and discoveries are stated. The record of literature and literary progress is carefully explained. Nor is the large mortality among distinguished men overlooked.

The contents are accompanied by a most extensive and complete Index.

Price and Style of Binding of each Annual Volume, 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864.

A NEW LIFE OF CICERO.

BY WILLIAM FORSYTH, M.A., Q.C.

With 20 illustrations. Two vols. crown 8vo. Printed at the Riverside Press, on tinted and laid paper. Price $5.

The object of this work is to exhibit Cicero not merely as a Statesman and an Orator, but as he was at home in the relations of private life, as a husband, a father, a brother, and a friend. His letters are full of interesting details, which enable us to form a vivid idea of how the old Romans lived two thousand years ago; and the Biography embraces not only a History of Events, as momentous as any in the annals of the world, but a large amount of Anecdote and Gossip, which amused the generation that witnessed the downfall of the Republic.

FROUDE'S ENGLAND.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND, FROM THE
FALL OF WOLSEY TO THE DEATH OF ELIZABETH.
BY JAMES ANTHON FROUDE, M.A.,
Late Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford.
From the Fourth London Edition.

In crown 8vo volumes. Printed at the Riverside Press, on tinted and laid paper. Price $2 50 per volume. (The two first volumes ready as above. The other volumes will follow shortly).

This work has received the most favorable notices from the leading English journals, and has already passed through four editions in England. The vast amount of fresh and authentic materials which the author has brought to bear on the periods of which he writes, gives his work an interest and value beyond any previous history of the same events.

LORD DERBY'S HOMER.

THE ILIAD OF HOMER.
RENDERED INTO ENGLISH BLANK VERSE BY EDWARD, EARL OF DERBY.
From the Fifth London Edition.

Two volumes crown 8vo, on tinted and laid paper. Price $5.

"The merits of Lord Derby's translation may be summed up in one word: it is eminently attractive; it is instinct with life; it may be read with fervent interest; it is immeasurably nearer than Pope to the text of the original. . . . We think that Lord Derby's translation will not only be read, but read over and over again. . . . Lord Derby has given to England a version far more closely allied to the original, and superior to any that has yet been attempted in the blank verse of our language.—Edinburgh Review, January, 1865.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE publishing trade has rarely afforded less signs of action, even in the deepest depression of war times, than at present. The season of the year, and an unwillingness to undertake large enterprises on a falling market for labor and materials, may partly account for this seeming inaction. We believe it indeed to be more apparent than real, and that preparations are quietly making for a very active fall business campaign, though announcements yet are few; Messrs. Appleton & Co., however, hold out the promise of some good books, as Mr. Leekie's spirited and entertaining work, "The Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe," and Merivale's Boyle Lectures on the "Conversion of the Roman Empire," a necessary companion to their highly successful edition of his "History of the Emperors." Messrs. Harper seem satisfied with supplying the current demand for light reading by bringing out in rapid succession the best modern novels. They have lately commenced the introduction to American readers of the last successful English lady novelist, Miss Annie Thomas, who bids fair to rival Miss Braddon in popular favor. Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, who have done little else of late than manipulate into new shapes the papers of their magazine, have just entered earnestly into the work of supplying the best poetical literature at the cheapest possible price in their "Companion-Poets for the People," and also announce some sterling books, as Mathew Arnold's "Essays on Criticism," Grote's "Plato," and the work of a new poet—so highly praised in England—"Atalanta in Calydon," by Algernon Charles Swinburne. Messrs. C. Scribner & Co. are occupied with new editions of their successful impressions of Lord Derby's "Homer's Iliad" and Forsyth's "Life of Cicero." They have also in press the second volume of "Lange's Commentary on the New Testament," containing Mark and Luke, translated by Professor Shedd, and Dr. Philip Schaff, the editor of the series. They will also bring out this fall a work on the "Early History and Doctrine of the Christian Church," by Professor Fisher of Yale College, and "The Life of Professor Benjamin Silliman," including his diaries and correspondence with scientific men of both hemispheres from the commencement of the century. In holiday literature, requiring from its nature a lengthened preparation, there are some signs of movement. The house just mentioned, Scribner & Co., are forwarding for this purpose an illustrated edition of Burns' "Cotter's Saturday Night;" "The Book of Rubies," a beautifully printed selection of the best English amatory poetry; and "Christian Armor," an allegorical work, richly illuminated. Messrs. Bunce & Huntington are busy on "The Festival of Song," a poetical gathering of English verse, illustrated by the artists of the American National Academy; and Mr. Carleton will bring out a finely embellished edition of Drake's "Culprit Fay." These are a few of the current notes of progress that will rapidly increase on us as the season advances.

—Professor Von Sybel, the German historian of the French Revolution, a translation of whose work is announced for publication by Mr. Murray, has done good service to historical truth by detecting the forgery of two series of letters between Marie Antoinette and her mother the Empress Maria Theresa, recently edited in Paris by Count Hunolstein, and M. Feuillet de Conches. This correspondence attracted much attention and was elaborately noticed in the leading English reviews. No suspicion of its authenticity appeared to have been entertained in France. We have not met with the particulars of the investigation, but it is said that there is little doubt that the whole are mere fabrications. Since the wholesale forgeries of French memoirs, as those of Mmes. Dubarry and Crequi and M. Fouché some years since, and the more recent batch of spurious Byron, Shelley, and Keats papers in London, we have heard little of attempts at falsifying the sources of history. The universal prevalence of the critical spirit and faculty must render success in these base attempts more and more difficult.

—Thanks to the increased interest felt in things American, and the active competition of American literary agents in London, most of the original works of any consequence produced in the United States are regularly introduced among the English book trade. They generally meet with special attention from the reviews, and, it is not too much to say, are often noticed with far more critical discrimination (bating some occasional flippancy) than is exercised on them at home. The most fastidious of periodicals, the Saturday Review, finishes a genial critique of Dr. Beecher's "Autobiography," lately published by Messrs. Harper, by saying "his biography, chiefly drawn up in his own vigorous and homely language, is full of those touches which bespeak an original, hearty, and vigorously upright nature; uncouth, it is true, and lacking in the higher points of cultivation and refinement—yet winning upon us, in its honest and unaffected roughness, infinitely beyond the more artificial and ostentatious graces which are seen in the rising generation of luminaries in the religious firmament of America."

—A bibliographical monograph is now printing at the Riverside Press of Mr. Houghton that will probably exceed in accuracy and elegance of execution any work in that branch of literature yet published. It is devoted to Columbus and his writings, more especially those rarest of all typographical gems, the "Letters" descriptive of his discoveries in the western hemisphere. The author is M. Henri Harisse, a foreign "savant" naturalized among us, and conspicuous for his philological attainments. The libraries of our great book-collectors, as Messrs. Lenox, Barlow, and John Carter Brown (of Providence), have been thrown open to him with their often unique contents, and no existing source of information has been neglected. The illustrations will chiefly consist of photographs of the rare original editions, and several impressions of these letters, imperfectly known or incorrectly described by previous bibliographers, will be here ascertained and characterized with scientific accuracy. The number of copies printed of this sumptuous work will be very small, certainly not exceeding fifty; and the whole will be distributed as presents to public libraries, etc., at home and abroad. Encouraged by the success of his researches undertaken in the prosecution of the above-mentioned work, M. Harisse has also made considerable progress in a "Bibliotheca Americana Primordia," including every work on this continent printed previously to the year 1550. This will be beautifully got up with fac-similes, etc., though on a less expensive scale than the Columbus monograph—a small edition will be published by subscription through Messrs. Geo. P. Philes & Co., of Nassau Street.

—Every reader of Sydney Smith must remember his exquisitely humorous review of Waterton's "Wanderings in South America." By the last European steamer came the news of the decease of the author, "a Roman Catholic gentleman of Yorkshire, of good fortune, who, averse to passing his life at balls and assemblies, and seized at an early age with an unconquerable aversion to Piccadilly, has preferred living with Indians and monkeys in the forests of Guiana." So little had he suffered from tropical exposures, that, fifty years after the date of his wanderings, he died from the result of an accident in his eighty-fourth year. As a practical naturalist, Mr. Waterton stands high; few had so intimate a knowledge of ornithology, his favorite branch of science, and few have had equal advantages for pursuing it with the Squire of Walton Hall, his ancestral home, seated on an island in a lake which had stood a siege by the Roundheads in the days of Cromwell and the Commonwealth. Mr. Waterton's whole domain was sacred to his favorite birds. There everything that wore feathers was welcome, and might "lead unmolested lives and die of age," no gun being allowed as far as the proprietor's influence extended. To see "the earth cumbered and the winged air dark't with plumes" was his dear delight, and when his favorites submitted to the common lot, they still had value for one who was acknowledged to be "the best stuffer of birds in the world." The museum at Walton Hall is famous for its choice specimens; to some of the more ugly animals the names of prominent Protestant reformers were attached, and one gorilla was made to resemble Martin Luther! A thorough humorist—following out a favorite pursuit regardless of any obstacle—Mr. Waterton was a kindly old gentleman of almost childlike simplicity. He wrote well and vigorously. His "Wanderings" were the success of the season forty years ago, and his "Autobiography," published in connection with some sketches of natural history, is an interesting and genuine outline of a singular career.

—Inquiry is being made respecting the fate of Mr. Buckle's manuscripts by some of the admirers of that historian. It was stated by a friend and fellow-traveller, at the time of his death, that "great parts of the special History of Civilization existed ready for publication," and also that his commonplace books, with their immensely varied collections and material of all kinds for the history, were expressly left for publication by the writer, in case of the non-completion of the work. Mr. Buckle has been dead three years, but no announcement of his posthumous writings has yet been made.

—The passion for the works of the great landscape painter, J. W. M. Turner, is far from dying out in England, as many predicted it would when the writings of his great encomiast, Ruskin, began to be more soberly estimated. At the late sale of the stock of Messrs. Colnaghi, the print-sellers, a copy of Turner's "Liber Studiorum," originally published, we believe, at seven guineas, brought four hundred and fifty pounds. It was one of the finest copies known, with corrected proofs, etc., by the artist himself.

—A good illustration of the sympathetic power exerted by a common interest in a literary work was given at a political meeting at Chester, where Mr. W. H. Gladstone, son of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, recently made his début. The audience was noisy and unruly, interrupting the youthful speaker a good deal. He possessed, however, tact and perseverance; and when—commenting on the unwillingness of the opposition to allow that the prosperity of the country was attributable to the financial measures of the Government—he compared them to Job Trotter, in "Pickwick," who, when he did not wish to see Mr. Weller, "looked up the lawn and down the lawn and up to the sky and down to his boots, and everywhere but straight before him," the quotation finally won the crowd, who cried out, "Go on, my boy," and "Bravo!" in ecstasies. At the same meeting Mr. Gladstone, with unaccustomed conciseness, happily condensed and contrasted in one sentence the creed of the Liberals with that of their opponents—the one, "The principle of trust in the people, only relieved by prudence;" the other, "Mistrust in the people, only relieved by fear."

—The Rev. T. D. Maurice finds vent for his superabundant energy in various ways that a few years since would have been considered serious breaches of the clerical "proprieties." Apropos to the coming election, he has just announced a course of seven lectures "On the Representation of the People, and how it is connected with the Education of the People," to be given at the Working-men's College, in Great Ormond Street. He is understood to be in favor of the representation of ideas rather than of bare numerical majorities. Mr. Maurice's writings are almost numerous enough to form a small library, but have hitherto met with only a limited circulation in this country. One of the most important of them is his "History of Ancient and Modern Philosophy," enlarged from his contributions to the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," and since published in four volumes. He is now engaged on a further revision of it, and we believe a fine library edition of the book will be shortly issued by an American publisher.

—Mr. John Payne Collier, the well known Shakespearian critic and editor, has just made public one of the most welcome of his numerous contributions to the study of old English literature. It is entitled "A Bibliographical and Critical Account of the Rarest Books in the English Language" which, during the last fifty years, have come under the observation of this author. It is needless to say how rich the gathering must be, particularly in the departments of poetry and romance, to which Mr. Collier's attention has been chiefly directed. The preface gives some interesting autobiographical notices of his studies and pursuits from his first purchase of a really valuable old book, nearly sixty years since. From this very book, Wilson's "Art of Logic," printed by Grafton in 1551, he discovered the name and author of the first comedy in the English language; and, from that time to the present, his researches have been unintermitted in the same pleasant fields of labor, with what success is familiar to all. The patronage of the Duke of Devonshire and Lord Ellesmere, for whom he was accustomed to make purchases, gave him access to the rarest books, and "though never rich enough to collect and keep what may be called a library" himself, he has been a large book-buyer, because (and it is a curious fact in the commerce of literature), the prices of such commodities being gradually on the rise through the whole of the present century, there was no danger of the re-sale being attended with a loss. Mr. Collier's book is published in a limited edition, forming two handsome volumes, and costs nearly fifty dollars. So great is the interest felt in old English literature in this country, that we have heard hints of an American reprint at a price better adapted to the means of the majority of our students.

—A pregnant sign of the times, boding the recognition of a new power in the state, is afforded in England by the appearance of the writings of John Stuart Mill in cheap "People's Editions" on the railway book-stalls, competing with the gaudy-covered sensation novels and the penny Sunday newspapers with their highly-spiced police reports. Mr. Mill's books had hitherto been brought out in an expensive form, and their circulation must have been select rather than extensive. The price of his "Elements of Political Economy" was thirty-six shillings—the People's Edition, neatly printed and bound, is offered at five shillings, and his "Liberty" and "Representative Government" in the same proportion. Mr. Mill has lately exhibited such remarkable examples of mental vigor and energy, in his article on "Comte's Philosophy" (in the last Westminster Review) and his "Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy" (recently published by Longman), that his best friends regret the possibility of an interruption to his peculiar work that his election to Parliament would necessarily cause. It is a symptom of the increasing influence of literature that his opponent for the representation of Westminster is Mr. W. H. Smith, the mammoth newsvender of the Strand, who supplies half the kingdom with its daily intellectual provender. A reprint of Mr. Mill's work on "Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy" is announced by Wm. S. Spencer, of Boston, the publisher of the late elegant edition of his "Discussions and Dissertations," with which work it will range uniformly, in two volumes of similar size.

—Messrs. Little, Brown & Co., of Boston, will shortly add to the collection of standard English authors that have emanated from the Riverside Press "The Works of Edmund Burke," complete in twelve volumes, to be issued monthly till finished. Their large-paper edition of "The British Poets," limited to one hundred copies, is a great success. The volumes published at $1 75 each now command a premium of nearly double without any difficulty.

—The most unimaginative and exact of men are rarely exempt from the influence of some favorite illusion. The late Mr. J. R. McCulloch, the distinguished political economist, whose name is synonymous with the severity of exact science, was an indefatigable book collector of thirty years' standing. Every book in his large library was a choice copy, and a few years since he printed privately, for distribution among a few friends, a "Catalogue of a Collection of Books, the property of a Political Economist," with the singular injunction inserted in each copy, "It is particularly requested that this book be not lent, nor leave given to make extracts from it." The library was expected to be sold this season in London, but it has just been purchased entire by his friend, Lord Overstone (Jones Loyd, the late banker), for the sum of £5,000, and consequently will not be dispersed.

—"A Marvel in Literature" is the sensation heading of an advertisement in the English periodicals, and it relates to a fact worth chronicling, as showing the tendencies of the age. It is the production of a complete copy of "Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress" for ONE PENNY. It is warranted to contain every word, including a memoir of the author, also Scripture references, and a frontispiece of John Bunyan in prison. No orders are taken for less than one hundred copies. The first edition will consist of one million.

—M. Reville, a well known contributor to the Revue des Deux Mondes, and a popular rationalist preacher of Rotterdam, is about to publish a biography of Theodore Parker. The English uniform edition of Parker's Works has reached its twelfth volume. It is edited, we believe, by Miss Frances Power Cobbe. It, or a similar American impression, is much wanted in this country; but nothing is heard of any approach to it, or of the time when the often-announced posthumous works of Parker may be expected.

—The pensions to authors granted by the English Government, though commendable as testifying to a national recognition of literary merit as a claim on the public resources, are depressing to all who would see literature a self-supporting pursuit, because they show how insufficient talent and industry are to place their possessor in a fair average position in the world, such as rewards the most ordinary efforts in trade or commerce. Those last granted are not entirely free from the curious infelicity of selection that has heretofore led to singular instances of misplaced benevolence. To William Howitt, the industrious, irascible, and credulous man of letters, now given over to the wildest vagaries of spiritualism, no one would grudge £140 per annum, particularly as it will be shared by his wife, Mary Howitt, a person of much greater intellectual calibre than her husband. A pension of £100 to Mrs. Leech, the widow of the artist, seems incongruous, however, as he left property amounting, with the proceeds of the sale of his drawings, to $50,000 or $60,000, and his father (the landlord of the world-renowned London Tavern) must be a person of large means. Next comes a miserable pittance of £65 per annum to Mr. Thomas Wright, who is unquestionably the first mediæval scholar in England. Though, probably from the necessity of using his pen as a means of support, he has never concentrated his powers on any one great work, his researches are met with at every step of the most casual investigation into the ancient literature, language, and institutions of the kingdom, and it is disgraceful for the Government to offer to such a man a sum so inadequate to his acknowledged merits.

—A dictionary of the old Norse or Icelandic language has long been in preparation by Dr. Dasent, well known by his translations from the Sagas, etc. Its publication has been undertaken by the Oxford University Press, and it is rapidly reaching completion, with the co-operation of a distinguished Icelandic scholar, Mr. Gutbrande, a native of the island, who is familiar with the original sources from which the examples, etc., are drawn. It will be a great boon to philological students.

CARLYLE.*

IT is Carlyle's aim as an historian to make history amusing, or use it as a vehicle for entertaining the public with his own humors. The edification of his readers may be consulted, if it will, incidentally; but amused they must be as long as his jaded Pegasus can lift a foot or cut a caper. No writer, certainly none who addresses himself to serious topics, has half so unflagging a sense of his public; and the nervous fidget he is under never to let the grin expire upon his reader's visage, has grown upon him in his later books to such an extent as to give one an impression of real sadness. It is impossible to read a page of Frederick, at least we have found it so, without perceiving how mere a mask Frederick is of Thomas, and how completely what might have been veracious history is turned into a clothes-horse for the display of the author's threadbare theatrical wardrobe. This indeed is the secret of Carlyle's rhetorical successes and failures, that he is dramatic, not real; artistic, not intellectual; performer, not inventor. Hence his idiotic literary style, in which a boundless egotism is seen draping itself in the austerest reverence for truth. We call Carlyle's style idiotic in the strict philosophic sense of the word, as being so exclusively his own style, so studiously divorced from the speech common to men when they wish to communicate truth. The signal thing about it is manner, not matter; appearance, not substance. He uses truth not for its own sake, but for the sake of effect; and truth takes her revenge by degrading him at last into a mere unconscious Mr. Merryman, or serious circus-tumbler. For when a man perceives the universality of the Divine ends in creation he perceives at the same time that it is only his own puny self which ever contravenes those ends; and he would as much abhor, therefore, to idiotize his thought or speech or action, by laboriously stamping his own image and superscription upon them, as he would to deny in any other particular the sweet and blessed fellowship of his kind.

Things had a more hopeful look with Carlyle, we admit, at the beginning; in those early days when Mr. Emerson stood godfather to him in literary baptism, and Margaret Fuller fed his sturdy hopes with her generous benediction. You would say, in fact, remembering certain passages as late as "Past and Present" and the pamphlet on "Chartism," that Carlyle had once a lively sympathy with public progress, and a profound instinct of human equality. He did indeed dally with the divine idea long enough to suck it dry of its rhetorical juices; but then dropped it to lavish contempt upon it ever after if anybody else should pick it up and seem heartily to cherish it. He never had the least belief in society as an organic unity, as a most living though latent organizing force in history; but only as an empirical necessity of the race. He never had a conception of human brotherhood being the profoundest truth of science as well as religion, disclosing a hell in the human bosom wherever it is not allowed to reveal a heaven; but only and at most as an emotional or sentimental experience of happily endowed natures. On the contrary, he now-a-days scoffs and flings out his thoughtless heels at the bare suggestion of such a thing, much as an unbreeched tropical savage would scoff and run large at the suggestion of frozen rivers. In short, he has not the remotest conception of history as a living whole, of its totally impersonal or human issues; and consequently never summons you to meet him on any ground of objective truth, but only on that of your subjective agreements and disagreements.

We should shrink very keenly from doing any personal injustice to Carlyle. All his friends know him, and indeed all his books show him, to be a man of even a genial practical morality, an unexceptionable good neighbor, friend, and citizen. All we want to say is, that in respect to the public questions which are now soliciting examination, he is incompetent even to puerility. Probably no man connected with public affairs in England is so utterly deficient in the instinct of statesmanship, if statesmanship involve any respect for the principles of human nature; and yet he larrups Peel, Cobden, Palmerston, and the rest in his voluble pedantic way, as if he alone in all England possessed the true secret of governing. He is all the while himself a literalist of the most unqualified pattern, pinning his faith upon some futile person or other, and incapable of uttering an inspiring or even soothing word in behalf of any struggling manifestation of human hope. True, he abuses every acknowledged and every aspiring guide of the political world with such an insane relish, that many thoughtless persons, bewildered by his audacious oracles, begin timidly to count upon him as a statesman of the new order; as an intelligent herald of the new or spiritual Divine advent in human nature. But the claim is absurd. With much picturesque squinting in that direction, Carlyle has no philosophic belief of a real Divine presence and efficacy in human affairs. He feels a vague menace in his understanding that there is somewhere on high some very peremptory person or other—some huger Cromwell or more unscrupulous Bonaparte—who will infallibly have his own will in the end, simply by coercing all other wills; and he is able consequently to variegate his conversation and writing on occasion with certain devout lights and shades that seem most orthodox and pious to innocent imaginations, and would make the ghost of John Knox roll up the whites of his eyes in grateful astonishment. But that is literally all. He is an amateur prophet exclusively, having as little real resemblance to Isaiah or John, as Charlotte Cushman has to Lady Macbeth. He is a prophet "on his own hook," in the sole interest of his own irritable cuticle, without a glimmer of sympathy with the public want, or a gleam of insight into its approaching Divine relief; a harlequin in the guise of Jeremiah, who feeds you with laughter instead of tears, and puts the old prophetic sincerity out of countenance by his broad persistent winks at the bystanders.

In truth, Carlyle stands revealed at last a mere declaimer. His original stock in trade was an immense eye for color, an immense genius for scenic effects, which enabled him to seize upon every crazy, time-stained, dishonored rag that fluttered in the breeze of history, and work it into a magical tissue; but his original faculty is now outworn, and a mere trick of habit has usurped its place. He wrote in a way to surprise and take his readers captive; but his enjoyment of this power in himself was so naïve and vivacious as to end by sapping his own intellectual integrity. Artist-like, he precipitates himself upon the picturesque in character and manners wherever he finds it, and he doesn't care a jot what incidental interest his precipitancy lacerates. He has harped so successfully on one string, the importance to man of doing, and the mere dramatic effects he has produced so infatuate him, that the whole thing has tumbled off at last into a sheer insincerity, and he no longer sees any difference between doing well and doing ill. He who has best denounced a canting age has become himself its most signal illustration, since even his denunciation of the vice has succumbed to the prevalent usage, and announces itself at length a shameless cant.

This ought not, however, to be an inexplicable result. We never really hate any vice for which we ourselves have not a latent specific aptitude. We may intellectually cognize certain things to be vicious, and even denounce them on occasion with a well-bred warmth or tutored indignation. But we never feel an acute personal disgust and loathing of any vice, unless we are somewhat prone by natural temperament to indulge in it. Thackeray was preternaturally sensitive to what is called snobbery; which is the tendency now so common to be in the fashion, and ape the judgments and manners of those conventionally above us. His sensibility to that vice was so acute that one might suppose him to have been expiating here the sins it had caused him to commit in one of Dr. Beecher's outlandish pre-adamite worlds. And this, no doubt, was in a certain sense true. That is to say, some of Thackeray's ancestors had probably been atrocious examples of the vice; and as the tendency of all evil is to self-propagation, or expansion, while that of all good is to self-restraint, snobbery at last invaded the blood of his race to such an extent that some decisive purgation of it became inevitable in these expiatory sufferings of its greatest descendant. So doubtless with Carlyle. His Covenanting ancestors have had much to do with the sin that so easily besets him. Justification by faith, from having once been an honest belief, became at last so arrant a shibboleth, so unconscious a party-badge or cant, with its adherents, that unbelieving Thomas's contrary gospel of justification by work became an inevitable providential reaction in the blood of their children. Only the tendency to cant in that blood had become so established, that Thomas's gospel turns out as great an hypocrisy as the former one.

At all events this is the only hypothesis we can frame to account for Carlyle's dreary persistent fiddling, year in and year out, on the one old string, not only without any sign all the while of a fresh inspiration, but with every evidence of a perpetually decaying one. It seems to us to imply too great a waste of providential force, to suppose a man capable of hating any vice so egregiously as Carlyle appears to hate cant merely for public ends, or without a primary reference to the man's own ultimate spiritual emolument. It is reasonable to imagine that men are gifted naturally with those perceptions which will be of most avail to their permanent well-being. Without these convictions we could never have reconciled ourselves to Carlyle's remorseless rigmarole, nor ever have heard, as we fancy we still do hear, in every moan and groan of the old familiar hurdy-gurdy, a promise of eventual release to his own imprisoned spirit.

THE NOBLE SCHOOL OF FICTION.*

Mr. Henry Kingsley may be fairly described as a reduced copy of his brother. He lacks, indeed, many of his brother's gifts; especially that tone of authority which the Rev. Charles Kingsley derives from his connection with the Church and the University. He cherishes, publicly, at least, no original theory of history. He has less talent, to begin with; and less knowledge, to end with. But he is nevertheless, as perhaps indeed for these very reasons, a capital example of the pure Kingsley spirit. In him we see the famous muscular system of morality presented in its simplest form, disengaged from the factitious graces of scholarship. Our feeling for Mr. Henry Kingsley, for which under other circumstances we could not positively vouch, is almost kindled into gratitude when we consider the good service he has rendered the rising generation in divesting the name of Kingsley of its terror. As long as Mr. Charles Kingsley wrote about the age of Elizabeth and the age of Hypatia, and exercised his powerful and perverse imagination upon the Greeks of the fifth century and the Englishmen of the sixteenth, those young persons who possessed only the common-school notions of the rise of Protestantism and the fall of Paganism had nothing to depend upon during their slow convalescence from the Kingsley fever—which we take to be a malady natural to youth, like the measles or the scarlatina, leaving the subject much stronger and sounder—but a vague uncomfortable sensation of the one-sidedness of their teacher. Those persons, on the other hand, who had inquired for themselves into the manners of the Elizabethan era, discovered, what they had all along expected, that both Mr. Kingsley's Englishmen and his Spaniards, although in a certain way wonderfully life-like, were yet not the characters of history; that these persons were occupied with far other thoughts that that of posing for the confusion of the degenerate Anglo-Saxons of the present day; that they were infinitely brutal, indeed, and sentimental in their own fashion; but that this fashion was very unlike Mr. Kingsley's. There is a way of writing history which on general grounds impugns the writer's fidelity; that is, studying it with a prejudice either in favor of human nature or against it. This is the method selected by Mr. Kingsley and Mr. Carlyle. Mr. Kingsley's prejudice is, on the whole, in favor of human nature; while Mr. Carlyle's is against it. It is astonishing, however, how nearly the two writers coincide in their conclusions. When in "Two Years Ago" Mr. Charles Kingsley took up the men and women about us, he inflicted upon his cause an injury which his brother's novels have only served to aggravate. He made a very thrilling story; a story which we would advise all young persons to read, as they take a cold bath in winter time, for the sake of the "reaction;" but he forfeited his old claim to being considered a teacher. He gave us the old giants and the old cravens; but giants and cravens were found to be insufficient to the demands of the age. The age has stronger muscles and weaker nerves than Mr. Kingsley supposes.

The author of the volume before us tells us in a brief preface that his object has been to paint the conflict between love and duty in the breast of an uneducated girl, who, after a year and a half at boarding-school, "might have developed into a very noble lady." He adds that this question of the claims of duty as opposed to love is one which, "thanks to the nobleness of our women," is being continually put before us. To what women the possessive pronoun refers is left to conjecture: but judging from the fact than whenever the Messrs. Kingsley speak of the human race in general they mean their own countrymen in particular, we may safely apply it to the daughters of England. But however this may be, the question in point is one which, in spite of Mr. Kingsley's preface, and thanks to his incompetency to tell a straight story, is not put before us here. We are treated to nothing so beautiful, so simple, or so interesting. Does the author really believe that any such severe intention is discernible among his chaotic, inartistic touches? We can hardly think that he does; and yet, if he does not, his preface is inconceivably impudent. It is time that this fashion were done away with, of tacking a subject upon your story on the eve of publication. As long as Mr. Kingsley's book has a subject, what matters it whether it be outside of the story or inside? The story is composed on the plan of three-fourths of the modern popular novels. The author leaps astride of a half-broken fancy, starts off at a brisk trot (we are all familiar with the cheerful energetic colloquy or description with which these works open), and trusts to Providence for the rest. His main dependence is his command of that expedient which is known in street parlance as "collecting a crowd." He overawes the reader by the force of numbers; and in this way he is never caught solus upon the stage; for to be left alone with his audience, or even to be forced into a prolonged tête-à-tête with one of his characters, is the giant terror of the second-rate novelist. Another unfailing resource of Mr. Henry Kingsley is his intimate acquaintance with Australian life. This fact is evidently in his opinion, by itself, almost a sufficient outfit for a novelist. It is one of those rudimentary truths which cannot be too often repeated, that to write a novel it is not necessary to have been a traveller, an adventurer, a sight-seer; it is simply necessary to be an artist. Mr. Kingsley's descriptions of Australia are very pretty; but they are not half so good as those of Mr. Charles Reade, who, as far as we know, has never visited the country. We mean that they do not give the reader that vivid impression of a particular place which the genius of Mr. Reade contrives to produce. Mr. Reade went to Australia—that is, his imagination went—on purpose to compose certain chapters in "Never too Late to Mend." Mr. Kingsley went in the flesh; but Mr. Kingsley in the flesh is not equal to Mr. Reade in the spirit.

The main object of the novels of Mr. Charles Kingsley and his brother has seemed to us to be to give a strong impression of what they would call "human nobleness." Human nobleness, when we come across it in life, is a very fine thing; but it quite loses its flavor when it is made so cheap as it is made in these works. It is emphatically an occasional quality; it is not, and, with all due respect for the stalwart Englishmen of Queen Elizabeth's time and eke of Queen Victoria's, it never was the prime element of human life, nor were its headquarters at any time on the island of Great Britain. By saying it is an occasional quality, we simply mean that it is a great one, and is therefore manifested in great and exceptional moments. In the ordinary course of life it does not come into play; it is sufficiently represented by courage, modesty, industry. Let the novelist give us these virtues for what they are, and not for what no true lover of human nature would have them pretend to be, or else let him devise sublime opportunities, situations which really match the latent nobleness of the human soul. We can all of us take the outside view of magnanimity; it belongs to the poet to take the inside one. It seems to us that the sturdy and virtuous Burtons in the present tale have but a narrow scale of emotions. Mr. Kingsley would apparently have us look upon them all as heroes, which, with the best will in the world, we cannot succeed in doing. A hero is but a species of genius, a genius pro tempore. The Burtons are essentially commonplace. The best that can be said of them is that they had a good notion of their duty. It is here, as it seems to us, that praise should begin, and not, as Mr. Kingsley would have us think, that it should be content to end. The notion of duty is an excellent one to start with, but it is a poor thing to spend one's life in trying to compass. A life so spent, at any rate, is not a fit subject for an epic novel. The Burtons had none but the minor virtues—honesty, energy, and a strong family feeling. Let us do all justice to these excellent qualities, but let us not shame them by for ever speaking of them with our hats off, and a "so help me God!" The only hero in Mr. Kingsley's book is, to our perception, the villain, Sir George Hillyar. He has a spark of inspiration; he is ridden by an evil genius; he has a spirit of his own. The others, the good persons, the gentlemen and ladies, whether developed by "a year and a half at boarding-school," or still in the rough, have nothing but the old Kingsleian air noble. We are informed that they have "great souls," which on small provocation rush into their eyes and into the grasp of their hands; and they are for ever addressing each other as "old boy" and "old girl." "Is this ambition?" Has the language of friendship and of love no finer terms than these? Those who use them, we are reminded, are gentlemen in the rough. There is, in our opinion, no such thing as a gentleman in the rough. A gentleman is born of his polish.

A great French critic recently characterized Mr. Carlyle in a sentence which we are confident he did not keep for what we have called the noble school of fiction, the muscular system of morals, only because its founder was unknown to him. Carlyle, said M. Taine, "would limit the human heart to the English sentiment of duty, and the human imagination to the English sentiment of respect." It seems to us that these words admirably sum up Kingsleyism, the morality which Mr. Charles Kingsley preaches in his sermons, teaches in his wondrous lectures on history, and dramatizes in his novels, and of which his brother is a more worldly and popular representative. There is that in Mr. Charles Kingsley's tone which implies a conviction that when he has served up human nature in the way described by M. Taine, he has finally disposed of it. He has held up the English spirit to the imitation of the world. He has, indeed, held it up by the force of his great talents to the contemplation of a large number of spectators, and of certain admirable properties of this spirit he will long be regarded as one of the most graphic exponents. But he has shown, together with a great deal to admire, a great deal to reprove; and it is his damning fault (the expression is not too strong) that equally with its merits he would impose its defects wholesale upon the rest of mankind. But there is in the human heart a sentiment higher than that of duty—the sentiment of freedom; and in the human imagination a force which respects nothing but what is divine. In the muscular faith there is very little of the divine, because there is very little that is spiritual. For the same reason there is nothing but a spurious nobleness. Who would rest content with this as the last word of religious sagacity: that the ideal for human endeavor is the English gentleman?—unless, indeed, it be the English gentleman himself. To this do Mr. Charles Kingsley's teachings amount. There is, nevertheless, in his novels, and in his brother's as well, a great deal which we might call beautiful, if it were not that this word always suggests something that is true; a great deal which we must, therefore, be content to call pretty. Professor Kingsley would probably be by no means satisfied to have us call "Westward, Ho!" a pretty story; but it is pretty, nevertheless; it is, in fact, quite charming. It is written in a style which the author would himself call "noble English," and it contains many lovely descriptions of South America, which he has apparently the advantage of not having visited. How a real South America would clash with his unreal England! Mr. Henry Kingsley will never do anything so good; but if he will forget a vast number of things, and remember as many more, he may write a readable story yet. Let him forget, in the first place, that he is an English gentleman, and remember that he is a novelist. Let him forget (always in the interest of art) the eternal responsibility of the rich to the poor, which in the volume before us has spoiled two good things. And let him talk a little less about nobleness, and inquire a little more closely into its real essence. We do not desire hereby to arrest the possible flights of his imagination. On the contrary, we are sure that if he will woo human nature with the proper assiduity, he will draw from her many a sweet confession, infinitely more creditable than anything he could have fancied. Only let him not consider it necessary to his success to salute her invariably as "old girl."

WHITE'S SHAKESPEARE.*

We are glad to announce this long-expected volume as soon to issue from the press. Mr. White's Shakespearian labors are worthily concluded, and his edition of "Shakespeare's Works" completed, by this publication. The merits of Mr. White's previous labors are now established. His "Shakespeare's Scholar," which preceded his edition of the works, not only displayed a degree of scholarship highly creditable to its author, but also gave evidence of his possessing a fine critical taste and genial appreciation, as well as a fund of good common sense—that rarest and most needed qualification in a commentator. His "Notes and Introductions to the Plays" fulfilled the expectations he had thus awakened, and in England as well as in this country his edition has taken rank among the best. An editio optima of Shakespeare does not exist. Mr. White has had many competitors in the field. Knight, Collier, Halliwell, Dyce, Wright, and Aldis, to say nothing of Staunton, and in our own country of Verplanck and Hudson, have each in their respective editions exhibited special and distinguishing excellences. Each has his distinct place. The thorough critical student of the letter or the spirit of the text can spare neither. Dyce's learning in contemporary writers and his wide store of illustration, Halliwell's antiquarian researches, Collier's studies in the English drama, and his ingenious even if spurious readings, Knight's general good sense and genial spirit, the Cambridge edition's minute, laborious, and accurate labors upon the text of the plays—are all alike of value, and all together constitute a vast mass of important illustration and criticism for the true understanding of the poet. It is creditable to Mr. White that by the side of any of these recent editions his holds an even place. In certain not unimportant respects it is better than any one of them. He possesses a rare faculty of delicate and acute literary criticism and insight, combined with a hardly less rare faculty of expressing fine distinctions of thought. These valuable qualities are frequently displayed in his comment on passages of which the meaning is obscure or has been disputed, and in his longer discussions of points connected with the origin or composition of the plays. His essay on the authorship of Henry VI., in the seventh volume of his edition, is a masterpiece.

But it is not our intention to enter now on a review of his previous volumes. Coleridge said sharply, "If all that has been written on Shakespeare by Englishmen were burned we should be great gainers. Providence gave to England the greatest man that ever put on and put off mortality, and threw a sop to the envy of other nations by inflicting upon his native country the most incompetent critics." Coleridge himself did something to produce the better race of modern critics, but even now we could charitably wish that half they had written were burned. Mr. White's new volume—the inevitable labor to which his steps have been tending for years—is of a nature to confirm this wish. It makes so much that has been heretofore written henceforth useless. Here is a Life of Shakespeare, an Essay on his Genius, and an Essay on the English Drama, which supersede how many lives and essays! No man need read more about Shakespeare than this volume contains. He will find here the scanty facts concerning Shakespeare's life, and the most important inferences that are to be drawn from these facts; he will find a broad, simple, sensible estimate of Shakespeare's genius, and an interesting historical account of that drama which he perfected and of which he will always remain the consummate master.

In the absence of much knowledge, or even of much tradition, concerning Shakespeare's life, his biographers have occupied themselves with conjectures and suppositions in regard to it, till we are tempted to exclaim, "O monstrous! but one half-pennyworth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack." Mr. White treats us in this respect far better than most other writers on the subject. He has made excellent use of the materials brought together by the industrious investigations of his predecessors; he has told clearly what is known concerning Shakespeare, and has given briefly the most important inferences from this knowledge. His memoir is consequently really a useful and valuable one, and the occasional suppositions in which he indulges are not pushed to extravagance, while the inferences which he draws are marked by good sense, ingenuity, and critical acumen. The Essay toward the expression of Shakespeare's Genius is certainly one of the best essays ever written on this difficult subject. A Shakespeare is needed fully to estimate a Shakespeare; it is only by the exercise of an imagination alike penetrative and comprehensive that the genius of the great poet is to be fitly and finally analyzed. All that long labor, great love, faithful study, and unfeigned respect can avail, combined with native sense and disciplined power of expression, is accomplished in Mr. White's essay. He knows the limits of his capacity, and he attempts and pretends to nothing beyond them. There may be remarks in Coleridge which indicate profounder insight into some of the qualities of Shakespeare's genius or the modes of its display; there may be, in other critics, German or English, merits which Mr. White does not exhibit; but taken as a whole, his essay is so full of keen and just appreciation, of sound judgment, of sympathy with the prevailing attributes of the poet, that it may be read with satisfaction and profit even by those who have most deeply studied Shakespeare and are in the closest harmony with his spirit. The essay necessarily covers wide ground. Beginning with a discrimination of genius and talent, Mr. White claims justly that Shakespeare "united in himself genius in its supremest nature, and talent in its largest development." But his genius, though universal in its grasp, was English in its character. This leads to a consideration of the social conditions and of the state of the language of England during the Elizabethan era, full of interest, and showing the results of reflection and learning. Then follow remarks upon the appreciation of Shakespeare in his own country, and by his own people, in which many common errors are incidentally refuted, and the true and genuine feeling of our people for our greatest poet is shown to have been no less general than it has been constant. But we will not analyze a work the chief merits of which must escape analysis. We prefer to quote a single passage from it as an example of its tone, and as a specimen of admirable criticism:

"Every thoughtful reader of Shakespeare must see that his peculiar power as a dramatist lies in his treatment of character. The interest which distinguishes his plays, as plays, from all others, is that which centers in the personages, in their expressions of thought and emotion, and in their motives and modes of action. This was his dramatic art, and this it was in which he had neither teacher nor model. For at the time when he wrote, character, properly so called, was almost, if not quite, unknown to English literature, and but little more to that of the Latin races. In English dramatic literature Marlowe alone had attempted character, but in a style extremely coarse and rudimentary. The Italian and French novelists who preceded Shakespeare, including even Boccaccio himself, interest by mere story, by incident and sentiment. Their personages have no character. They are indeed of different kinds, good and bad, lovers, tyrants, intriguers, clowns, and gentlemen, of whom some are grave and others merry. But they are mere human formulas, not either types or individuals.

"It has been much disputed whether Shakespeare's personages are types or individuals. They are both. Those which are of his own creation are type individuals. So real are they in their individuality, so sharply outlined and completely constructed, that the men and women that we meet seem but shadows compared with them; and yet each one of them is so purged of the accidental and non-essential as to become typical, ideal. He made them so by uniting and harmonizing in them a variety of traits, all subordinated to, yet not overwhelmed by, one central, dominating trait, and by so modifying and coloring the manifestation of this trait that of itself it has individuality. Othello and Leontes are both jealous, and unreasonable in their jealousy, as all the jealous are. But the men are almost as unlike as Lear and Hamlet; and their jealousy differs almost as much as the fierce madness of the old king from the young prince's weak intellectual disorder. Iachimo and Iago are both villains, who would pitilessly ruin a wife's reputation for their selfish ends; but the former is a rude and simple villain, who seems to lack the moral sense; the latter, one who has a keen intellectual perception of that moral beauty which he neither possesses nor heartily admires. Shakespeare's personages are thoroughly human, and therefore not embodiments of single traits or simple impulses, but complicated machines; and the higher their type, the more complex their organization. He combines in one individual and harmonizes qualities apparently incongruous, his genius revealing to him their affinities. * * *

"It is this complication of motive which causes the characters of Shakespeare's personages to be read differently by different people. This variety of opinion upon them, within certain wide and well-determined limits, is evidence of the truthfulness of the characters. Not only does their complex organization give opportunity for a different appreciation of their working, but, as in real life, the character, nay, the very age, of those who pass judgment upon them is an element of their reputation. Not only will two men of equal natural capacity, and equally thoughtful, form different opinions of them; but the judgment of the same man will be modified by his experience. Unlike the personages of the world around us, some of whom pass from our sight while others come forward, and all change with the lapse of time, those of Shakespeare's microcosm, by the conditions of their existence, remain the same. But our view of them is enlarged and modified by advancing years. As we grow older, we look upon them from a higher point, and the horizon of our sympathy broadens. We lose little and we gain much. For manhood's eye, ranging over its wider scope, finds that the eminences which were the boy's bounds of admiration do not pass out of sight, but become parts of a grander and more varied prospect, while distance, in diminishing their importance, casts upon them the tender light of that happy memory which ever lingers upon pure and early pleasures. But, as in real life again, Shakespeare's characters, during their mimic existence, depend upon and develop each the other. We see how they are mutually worked upon and moulded. And in this inter-dependence and reciprocal influence, more than in mere structure of plot, consists the unity of Shakespeare's plays as organic wholes. His personages are not statuesque, with sharp, unchanging outlines. His genius was not severe and statuesque, as for instance Dante's was. His men and women are notably flexile; and not only so, but they seem to have that quality of flesh and blood which unites changeableness with identity—as a man's substance changes, and his soul grows older, year by year, and yet he is the same person. It is not only the story in Shakespeare's dramas which makes progress, but the characters of the personages. Lear, Romeo, Macbeth, Othello, are, as the phrase is, not the same men at the end of the play as at the beginning. Their experience has modified their characters."

It is impossible, within the compass of a brief notice like this, to do more than speak of the general characteristics of such a volume as the one before us. There are points on which we would gladly enter at length. A writer on Shakespeare is using the materials of all men's thoughts. Each man may bring something from the stores, however scanty, of his own experience and observation to illustrate the subject. To every man Shakespeare is like nature, presenting new aspects original as the man himself, originating indeed within himself. His genius embraces all others, sympathizes with all others, reveals all others to themselves, and gives them the measure of their worth. We all owe thanks to Mr. White for having done so much to promote the intelligent study of Shakespeare in America.

MATHEW ARNOLD'S ESSAYS.*

To readers who now first make the acquaintance of Mr. Arnold in this charming volume, our first word will be a warning not to commence with the preface. It will be imperfectly understood by persons who are not familiar with the London journals, and it will not give aright the "note"—to use one of the felicitous expressions to which Mr. Arnold has given currency—of the writer. Those who have followed this series of essays as they have appeared, with the exception of the lectures on translating Homer, from time to time in Fraser's, Macmillan's, the Cornhill, and the Victoria magazines, and the National Review, must have learned, in the profit and pleasure they have received, to bear with Mr. Arnold when the "vivacity" of which he is conscious lapses, as in this preface, into flippancy—to use no stronger term. No one has done more by persuasive precept, and by the still more persuasive charm of fascinating example, to commend urbanity of style; and we should show that we had failed to profit by his own excellent teachings, if we failed regretfully to note the blemish, or, having noted it, to pass it by. But we are unwilling that Mr. Arnold should do himself the injustice of making his first impression upon the reader by the petulance of his preface, tempered though the impression would be by the gracefulness of his admirable characterization of Lord Derby's translation of the Iliad, and by the filial tenderness of the apostrophe to Oxford with which it closes.

Mr. Mathew Arnold, who is the eldest son of the late Dr. Arnold of Rugby, and about forty-two years of age, achieved his first distinction as a poet, like the French critic whom he delights to acknowledge as his master in criticism, M. Sainte-Beuve. The volume in which he collected such of hise arlier published poems as his maturer judgment approved, was republished some eight years ago by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields. Since that time he has published a tragedy, Merope, in the style of the Greek tragedies; and has written a few verses for the magazines. This is not the occasion to discuss his merits as a poet; and we will only say in passing that we hold him fully entitled to a third place with Tennyson and Browning, although the saturation of his mind with the spirit of the Greek poets—especially the tragedians—a taste it will be remembered which his father, whose delight was in the matter rather than in the form of the ancients, did not possess in any high degree—has given a less popular character to his poetical style. To the preface, however, of the volume of poems just mentioned, it is not out of place to refer. It was written in 1853, and exhibits the same turn of thought, the same qualities of style, as the essays of the present volume. His thesis is the superiority in point of form of the Greek mode of handling a poetical subject over that of the moderns; in that the Greeks found the merit of a poem pre-eminently in the effect which it produced as a whole, and valued affluence of thought or beauty of diction simply as means, when these were proper means, to heighten this single effect of the practical action or situation. Ut pictura poesis. To their artistic nature it would have been no less a fault in a poem than in a painting that the mind was distracted from the general effect by any unseasonable merit of detail, though that merit might be recognized to be absolutely very great. Now we may confess at once that this austerity of taste, which is the more wonderful as it sprang from the richest sensuousness of nature, has passed away beyond recall with the race in which it was revealed. It is alien to all our modern habits of thought; and most of us can attain only by discipline to a capacity even to enjoy that beauty of form, as distinct from matter, which to the Greek would have seemed essential to any æsthetic enjoyment at all. Even that nation which in its literature has preserved most faithfully the letter of the old tradition—yes, and in its prose the spirit of Attic simplicity—even French straitness of taste in poetry is yielding before the more adequate expression of the more varied cravings of the imagination in us moderns, which is furnished in the poetical literature of England and Germany. But precisely because the tide sets, by a law as irresistible and as much above criticism as the law of gravitation, steadily in the opposite direction—precisely for this reason should we be grateful, patient, thoughtful listeners to those critics who, like Mr. Arnold, with a keener sensibility than ourselves to the immortal charm of Greek simplicity, appeal to us not to be so dazzled by the wealth of our greatly richer modern experience as to forget that in the world of ideas, as in this marvellous world of sense, to the clear spirit the most satisfying charm is found in the perception of symmetry and order.

In 1857 Mr. Arnold was appointed Professor of Poetry at Oxford. Of his teachings from that chair the public have as yet received nothing but the lectures "on translating Homer," which were published about four years ago, and have been judiciously incorporated into the present volume. The notices of the many translations of Homer which have appeared within a few years in England, and the discussions, chiefly in connexion with these, of the possibility of naturalizing the dactylic hexameter in our English tongue, in all of which Mr. Arnold's name is first in the mouth both of friend and foe, must have made the merit of these lectures familiar to all who take an interest in such topics. We shall, therefore, pass them over with one word of especial commendation for the "Last Words." In spite of an occasionally supercilious tone, which we should have been glad to spare, rather for the sake of Mr. Arnold than his opponent Mr. Newman—for with all Mr. Newman's admirable qualities and accomplishments as a scholar and a man, he never writes or speaks on any subject, and he has written well upon almost all, without betraying a want of balance of mind which irresistibly begets impatience—in spite, we say, of a shade of superciliousness which we could have wished away from the critic's otherwise exquisite banter, we think this lecture a master-piece of criticism of the kind, and have returned to it again and again with fresh profit. It is noticeable that in controversy Mr. Arnold always appears to the best advantage when put upon the defensive—for we are resolved to forget the guerrilla warfare of the preface of which we have spoken. At no other time is the literary athlete so cool, so courteous, or so dangerous. This was well exemplified in the second of two essays published in Macmillan, which, for reasons creditable to him, he now omits to publish. He had sharply criticized in the first the famous book of Dr. Colenso upon the Pentateuch, and had been met not only by equally sharp rejoinders, but also by reproaches for having done what in him lay to weaken the influence of a brother liberal. We mention the controversy not merely for the merit of the reply, but because, without a knowledge of it, some remarks in the present volume might be obscure. We have no doubt, however, that his criticism on Dr. Colenso seriously impaired Mr. Arnold's influence. It required a fair degree of that charity which thinketh no evil, or much acquaintance with the true spirit of Mr. Arnold's other writings, to guard against the impression that the essay was calculated to leave, that not only were "the children of light" alone qualified at present by their range of ideas to follow step by step the processes of Biblical criticism without detriment to infinitely higher spiritual interests, but also that he took delight in the existence of a limited caste of illuminati, and regarded the ignorance of the bulk of his fellows with the same scornful complacency that Atticus might have felt for the wholesome superstition of his less enlightened countrymen. No greater injustice could be done, we are sure, to the son of Dr. Arnold. No one could entertain such an idea for a moment after reflecting upon his labors for the improvement both of primary and secondary education in England. This volume too contains the sufficient refutation of such an idea in the distinction—to him a vital distinction, and vital, we will venture to add, to all of us who are not blinded to what the world really is by the impatience of our desire to make it what it should be—the distinction between the world of ideas and the world of practice. Still more indicative of Mr. Arnold's spirit is this earnest advocacy of the elevation in character, and reduction in expense, of middle-class education which forms the burden of the essays on "A French Eton" with which this volume closes, and which show clearly how confidently he relies for the stability of England's greatness upon the future of classes which he now reckons among the flower of the host of the Philistines. For the misconception of his essay, however, Mr. Arnold must bear the blame. No man can be more fairly held responsible for the impression which his writings make; for no man has mastered more completely the difficult art of writing with perfect clearness as well as exquisite grace.

But who are the "Philistines," and who are "the children of light?" The children of light are those choice spirits whose minds are ever disinterestedly open to every new aspect of truth; who are penetrated by a noble curiosity to see all things as they really are; who are ready, nay glad, to dismiss their error or their imperfect truth, though it had become endeared to them as a sister or a brother, and to take to their hearts the more perfect truth, against which they had perhaps fought manfully, until their eyes had been opened to recognize the goddess. In the intellectual as in the spiritual world, to such as thus enter in with the spirit of little children, and not to the Scribes and Pharisees, will it be given to know and to judge all things. Thus to know, thus to judge, and in this spirit to commend to others that which we ourselves have seen, would be Mr. Arnold's definition of criticism. In so far as a man finds delight in ideas for their own sake; in so far as he keeps a hospitable mind towards all truths, come whence they may, which pass, or can be brought to, his door—just so far is he a child of the light. In so far as a man takes no pleasure in ideas for their own sake; in so far as he inhospitably closes his door against any truth because it comes from this or that quarter, or because its presence would interfere with his comfort or his plans, or be for any reason distasteful to him—just so far would Mr. Arnold say that his heart was with the Philistines. It is plain from this, and it will be seen still more plainly in these essays, that it is not a man's creed or his opinions upon any subject, but the spirit in which he holds them, which determines in which of the two camps he belongs. He may be as conservative as Sir Cornewall Lewis, and yet be a very angel of light; he may be as radical as Mr. Cobbett in politics, and still be as Heine found him and Mr. Arnold describes him, "a Philistine with six fingers on every hand, and on every foot six toes, four-and-twenty in number; a Philistine, the staff of whose spear is like a weaver's beam." He may walk in the ways of Mr. Holyoak, and still be a worshipper of Dagon; and he may be Dean of Westminster or St. Paul's, and yet a priest among the children of light.

We have said that Mr. Arnold uses the word criticism in a sense of his own. It is the business of criticism, he says, "in all branches of knowledge, theology, philosophy, history, art, science, to see the object as in itself it really is." Again, criticism is the exercise of curiosity in the higher sense, "the disinterested love of a free play of the mind upon all subjects, for its own sake." "All literature," again he says, is in "end and aim a criticism upon life." And yet once more: "Judging is often spoken of as the critic's one business; and so in some sense it is; but the judgment which almost insensibly forms itself in a fair and clear mind, along with fresh knowledge, is the valuable one; and thus knowledge, and ever fresh knowledge, must be the critic's great concern for himself; and it is by communicating fresh knowledge, and letting his own judgment pass along with it—but insensibly, and in the second place, not the first, as a sort of companion and clew, not as an abstract lawgiver—that he will generally do most good to his readers." This passage gives the key-note of all his criticism.

Coupling these views of the true functions of criticism with the conception, ever present in his mind, of the bulk of his countrymen as Philistines, blindly and obstinately adhering to a worship that cannot elevate them, we shall be in a position to do more justice, we believe, to Mr. Arnold's aims and aspirations than he commonly receives in England. No man has less the air and tone of a missionary or reformer; and yet we doubt whether Dr. Arnold ever had more distinctly before his mind the changes which he wished to bring about in English thought and practice than has his son; or whether he ever pursued them more steadfastly, or with more definite apprehension of the bearing of his action. The father, as the foremost representative of certain powerful currents of ideas, though he died hardly five years older than his son to-day, wrought so great a change in the condition of the public schools, in the methods of studying the classics and history, and in Biblical criticism, that it is difficult to realize it. If the son has less weight of character, and a more difficult revolution to accomplish, yet he too has, we believe, the main current with him, and peculiar gifts to qualify him for his mission.

Of these gifts, and of the separate essays of which this volume is made up, we shall say but a few words. The essays were printed, as we have mentioned, originally in a variety of magazines, with an evident purpose to leaven with his own spirit as large a circle of readers as possible. The subjects on which he wrote were chosen, it seems to us, no less carefully to recommend types of excellence and modes of thought with which his countrymen at large were unfamiliar, or to which they failed to do justice. But we must leave our readers to pass judgment upon this point for themselves. Of the execution of the essays it would be superfluous to say anything in praise. Mr. Arnold has heard many hard words; but none have denied the magical charm of his style, the subtlety of his criticism, or the generous breadth of the culture by which he has schooled to a sympathetic relish for the most varied forms of excellence a taste naturally, we should conjecture, fastidious to a fault. Not that we think that he has attained a perfect serenity of perception—for is not the utilitarian philosophy to him still unduly a stumbling-block?—nor has he yet reached the mellowness of literary temper of our own Mr. Emerson; but nothing in this volume seems to us so admirable in itself, or as example so much to be desired in our day—in which liberality of thought by no means keeps pace with liberal ideas—as that "disinterestedness" of criticism which will not forget the merits of Burke in its sympathy with the democratic principle of the French Revolution; nor the power of the older form of faith in its adhesion to the Protestant spirit; nor yet the elements of beauty and nobility in the joyous religion of the Greeks, and the stoical morality of the Roman, while it surrenders itself to that higher spirituality whose laws of liberty and love are the laws of criticism as the laws of life. When this is the spirit which an author exhibits, and this the spirit that he stimulates, we could pardon him if he forgot, as Mr. Arnold never forgets, the maxim of Joubert, that "ignorance, which in matters of morals extenuates the crime, is itself, in matters of literature, a crime of the first order." We may not always agree with Mr. Arnold. We may think he fails to do complete justice to Shelley, admirable as is his appreciation of him. We may doubt whether a certain English soundness of understanding will not give Lord Macaulay, in spite of the absence of all "distinction" of talent, a longer term of "that life of the dead which rests in the remembrance of the living," than Mr. Arnold anticipates for him. We may question whether his explanation is correct of that "provinciality" of the morality of Addison which in itself we cannot question. But whatever such questions we may be tempted to raise—and it is a chief merit of Mr. Arnold's writings that it stimulates us to raise them—we feel strongly that there is not a judgment expressed in this volume, however casually, to which the reader will not find it profitable to turn again and again, whether he agrees with it or not. One remark more. Mr. Arnold's views upon any point, like those of his great exemplar, M. Sainte-Beuve, from the very nature of their common method, are to be fairly obtained and fairly judged only by the collocation and comparison of all that he says upon all occasions. In this noble curiosity to see all things exactly as they are, both of these critics delight to return upon themselves, and in a different mood, or with greater light, to catch an outline or a shade which they had missed before.

But our aim has not been so much to dwell upon the literary qualities of Mr. Arnold's criticism, as to show, if we were able, how his rare gifts and acquisitions were at the conscious service of a truly noble purpose, of a desire to share with his fellows the pleasures of a higher and richer intellectual life; and an earnest longing that his countrymen should become the children of the intellectual promise, as they have eaten of the manna of political liberty, and enjoy in unstinted measure the milk and honey of material success.

Fine Arts.

THE FORTIETH ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

[First Notice.]

It is one day after the closing of this exhibition that the first number of The Nation appears. The pictures and drawings and works of sculpture return to their former owners, or are transferred to those who have bought them during the exhibition; all, or nearly all, are lost to the sight of the public. We labor under the great disadvantage, in speaking of them, that we cannot point to the works of art themselves and ask our readers to consider, in their presence, our conclusions in respect to them, but are compelled to appeal to the memory only. We shall, therefore, make no attempt to criticize the works of all, or even of a large proportion, of the artists represented. Our business is rather with the lessons taught by the exhibition as a unit than with the relative importance in that exhibition of any individual work of art whatever.

It is plain that we have been able to learn something from the exhibition of the present state of American art, its achievements and its needs. It is of this that we wish to speak, and it is with this in view that we shall discuss those works of art which will probably have left the distinctest images on the memories of those who have seen them.

The exhibition of this year has been more useful than any of those which have preceded it. This singular usefulness has not been due largely to the greater merit of the works of art composing it. Former exhibitions have been of higher character, in proportion to the number of works exhibited, than this. But this year the collection has attracted an unusual amount of attention, and has created an unusual amount of thought on subjects connected with art.

The principal causes of this improvement are two. The first is the rapidly-growing interest in art and artists and artistic pursuits in general, which is an important element in the present intellectual condition of the people. The second is the special attention called to this exhibition by the favorable auspices under which it opened. It is housed in the new galleries of the Academy of Design, within the beautiful building which the citizens of New York have presented to that association. This building has received from the public the attention it deserves, and even some part of the praise which it deserves, and its fame has drawn many persons to see these pictures who but seldom take pains to visit works of art. The interest in art shown by the influential persons who have contributed to the erection of the building, has ensured a further interest in art among the people at large. The quick-turning vane of the periodical press has pointed out this fact. The journals have contributed to the success of this year's exhibition a vast deal of criticism. Not only have the leading daily newspapers devoted to the discussion of this subject as much of their space as in former years, and more than in former years of their intelligence; the semi-literary weeklies have also added their voices, and even the ultra-popular journals from which no one would have expected any judgment, however shallow, on matters of painting and sculpture, have shown a disposition to discriminate between praise and blame, and to award with a certain carefulness to each artist his share of each. The people seem to have read these critical articles, and to have profited by them, so far as there has been any profit in them. Of the visitors to the exhibition many had evidently read, before coming, the published articles on it, and were disposed to compare the strictures of the writers with the works of art themselves. The discussion about individual pictures grew to be popular, and was heard everywhere. The new building and the new galleries, and the collection in them, have been a subject for general and interested conversation, both within and without the city of New York, in those circles of society where intellectual matters are considered and discussed at all.

The effect of all this has been beneficial. It is very true that the discussion has not often been very intelligent. We are ready to admit that there is in the community very little experience of art, and still less theoretical knowledge of it, and that but few of the critics understand their chosen business. But, on the whole, the people and critics have done each other good, and gained something, both in knowledge and in love of art, since the fortieth exhibition opened. With no desire to claim for the community any profound judgment of what it has, or any accurate knowledge of what it lacks, in matters of art, we think it has shown natural feelings keen enough and brains clear enough to gain, rather than to lose, by consultation with itself.

The uninstructed in art are not the worst judges nor the most hopelessly mistaken. These are the misinstructed, the educated of the schools and of tradition, the taught who have not thought. Our people are free enough from any such misleading. They do not understand the cant terms of collectors. They have little regard for those academical excellences which delight connoisseurs. They are not much taught; and, if they learn anything about art, it is generally by their own observation and thinking. The tendency, therefore, of such a general discussion as that of the past two months is not to befog and mislead, as it assuredly would be if the discutors were more versed in the ways of dilettanti, but rather to clear away delusions.

It is evident that our people refuse to look upon art as a thing apart from their daily life, to be speculated upon rather than enjoyed. It is evident that they do not desire for themselves, nor value when they meet it, an art which appeals to metaphysical subtlety, embodying theories rather than relating facts, and requiring a peculiar disposition and training in the mind that would comprehend it. They want to see painted the things they love. They sadly misjudge and utterly disregard the painting of things unfamiliar to them, failing to see any good in that which is strange, but they value the representation of things they understand.

So highly do they value the representation of things they understand, that they are apt to overrate, at first, the work of any man who seems to them to aim at such representation. Americans have had but little chance to become familiar with really powerful and wholly faithful work. But little of the highest and best art, either ancient or modern, has ever been shown to them, and that little not very publicly nor for a long time. They have but little idea of what can be done in art, or of what it is well to do. They are apt, therefore, to accept an artist at his own or his friends' valuation, if they sympathize at all with his apparent or avowed aims. These mistakes, however, they seem able to outgrow gradually. They seem to have the power of forming, sooner or later, a tolerably correct estimate of all such art as is, in its nature, useful and agreeable to them. We say "they seem," for as yet they have fairly and thoroughly outgrown none, or at best but a few, of the most untenable of their early delusions, and it is not established beyond the possibility of doubt that they have the power of judging rightly of art. That they have it will, however, be the conclusion of any one who looks at the subject in the light of the experience of the past few years.

It is interesting to mark the progress of popular education by comparing the past and the present estimates of the same artist's work. There is, perhaps, no easier or surer way of marking such progress. Consider, for instance, the case of one very popular painter. Three years ago he would have been a bold critic who should have questioned Mr. Bierstadt's claim to the possession of great technical skill, of great power of conception, of "genius" of many sorts and "talent" of the highest order. Such questioning there was, but it was not printed in popular or widely circulated journals, nor generally heard among the people. This year his work has been vigorously and even rudely criticized, even in quarters where a desire is to be detected to echo as far as possible the popular voice in matters relating to art. This change is not to be explained by the supposition that he painted once better than now, for it is not his this year's work only that is roughly handled by the critics. The artist's work, past and present, his method of work, his insight into nature, his color, his drawing, his "handling," his "composition," have each and all been declared bad, or faulty, or weak, by those who once found all these things true and good.

We have spoken of this change as indicating progress in the popular knowledge of art. It is certainly advance and not retrogression that it shows. The newly gained power of seeing something of the weakness, want of meaning, and disregard of truth in these huge and pretentious canvasses, is very valuable, and the possession of this power will surely give more.

Mr. Bierstadt has only two pictures in the present exhibition. The larger, which is also the largest picture in the exhibition, a huge landscape, ten feet long, is entitled "Looking Down the Yo Semite Valley, Cal.," and numbered 436. It occupies precisely the best place in the galleries, the middle of the side of the largest and best lighted room of all; evidently ranking as the most important picture of the exhibition in the estimation of the hanging committee.

We look for miles down the valley between the high cliffs. How high the cliffs are we know. How long the visible part of the valley is, we can infer. No one is ignorant of the stupendous grandeur of the scenery which makes up this wonder of our continent. But here in the picture is no grandeur, no distance, no height. The scale is small, it seems that the largest cliffs are those represented; we know that these cliffs are from sixteen hundred to three thousand feet of nearly vertical height; but it is certain that there is no such height shown in the picture. The Yo Semite Valley would be nothing to us, if it looked like this. A faithful portrait of the Castle and Crag of Drachenfels or of Anthony's Nose, either of them steep hills, would be more impressive than this rendering of the greatest precipices yet discovered.

The picture is consistent in its representations of fact, for the rock of which these dwarfed giants are shown to be composed is friable and crumbly, liable to break and split irregularly, and very sandy in its surface. Large masses of this substance lie in the near foreground, and the texture of the surface is there seen to be almost exactly like that of the trunks of the larger trees. Surely we are not called on to believe that the granite of which these walls are built up, two thousand feet of clear vertical height, looked to Mr. Bierstadt as this in the picture looks to the beholder.

We desire not to carry too far any comparison between the picture and nature, for there is no doubt that the painter would refuse to meet the critic on this issue, as one which he had never contemplated. Nor do we enquire now whether Mr. Bierstadt is unable or unwilling to draw rocks. But there is a question between the picture and the Yo Semite Valley. Were we to judge the valley from the picture, it would be cruelly disappointing. But, judging Yo Semite by other means, for instance, by the large photographs so well known and so common, it is the picture that suffers and not the valley. The photographs have not been of the first order of excellence, but the most obscure of them gives more sense of vastness, the dimmest more knowledge of the look of the hard, smooth, granite wall, the least clear more sense of tree growth and form.

Now it is fashionable to assume that a natural fact may be rightly drawn and colored and true externally, and yet not right in spirit and meaning. This, of course, is only a façon de parler, doing mischief because misleading the ignorant. The soul of nature is seen in the outside of nature; if not there—where else? If a rock be well drawn and well painted, can the representation be improved except by still better drawing and painting? Not so. The best rendering of the appearance of any phenomenon of nature will be the best picture of it. In dealing with the wonders of the Yo Semite, the office of the painter will always be this—to represent the rocks as they are and the trees as they are in color and form, not approximately, but exactly, in the minutest details; then, if you feel that by a bringing together on your canvas of more views than one, you can the more impress the momentary beholder with the great truth which you have been a month in seeing, have your way. But no untruth, no stopping short of the truth, no misinforming the trusting people at home. It is on this account that we hold the painting of such pictures as this before us an inexcusable offence. Nothing is wrong but the drawing and painting; but these wrong, all is wrong. It seems sad and mortifying to us that a painter should take that far journey and spend "seven weeks in the great Yo Semite," and that we should learn nothing of it—all because of downright bad drawing.

There is even worse drawing than this in No. 472, "The Golden Gate, Cal." Our space fails us, and we can only remind the reader of those jellied waves, thick and opaque at the edges, and foamless, falling about without direction, or tending anywhither; of those feebly drawn vessels, wrong, of course, in every line, but not attracting much notice to their wrongness; of the ghastly greenish light which pervades the wide scene of water and land, and has reduced the black hulls and the white sails to the same dead, unnatural, and ugly hue. The color of both pictures is very untrue and unpleasant, and, although there is one of nature's beautiful effects of mist just hinted at in the larger picture, the bad color and the formless clouds deprive it of any power.

These pictures leave upon the mind of the beholder an impression, so strong that it can hardly fail to be a true impression, that they have been painted without any desire to represent nature truly, or to tell the beholder anything worthy of his notice. It is not a harsh judgment, and certainly not a hasty judgment, of them to say that they are not true art at all, but rather as untrue and unhealthy as art can be, having no apparent meaning beyond the bid for popular applause which they certainly make. This is a bid which for a time is taken. Popular applause has always rewarded for a time such bold and unhesitating seekers for it. The applauders are as much to blame as the artist; they have no plea to offer for themselves which will excuse the terrible harm they are doing to art. The artist can urge a desire to catch the popular eye and win the popular voice, meaning, perhaps, to do his work more truly when he has succeeded. His mistake is final, and his own and the world's losses are not to be made good, but he has this excuse. The applauders have none beyond base ignorance or thoughtlessness, which no law, divine or human, allows in mitigation of its penalties.

It is strange that when we find a thoroughly bad or unsuccessful picture that the matter with it proves to be bad drawing. Whatever on ultimate analysis proves to be the cause of failure, the immediate cause has been bad drawing. It is a strange Nemesis that waits behind the painter, and punishes him if he lack a noble aim or espouse an unworthy cause by paralyzing his hand and dimming his eye. In the case before us, whatever is wrong behind the bad drawing, the bad drawing is the visible cause of defeat. Nothing is even tolerably drawn—neither rocks, nor trees, nor clouds, nor waves, nor ships. If this were different, if with the other two prominent faults of these pictures the drawing in both were good, from bad work they would become valuable and beautiful.

Now it happens that no one can turn away from the great Yo Semite picture without seeing a precipitous cliff of rocks, which is very well drawn indeed. There is no such drawing of rocks anywhere in these galleries as in Mr. A. W. Warren's small picture, No. 420, "Study of Rocks, Mount Desert." Here is nothing friable and soft that should be crystalline and hard. The picture might be called "adamant." The edges are sharp and hard, the surfaces smooth and hard, the whole cliff jagged, angular, and hard. This is the very water-worn granite which we all have slipped on and bruised ourselves against along the rock-bound New England coast. The color also is true and bright, as varied even as that of the rock itself, and almost as vivid, and the water that wells up against it is blue and liquid.

Here, then, is a picture which seems to have been painted in the wish to state truly some very important facts which have not before been so well stated. It is not necessary for us to demonstrate at this late day that this is the true aim for our painters. Let every one hereafter who hears of a picture by Warren go far to see it. We shall be disappointed if he ever hereafter should paint a picture that is not instructive and worthy.

Mr. Griswold has a very beautiful landscape on the walls of this same gallery, a very interesting picture and one that has attracted much attention. Here, in the pleasure this picture has given the people and the good words it has won from the critics, we see another proof of the usefulness of this year's exhibition. For Mr. Griswold had in the last exhibition of the Academy of Design a picture nearly as good as this, as good in all respects save one, and it was very little noticed. It is true that last year's picture was sold, if we rightly remember, and that this year's has not been sold, if we are rightly informed. But this year's picture is larger and certainly twice the cost of that, and, moreover, there was such an anxiety to invest money last spring, in pictures as in all other kinds of property, that this spring brings with it its reaction, and nobody is willing to buy. Very few pictures have been sold on the walls of the Academy this year.

Mr. Griswold's picture is No. 411, "A Winter Morning." The rising sun has just tinged red the top of a hill in the centre of the picture and beyond a still river. On this side of the river is a rocky country covered with frosted grass and overgrown with cedars, a little oak carries its dry leaves gallantly in emulation of the evergreens, and the faces of rock are covered thick with lichens.

Of all our landscape painters, Mr. Griswold shows, by his work, the largest gift of that inborn faculty of "composition" which is so much talked of and so seldom seen. He finds the beautiful groups; the graceful lines grow into a new grace, and the harsh ones disappear, while he looks; the cedars grow, naturally and of their own will, just where he wants them. Another gift he has, that of feeling for color: not of true perception of it—he has never, to our knowledge, painted the true green of nature, for instance—but of feeling for color harmonies. In last year's picture, "December," what a splendid chord of ruddy and brown hues was that which culminated in the nasturtion-colored calico of the woman's apron! Not an atom of it could have been spared, and if the key-note, the apron, were covered up, there would be no picture left, only scraps of pigment. This year it is, if less concentrated, more subtle. The contrasted gloom and glow of the morning twilight are beautiful and true. This harmony of color is nature's composing, or a very truthful and happy reminiscence of it.

The picture before us has, then, two of the most important elements of great art. It lacks, to be great art, even to be very good art, one most important element of all, refined and powerful drawing. The drawing of the hills beyond the river and of the nearer rocks and evergreens is not very truthful, nor very strong; the painter has not seen far into the structure of either tree or hill. There is nothing false and ridiculous, let it be understood. As far as the drawing goes, it is approximately truthful, let us say, suggestive. But it is mannered.

It is very insufficient. Nothing is completely and heartily drawn. There seems to have been a recipe for drawing each and every form of nature. It having been decided upon how the hill-strata were to lie, they all lie so—the lines of red bushes following them. Real hills startle one now and then; composed hills like these never do. It having been decided upon how cedars are to be represented in outline and surface, here they are all treated alike. Inasmuch as now and then in nature a cedar is less compact and unbroken, and shows through a rift in its foliage the little branches crossing each other,—here is one such. The near foreground is not, it would seem, a study from nature at all.

Nothing is farther from our purpose than to ridicule this picture. It is one of the half-dozen among these six hundred that one would care to own. Whoever shall possess it hereafter is offered our sincere congratulations.

But there is this great danger to any young painter of ability among us, that the community does not call upon him to put forth his full strength. Mr. Griswold is safe from the competition of all but two or three of his fellow artists, and it is not likely that these will happen upon such a subject and style of treatment, any given year, as will bring them into direct contrast and comparison with him. Mr. Griswold, moreover, is safe from the urgency of his friends or of picture-buyers; there is no likelihood that any one will give him a commission for a picture to be as good as he can make it, and none other to be received. He must look within for his inducement to work, and must find it in the love for nature which he certainly has, and in the feeling which he probably has, that there is a higher and nobler beauty in nature than he has painted or drawn as yet.

GOVERNMENT AGENTS FOR THE SALE OF THE NATIONAL 7.30 LOAN.

UNITED STATES 7.30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES,

$230,000,000.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the

7.30 LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of July 15, 1865, and are payable three years from that date in currency, or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.

GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These Bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum to their value, according to the rate levied upon other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The Interest at 7.30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents per day on a $100 note.
Ten cents per day on a $500 note.
Twenty cents per day on a $1,000 note.
One dollar per day on a $5,000 note.

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already sold, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at per 6 cent., instead of 7 3-10ths in currency. Subscribers will deduct the interest in currency up to July 15, at the time when they subcribe.

The slight change made in the conditions of this THIRD SERIES affects only the matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in Gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalize prices that purchases made with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

Now offered by the Government, and its superior advantages make it the

GREAT POPULAR LOAN OF THE PEOPLE.

Less than $230,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

Issue, in New York, Circular Credits for Travellers, available in any part of the world.

THE

LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY

OF THE UNITED STATES,

92 Broadway, New York.

OFFERS THE FOLLOWING ADVANTAGES TO PERSONS ABOUT ASSURING:

THE RATIO OF EXPENDITURE TO INCOME IS LESS THAN THAT OF ANY OTHER CASH COMPANY IN THE UNITED STATES.

The income is larger than that of any other cash company in the United States, save one.

No company ever organized in this country or in Europe has met with such extraordinary success in the same period after its formation.

In the case of all ordinary policies, except term policies, after three annual payments have been made, the Society will, on due surrender of the original policy with dividend, not later than three months after it has ceased to be in force, issue a Policy paid up, which will in most cases at least equal the amount of premium paid.

The entire surplus of the Society is divided in the most equitable manner among the policy-holders.

Legal interest alone is allowed to stockholders.

The rates of premiums are as low as those of any other first-class company.

The Board of Directors have authorized the issuing of Policies to the amount of $20,000 upon selected lives.

Policies issued by this Society are indisputable on account of suicide after the first two years.

156 AND 158 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CASH CAPITAL AND ACCUMULATION, $2,250,000.

LOSSES PAID, $1,000,000.

DIVIDEND PAID TO POLICY-HOLDERS, $750,000.

From the great success of this company, they are enabled to offer superior advantages to policy-holders.

Life policies are issued, payable in annual or in one, five, or ten annual instalments; also, non-forfeiture endowment policies, payable in ten annual payments, which are paid at death, or on arriving at any particular age. Life insurance, as an investment, has no superior, as it has saved millions of dollars to the insured, and thousands of families from ruin. Dividends are paid to policy-holders, thus enabling them to continue their policies, if otherwise unable to do so.

This favorable feature has been the means of saving many policies that would have been forfeited for want of means to continue them, and, in several instances, families, once wealthy, have thus been saved from utter ruin.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

ARTICLES

THAT EVERY

HOUSEKEEPER SHOULD USE,

AND EVERY

GROCER SHOULD SELL!

Designed for the best Family Trade—celebrated for good weight and uniform quality. Have always taken the highest Prize at the State Exhibitions.

PYLE'S O. K. SOAP,

An effectual labor-saving and economic Soap, that only needs a trial to be appreciated. Wonderful success has attended its introduction. All classes of society approve it, and the sale is rapidly increasing. Being made from clean stock it serves both for Laundry and Toilet use. Send to your grocer and give it a trial.

PYLE'S BLUING POWDER,

A new article designed for the Household Laundry, which imparts that peculiar Pearly Whiteness to Laces, Linens, and Muslins so much desired by the ladies, and which makes this article an especial favorite. The Powder, also, makes a splendid Blue Writing Ink; thus the ladies can give delicacy to the appearance of their correspondence as well as to their linens. A trial will manifest its usefulness. See that your grocer procures it for you.

PYLE'S SALÆRATUS,

CREAM TARTAR, AND BAKING SODA,

Have gained a reputation for purity, good weight, and uniformity, that renders further recommendation unnecessary. Those who have never used them, and yet prefer the best articles of the kind that can be found, have only to call upon the grocer for those bearing the name of JAMES PYLE, and judge of the economy of their use.

Sold by grocers generally.

A Cool Reflection.

The hot days of Summer are upon us, and it becomes a necessity as well as duty to inquire how we may best promote the health and comfort of our families. But few, comparatively, can go to Newport, Saratoga, or elsewhere, as the imperative demands of business confine them at home; and it matters but little where we are, if we do not wisely select and see that our food is properly prepared, and preserved for our use. To insure its preservation a refrigerator becomes a necessity in every family. We refer such of our readers as intend to purchase one to Messrs. LESLEY & ELLIOT, 494 Broadway, New York, who have on exhibition and sale the Polar Refrigerator, which we believe stands at the head of this class of necessary appendages to the culinary department of every household.

"THE MAGIC."

MOODY'S PATENT SELF-ADJUSTING HOOP SKIRTS.

It is the only article of the kind manufactured that is never in the way either in the narrow church-pews, on horseback, or in any crowded place.

The new Trail Skirt of this peculiar manufacture is particularly recommended to ladies, as the flexible joints enable her to fold it about her person with much greater ease than a small one of the old style. Ladies are well aware that there is no article of dress which has heretofore caused so much trouble and annoyance as hoop skirts, and they should at least examine "THE MAGIC" before purchasing.

New Skirt for 1865.

THE GREAT INVENTION OF THE AGE IN
HOOP SKIRTS.
J. W. BRADLEY'S NEW PATENT DUPLEX ELLIPTIC (OR DOUBLE) SPRING SKIRT.

This invention consists of Duplex (or two) Elliptic Steel Springs, ingeniously braided tightly and firmly together, edge to edge, making the toughest, most flexible, elastic, and durable Spring ever used. They seldom bend or break like the single Springs, and consequently preserve their perfect and beautiful shape twice as long as any other skirt.

The wonderful flexibility and great comfort and pleasure to any lady wearing the Duplex Elliptic Skirt will be experienced particularly in all crowded assemblies, operas, carriages, railroad cars, church pews, arm-chairs, for promenade and house dress, as the Skirt can be folded when in use to occupy a small place as easily as a Silk or Muslin Dress.

A lady having enjoyed the pleasure, comfort, and great convenience of wearing the Duplex Elliptic Steel Spring Skirt for a single day will never afterward willingly dispense with their use. For children, misses, and young ladies they are superior to all others.

They are the best quality in every part, and unquestionably the lightest, most desirable, comfortable, and economical Skirt ever made.

For sale in all first-class Stores in this City, and throughout the United States, Havana de Cuba, Mexico, South America, and the West Indies.

The Week.

MRS. COBDEN'S refusal to accept the pension of £1,500 which was tendered her by Government, has been made the occasion of a virulent attack by The Owl upon Mr. Bright. That gentleman, as the intimate friend of the departed statesman, was assumed to have instigated his widow to an act intended to be spiteful. The fact is shown to have been that Mrs. Cobden acted without consulting other than her own good sense, and declined the bounty because she did not need it.

FROM the various orders of the military authorities throughout the South concerning the freedmen, a glimpse is given of local progress and local necessities, which may be profitably compared. At Lynchburg, Va., Gen. Maitland is concerned for the reunion of families, and the support of the infirm by their natural protectors either on the same plantation or on another. Such support must be provided for by employers who are responsible for the separation. He also enforces the giving of just certificates of character to laborers who wish to remove to their families, and punishes the refusal to hire because such certificate is withheld from white or black. At Richmond, Assistant Commissioner Brown, of the Freedmen's Bureau, appoints a Superintendent for the city and county, whose business it shall be to take a census of the colored people in his district, to protect them in their rights, inform them of their responsibilities, and encourage them in industry and frugality. At Charleston, Gen. Hatch announces that all contracts made under his authority are valid only for the present season; forbids any laborer to be bound to work out his indebtedness; and excludes from all contracts the words "freed by the acts of the military forces of the United States," and all phraseology which implies a doubt of the legality or permanence of emancipation. At Savannah, Gen. Woodford provides the blacks with the same facilities for education as the whites, to wit, one primary and two grammar schools. Though private schools thus become unnecessary or less necessary, they will not be interfered with. Tuition in the public schools is made absolutely free. At Augusta, Ga., General Superintendent Bryant arranges for the making and approval of equitable contracts, fixes the rates of hire and times of payment, and promises redress of injuries with punishment of idleness. Gen. Howard has signified his disapproval of the scale of wages, and prefers that there shall be none. Independent, voluntary engagements should be favored and rendered obligatory when made. At Shreveport, La., Gen. Herron, acting temporarily in the place of the Bureau, constrains the freedmen to remain with their masters and gather the crops, to abide rigidly at their homes, and to quit them only when furnished with passes. The planters on their part are exhorted to treat their laborers fairly and to enter into definite contracts with them. Gen. Granger proclaims at Galveston the freedom of the slaves in Texas, involving "an absolute equality of personal rights and rights of property" between them and their former masters. They are counselled to remain where they are as hired laborers, and the usual warning is uttered against idleness or congregating at military posts.

THE landlords and peasantry of the great estates in Russia have come to a final settlement. Of nearly ten million peasants, half remain provisionally in their old relations, and half are freed outright. Half the latter, again, have become proprietors of their lands, largely by the aid of the Government. Hereafter there will be no "attachment to the soil" in the slavish sense, but a proper disposition to abide will be strengthened in proportion as the restraints upon locomotion are removed.

THE Duke of Wellington's letter to his tenantry is a remarkable episode in English politics, the abuse of power on the part of the landlords being unhappily as regular as the return of the elections. He writes to every man of his dependents:

"DEAR SIR: I think it right to explain clearly to you my feelings regarding the exercise of your vote. It is a trust imposed upon you for the advantage of the country, and the responsibility for the proper exercise of it rests on yourself alone. It is placed by the country in your hands, not in mine, and I beg you distinctly to understand that no one has any authority for stating that I wish to bias you in favor of any candidate. I am yours, etc., WELLINGTON."

THE report of the committee appointed by the rebel Congress to investigate the treatment and exchange of prisoners of war, has been published without the evidence. It is, on its face, a feeble document. Its denial of the charges of the Sanitary Commission lacks the warmth and positiveness of outraged character. It accuses, according to the French rule, by excusing the Confederate authorities; brings forward the prison regulations as a proof that they were observed; and, for the rest, retorts chiefly "You're another!" to the indictment from the Federal Government. No apology is ventured for the horrible and unnecessary exposure of the prisoners at Andersonville, the Charleston race-course, and Salisbury, still marked with the burrowing of shelterless, weather-wasted men, and on the barren Belle Isle. The committee childishly protest against the damning photographs which require no oaths or affidavits, and class them with the illustrations of yellow-covered novels and other sensational literature. But they frankly confess and justify the mine under the Libby. And so, hugging this infamy like an only babe to its breast, the Confederacy goes up to the bar of history.

BY his will the late Admiral Du Pont has devoted his prize-money, $175,000, to the founding of an asylum at Washington for the orphan children of sailors and soldiers. This last act is in keeping with the whole life of the man. He never forgot in his own ease the hardships of those who served under him, nor magnified his own office to the disparagement of their patriotic performance of duty. The wealth which accrued to him from their endeavors he refunds as if it were not altogether his. It is his testimony to the truth that, in the glory of every achievement, those who execute have claims as valid as those who plan.

AT the illuminations in London to celebrate the peace of Amiens, some sixty-odd years ago, the unlettered crowd of Britons assembled before the house of the French Minister were guilty of a curious misapprehension. With more or less sincerity, M. Otto had traced in fiery letters the appropriate motto CONCORD, which, to be sure, as between England and France, was not destined to survive much longer than the candles themselves. The peace being one, as Sheridan said, of which everybody was glad and nobody proud, the word was mistaken for another of similar sound but somewhat different orthography; and the mob would not rest until CONQUERED was replaced by AMITY. We hope no such ill-luck attended the display of good feeling at the South during the recent national festivities. If the identical blunder was repeated, the poor whites could at least plead greater ignorance of the alphabet and a closer adherence to the facts.

A GOOD illustration of the way in which the work of "criticism" is done by gentlemen who have to do it in a hurry, and are not over scrupulous, was afforded in a "notice" of THE NATION which appeared in the New York Times on Friday last. The public is there gravely informed "that full seven pages of our first number are devoted to the question of negro enfranchisement, included in which is the speech of Mr. R. H. Dana, recently delivered in Boston." "The speech of Mr. R. H. Dana, recently delivered in Boston," is neither more nor less than a letter written several weeks ago by Mr. George P. Marsh, in Italy, on the question of State Sovereignty. There is not one word about "negro enfranchisement" in it. Another New York journal, the Citizen, declares that "the long art criticism" in the same number of THE NATION—"is verbose and heavy, and devoted to extravagant praise of Bierstadt's theatrical landscape." Of four columns, there is one devoted to Mr. Bierstadt's landscapes, and every line of it contains severe censure. For getting at the real truth about things—what a Frenchman would call la vérité vraie—there is nothing like reading carefully a "light," "spicy" newspaper.

WENDELL PHILLIPS writes to the Anti-Slavery Standard, expressing his fear that by December the revolted States will have reorganized under the President's scheme of reconstruction, and that their members will present themselves for admission to the House before the election of a speaker, and be admitted by the clerk. We think this not unlikely, but we must confess we do not see what great harm they can do if they are admitted. It is not in Congress their powers of mischief are to be feared, but in their local legislatures. They are hardly likely to have their own way in Washington now when they were unable to have it in 1859. They would act there in the presence of a powerful Northern majority, and although they might say a great many disagreeable things, they could scarcely trouble our peace. The great question, it seems to us, is how to keep them out of the State legislatures, but this still remains to be solved.

IT was not the fault of the negro altogether that he appeared very prominent in the celebrations of the Fourth. Gen. Banks at one end, and ex-Gov. Hahn at the other, with Winter Davis and Gen. Brisbane between, were sure of making him conspicuous if they set their hearts upon it; and so they did. New Orleans, Washington, Chicago, and Louisville were treated to orations on the franchise in black hands—Mr. Davis's being "eloquent," Gen. Banks's "one of the most eloquent ever made in Louisiana," and his audience "immense and enthusiastic." The celebration in the Crescent City terminated with a picturesque torchlight procession of the freedmen, while a review of the colored troops in Louisville brought out vast crowds of the kindred population. At the Capital, the National Colored Monument Association drew together a large, but most orderly and respectable assemblage on the grounds adjacent to the Treasury. Senator Wilson, in his address to them, warned the South that her black code and black laws, and all she had done to hold men in slavery, were abolished with the institution itself; moreover, that he had prepared a bill to introduce on the first day of the next Congress, for the personal liberty of every freeman on the continent.

GEN. HOWARD was the orator at Gettysburg, on the 4th, on the occasion of laying the corner-stone of the soldiers' monument. He alluded with feeling to the fact that Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Everett, who had stood on the same spot in November, 1863, were now numbered with the host of the departed. Still another reminiscence was suggested by a letter from President Johnson, which could not but be compared with the short speech of his predecessor. It is no disparagement to the written to say that it was inferior to the spoken word, which we are not likely to see matched in this generation. Mr. Johnson referred again to the emancipation which had befallen "the thousands of whites as well as blacks," and which ought not to be overlooked. He, also, would do well to remember that these emancipated whites include the lately dominant aristocracy as well as the poorer classes, and that there can be no perfect freedom for any one who has the liberty to oppress his neighbor.

THE bloody deed of the 14th of April has been expiated, after the lapse of almost three whole months. Public opinion rests satisfied with the finding of the Court, satisfied with its verdict, and satisfied with the execution of four of the conspirators in assassination. The last two stages followed so closely upon each other that there was no time to excite a false compassion for Mrs. Surratt, or create a popular pressure to save her from the gallows. There are those who regard the hanging of any human being as an indecent spectacle, revolting to the humanity of the age; there are others who are especially shocked when a woman is suspended. The general feeling is, that the sex of the criminal does not qualify the character of the crime in foro conscientiæ, or in amenability to the laws; and that it is less repulsive to see a woman strangled where a man would be, than for her to have participated in the most atrocious murder of our time. For the rest, there is not a nation in Christendom that can throw stones at us for this business. The trial was prolonged, if not beyond necessity, at least beyond the requirements of justice, and every reasonable facility was afforded the defence. The public mind had grown calm and dispassionate in the interval, and the patience which has endured the tedious process of the Court is a guaranty of the absence of vindictiveness in sanctioning the usual penalties. A new culprit comes to the bar ere long, but whether on the ground of treason or of instigating assassination is yet a secret. The greater includes the less. Though a trial to determine if Jefferson Davis be a traitor would be superfluous, it would be worth half a year of inquiry. It is important to decide that there have been traitors these past four years, in order that we may know them or be rid of them hereafter.

MR. DE SAUTY turns up again. It was supposed that he and the flow of the electric current, in the Atlantic cable, waned and ceased together seven years ago. How he disappeared, and whither, was a mystery to the public. They had taken heart from his telegrams, while the communication lasted; in fact, except that he vouched for it, men would have sworn there had been no communication, and many did thus stoutly affirm, as it was. The unbelievers triumphed when De Sauty was silent, and, from denying that any message had crossed the wires, came to doubting the existence of the operator himself. But he is still alive, or, at least, has been galvanized back to life, and has charge of the electrical condition of the new chain that is to bind the continents. This, if no untoward accident has happened, is already slowly uncoiling in mid-ocean from the tanks of the Great Eastern, from whose deck the latitude and longitude of the huge vessel are made known in London morning and evening. Before the expiration of a fortnight, we shall learn the result of the mighty submarine experiment. We hope that the cheery song of De Sauty redivivus will wax into a crescendo that shall deafen the ear of scepticism, and that the vexed problem of the earth's girdle will be for ever put to rest. Already the confident directors of the telegraph company have fixed their tariff of charges. Twenty pounds for twenty words are the rate of this new ocean postage, including address and signature. Neither the commercial nor the reading community will relish this price for what on land is so reasonable a luxury; but neither, we opine, would prefer to be without a telegraph, nor can the inexpediency of the imposition be demonstrated, at least as yet. The directors meanwhile promise to lay more cables as rapidly as the success of the first will warrant. There is one point to which the attention of both nations ought to be called, and that is the value of a daily exchange of news from responsible sources. Abroad there is no system that corresponds precisely to the American Associated Press, and yet, in spite of much that is frivolous and false in its despatches, the utility of this combination is established. We earnestly urge the setting aside of a part of each day for the exclusive transmission of trustworthy intelligence from both sides of the Atlantic—as far as possible, facts, not surmises; events, not probabilities. The charges for this should be reasonable, and not, as now, beyond the means of most of the public journals, or all combined. A column of telegraphic despatches to one of our dailies is reckoned, by the present scale, at $9,000, which even a king might find a dainty dish for his breakfast-table.

THE ministers from the Executive Council of Canada have had a conference with her Majesty's Government. They met with sympathy in all their projects—of confederation, the defence of the provinces against the neighboring Republic, the renewal of a reciprocity treaty, and a settlement of land-claims with the Hudson's Bay Company. The first was recognized on both sides as the most important, and in general the initiative was left to the colonies.

ONE sign of the revolution just achieved at the South, is the voice of the colored people in that section, which now for the first time makes itself audible to the nation. Much has been done to inspire the negro with a sense of his manhood since the day when John Quincy Adams was nearly expelled from Congress for inquiring what would be the action of the House on a petition purporting to come from slaves. Certain colored citizens of Georgia have forwarded to Senator Sumner an admirably worded petition to the President, which avers that they are loyal, have always been and always will remain so, and asks, to make their loyalty most effective, permission to exercise the right of suffrage. Gen. Saxton attests the genuineness of the three hundred signatures, and the worth of many of the signers. He of course favors their appeal, and denies that their votes would ever be thrown on the side opposed to freedom. From Vicksburg we hear of a colored protest against the appointment of Judge Sharkey as Governor, and a "clamor" for the right of suffrage. On the second of August the colored people of Virginia meet by delegates at Alexandria to consider their condition and prospects, and devise the means of future welfare.

THE President has appointed a Governor for South Carolina—not Benjamin F. Butler, as many had hoped in times past, but Benjamin F. Perry, of whom it is at least to be said that fewer imputations have been cast upon his loyalty than upon that of most of his fellow-appointees. The first of August is yet distant, and there is a chance for Florida before that date. Her case attended to, the list will be completed, and the President's policy be fully on trial. It will be interesting to learn the number of Mr. Perry's constituents in a State whose population is more than one half black, while the remainder were certainly not compelled to secede.

KENTUCKY politics hinge upon the question of ratifying the Constitional Amendment, which abolishes slavery. Practically the nation regards the strife of the two parties there as the backwoodsman did the tussle of his wife and bruin—indifferent which gets the better of it next autumn. For it is certain that the fate of slavery does not depend on the issue of any election, except in regard to time. Nevertheless, it were well the job were done quickly, so that it may be well done, and there are plenty of shrewd Kentuckians, oftener far politicians than philanthropists, who are of this opinion. Such are Gov. Bramlette, ex-Gov. Magoffin, the editor of the Louisville Journal, and many others. The first named has taken the stump, the second written a letter, and the third is daily printing very earnest articles in favor of Kentucky's coming to her senses and abandoning her idle efforts to preserve a disintegrating system. The value of the canvass to the people of the State cannot be computed, for free discussion is a novelty whose charm is not likely to wear off. It is instructive, too, to read arguments for the Amendment based on the pressing need of retaining the colored laberers, who are rapidly getting demoralized by those who know how to cast doubts on the reality of emancipation, so that many have abandoned the State and more are preparing to follow. This means agricultural ruin, and the very best Fugitive Law is now seen to be that which removes the negro's temptation to flee from home, and kinsmen, and employment, by giving him the liberty to go if he pleases, and making it for his advantage to stay.

THERE is hope for John C. Breckinridge. He asserts that "there can be no lasting peace founded upon cruelty and oppression,"—reason enough for the irrepressible conflict, and proof that slavery began the war.

THE freedman's bulletin for the past week compares favorably on the whole with that of the preceding. One must except with emphasis the riots at Norfolk and Portsmouth, attendant upon and subsequent to the elections—first-fruits of the civil régime. In these the colored man suffered shockingly. Even in Richmond there have been some outrages. Elsewhere in Virginia, in the neighborhood of Gordonsville, we are told the crops are bountiful, but doomed to waste for want of hands to gather them. The war has spared the soil its products, but drained it of its cultivators. At Arlington, the Freedman's Village has become self-sustaining, pays its own house-rents, and draws no longer on Government for food, or raiment, or fuel. In Washington there appears an institution for the education of colored youth, incorporated March 3, 1863, of which Rev. William H. Channing is president, and Francis George Shaw, of New York, treasurer, with a highly respectable board of trustees. It is designed as an academy of the higher class for both sexes, and has a foundation in land of some $20,000 and a few thousand in money. More funds will, of course, be required, though at present no definite plan has been resolved upon. General Howard's agents in Florida report that no clear understanding of the new order of things exists among the inhabitants, though few are unable to see that slavery is no more, or disposed to make trouble over its corpse. A corresponding uncertainty pervades the treatment of the blacks, who in some quarters make engagements with their late masters, in others are tasked and whipped by them with old-time brutality. A change is visible, however, in the severity and frequency of punishments. There are sufficient laborers for the harvests. In the interior of Alabama the freedmen are said to be quiet and disposed to be industrious, in some instances under contracts. An account of what the freedmen have done for themselves at Helena, Ark., as lease-holders and hired laborers under Government superintendence, is full of encouragement. They have been thrifty and prosperous. Their brethren on the confiscated plantations leased to Northern capitalists have not fared so well under the temporary system devised by General Banks for the lower Mississippi, yet the balance is in their favor.

IT is still disputed whether the Russian plague be contagious or not, but there is no room to doubt that it is spreading westward with even fearful rapidity. Warnings have reached the State Department from our Ministers and Consuls abroad, and circulars been addressed in consequence to our municipal authorities, which we hope will be heeded. Arrivals from Russian and Turkish ports ought to be rigidly inspected, and without due precaution we may import our aforetime destroyer, the cholera, which is sufficiently prevalent in Egypt to put Italy on her guard.

SCARCELY had the statue of Dante been erected in Florence when his bones were discovered and set up at Ravenna. The skeleton, which has remained concealed for nearly two hundred years, lacks but few bones of being complete. The height of the poet as deduced from its measurement is put at one metre seventy centimetres, or something under five feet six. His monument would seem to be his rightful sarcophagus.

ITALY has promptly removed the restrictions upon American war-vessels in her ports, and calls to mind, in order to renew them, her expressions of friendliness for this country during the struggle from which we have emerged. The Confederates, who are mentioned as "separatists," are promised a different reception.

Much credit belongs to the French for inventions which, it they come to naught, tickle the world with promises that delight for the hour. The most recent instance in point is the infernal machine of Toulon. According to an enthusiastic speaker in the Corps Législatif, this extraordinary torpedo was not only adequate to blowing up a fleet of iron-clads, but to destroying whole regiments when employed in the army by a small platoon of cavalry. The Government Commissioner, next day, very quietly declared that the invention was far from new—a water-tight cask worked by electrical wires—had been extensively used in America, and was now undergoing experiments in England. He did not believe it would supersede the necessity of dock-yards.

It is one thing to correspond with the World, and another to correspond with the truth. Thus, one who writes to that paper from Charleston romances in this fashion :

"Amongst them [the emancipated blacks of South Carolina] were sent the cold-blooded fanatics of New England, teaching them the most incendiary doctrines, and urging upon them, as their highest duty, to take the lives and possess themselves of the property of their late masters. . . . . To cap the climax, bodies of half-disciplined negro troops are now being dispatched to the various court-house towns of the State to spread discontent and trouble amongst the freedmen everywhere. . . . . If the presence of garrisons in interior towns be deemed necessary for the preservation of the national authority (though no such necessity really exists), let white troops by all means be sent there, and not a murmur will be heard; but to station regiments of these freedmen, who have little of the true soldier about them, save the arms and the uniform, in the midst of unarmed communities, is to jeopardize most shamefully and needlessly the lives of thousands."

There is no better disciplined regiment in the United States' service than the 55th (colored) Massachusetts, to which the writer doubtless alludes as having been divided among the towns in the interior of the State. An officer of that regiment testifies as follows :

"The planters where our colored troops have been say they prefer them to our white ones, as they find the freedmen are more contented, and perfectly willing to do and obey what our officers may tell them. At Summerville, S. C., where our regiment was encamped for a short time, the mayor and several of the leading men of the place tried to induce Gen. Hatch to allow us to remain, when they heard that the regiment was ordered away."

The letter of a distinguished publicist which we present elsewhere is worthy of attention. It shows, in opposition to certain calculations which have appeared in the daily press, that in estimating the loss sustained by the South on account of the rebellion, the marketable value of her late chattels is not to be reckoned. It is only where the negroes have perished, and deprived the community of so much labor, that loss has resulted.

That was a ruddy picture which Gen. Sherman painted of himself the other day in Cincinnati—"a little red-headed boy, running about in Lancaster, stealing cherries." In the same speech he declared that in the very hotel where he was then responding to an evening serenade, Gen. Grant and he had met more than a year ago, and "laid down the maps and studied out the campaigns which ended this war."

"Our Washington Correspondent" has long had a habit of concocting accounts of interviews between distinguished people in that city, in which he gives the smart and sharp things they said to one another, word for word, and describes with the most delightful accuracy their appearance when they said them. The gentleman who discharges the duties of this high office for the World gave a thrilling verbatim report, a year or two ago, of a fearful "scene" between Mr. Seward and the French ambassador, which, owing to the absence of that ambassador from the United States when it occurred, did not meet with the attention it deserved. The Cincinnati Enquirer has now been trying its hand in the same branch of art, and has got "a friend" at Washington to describe with minuteness an angry controversy between Mr. Johnson and Mr. Sumner. We need hardly say that he represents Mr. Johnson as having conducted himself on that occasion like a bad-tempered omnibus driver, and Mr. Sumner like a born fool. The privilege enjoyed by the American public in having a band of faithful and imaginative eavesdroppers to wait upon its public men when they visit each other, and put billingsgate into their mouths, can hardly be too highly valued.

The Franco-Austrian Empire of Mexico has survived a year. Maximilian has celebrated, with "balls, illuminations, and other rejoicings," the anniversary of his landing. He has signalized the occasion still further by issuing a manifesto on the subject of education, which he wishes to be popular and compulsory, religious instruction being committed to the priests. He will find business enough for his schools if he throws them open to the rebels, who are flocking to him across the Rio Grande. But they did not bargain to retreat from Yankee "schoolma'ams" to Mexican.

Lord Brougham expresses great annoyance at having it supposed that he is not, and has not always been, a friend of the North. All his own friends must begin to wish by this time that he took less interest in public affairs.

The rapid deterioration of thorough-bred horses in England, which of late years has excited so much comment and lamentation, will probably, since a French horse won the Derby, lead to still greater complaint and apprehension in the sporting world. Everybody seems agreed upon the cause, which is simply the practice of racing two-year-olds and exhausting their powers before maturity. It is singular that horse-racers should thus early have thrown away the only good argument they have ever offered in defence of their sports.

The military gentlemen have resumed possession of Norfolk, and the civil misrule over which Mayor Tabb presided, by the suffrages of the rebellious, has been indefinitely suspended. This first experiment in local self-government, although on a small scale, is full of instruction, and is one of the many signs which point to the inefficiency of the present mode of making a loyal and subordinate South. The oath of fealty did not prevent the loyal citizens of Norfolk from being doubly outvoted at the late municipal election, nor protect the unenfranchised blacks from wanton and deadly abuse. The triumph of the disloyal at the polls inaugurated a régime which soon grew too outrageous to be tolerated, and, thanks to the President, the Secretary of War, or whatever official is responsible for the change, there is an end of the Mayor's police. Fire-arms and deadly weapons of all kinds are forbidden to be carried in the streets, and thus one fruitful source of disorder is removed. There is still a divided jurisdiction in civil offences. The military authorities assume those cases in which either soldiers or sailors are implicated, and also those in which the testimony of colored persons is required concerning white civilians. The rest are left to the usual courts. There is a deal of significance in this apportionment. It is consistent with the practice of Government ever since the war began, so far as relates to the equal admission of colored testimony in all its military tribunals. The remarkable feature of this new order is, that it either distrusts the impartiality of the civil courts, where a black man's evidence may be either rejected or held of no account, or else implies a recognition of the old pro-slavery code as still extant and in force. Gen. Terry's order, which has not publicly been disavowed by his superiors, very distinctly announced the abrogation of that code by the death of the system which called it into being. In New Orleans and in Nashville there have been numerous instances where the civil courts have adopted this view, conformable alike to common sense and common law. Should the Government by-and-bye come to the same conclusion, as we wish it might, an interesting point would arise, which may be presented thus: each State has the right, which it duly exercises, of determining who shall be qualified witnesses in its courts of law. In Virginia, South Carolina, etc., the Government interposes to remove certain disabilities of this sort. On what ground? That they appertain to a state of society for ever abolished on this continent, as repugnant to the democratic genius of our institutions. Is the right to fix the qualifications of voters any better recognized than that to regulate the reception of testimony? Is the reason for interfering to make black men witnesses any stronger than that for interfering to make them voters?

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

HARD SWEARING AS AN INSTRUMENT OF GOVERNMENT.

THE plan of restoring and establishing the authority of the Government at the South, by means of a wholesale administration of oaths, is essentially mediæval, and relies for nearly all its efficacy on ideas and theories which have long ago lost their force. During the confusion of the war it seemed a ready way of protecting the official machinery against clog or obstruction at the hands of traitors or enemies, and, at that time, it probably did render some such service as was expected of it. As long as the Confederacy was in existence, its friends and supporters were probably generally prevented, by a sentiment of devotion to it, from offering any such outward form of adhesion to its enemies as an oath of allegiance or of abjuration. But since its extinction, since the Government of the United States has become the only one in the country, that under which every man has to live whether he likes it or not, it is safe to say that all the swearing that has been done at the South has not made any perceptible addition either to its strength or security.

How any number of people at the North, sufficient to secure the adoption of the oath of allegiance as a great instrument of public policy, ever came to think that it would, passes our comprehension. The expedient is not a novel one. It is, as we have said, mediæval in its origin, and has for five hundred years been tried steadily by all sorts of governments, corporations, and institutions as a means of keeping obnoxious or dangerous people out, or making lazy or unscrupulous people do their duty, and it has never succeeded, though it has led to a monstrous deal of perjury, and has proved a potent means of blunting the public conscience. Oaths owe nearly all their value to the depth of the impression they make on the persons who take them; but they seldom make much impression on people who take them frequently or see them taken frequently. This act, like all other acts, is robbed by familiarity and habit of whatever solemnity may under ordinary circumstances attach to it. Illustrations of this will suggest themselves by the dozen to everybody who chooses to reflect on it for a few minutes. It is found even in courts of justice very difficult to keep witnesses in mind of the awful nature of the sanction with which they clothe their statements, simply because it is a form through which they see people going every day. We may imagine, therefore, what value an oath retains in the eyes of a community where, as at present at the South, it is administered to thousands of persons every day by a power which they fear and hate, and as a condition precedent to the receipt of all sorts of favors, from a ration of Indian meal up to the rights of citizenship. We venture to assert that even in the most moral community in the world it would in a very few weeks, under such circumstances, lose all its solemnity and all its force.

But the South is not a moral community. There is probably no other in Christendom in which the most of the people are less influenced by moral and religious ideas, in which even purely utilitarian considerations have less effect upon the relations between man and man, in which the conscience has been less cultivated, or pride, passion, or prejudice less restrained. The agitation which led to the war, as well as the war itself, have furnished a thousand proofs of the depth and breadth of the gulf which has separated and still separates the slaveholders from the rest of the Christian world, in opinion, in feeling, and in practice, upon nearly all the great questions which civilized men have every day to submit to the decision of their conscience. The experience of every one of our readers who has lived at the South must supply him an abundant confirmation of this statement; Southern literature and history teem with illustrations of its truth. There are two stages of society in which an oath of allegiance might prove a powerful weapon in the hands of a government doubtful of its hold on the affections of its citizens. The one is where high culture or religious exaltation has produced great delicacy of conscience, or a very high sense of personal honor; the other is where superstition has surrounded perjury with temporal terrors, where the oath-breaker and his neighbors expect immediate chastisement to follow the commission of the offence. The South is in neither of these.

Nor is all this mere speculation. The news of every week shows that the oath does not keep any considerable number of disaffected persons away from the polls, or from any other place in which anything is to be gained by hard swearing. Moreover, all pretence of respect for it is being fast laid aside. We have commented elsewhere on the atrocious doctrine propounded by Mr. Reverdy Johnson, that an oath, which is illegally made the condition of the enjoyment of a legal right, may be taken without any violation of the moral law. When men in his position and with his training hold such opinions as this, what may we not conclude as to the state of feeling further South, amongst the real thorough-bred Southerners, in whose eyes the Yankee has long occupied the same moral position as the "giaour" in the eyes of the Turk?

It may be said that the Government has the right to impose a test of loyalty before allowing persons in the rebellious districts to enjoy the rights of citizenship, and that the oath is the simplest and easiest. We grant all this; but we are discussing the question as one of expediency. If administering oaths wholesale did really assist in placing the national authority at the South on a sure and lasting foundation, we should by all means advise its continuance. But we maintain that it does not; and that, moreover, inasmuch as it does not, although everybody is ready to take it, while making no secret of his contempt for it, the only result is to make perjury seem a venial and sometimes justifiable offence, and to exclude the conscientious portion of the rebel population, the portion which retains strong moral or religious feeling, from all influence in the local government; in other words, to hand the States over to the reckless and unscrupulous and base.

There is still another objection to it, and it is one which to all men possessed of real democratic feeling must seem a strong one, and that is, that oaths of this kind are worn-out implements, taken from the old tool-house of European despotism and oligarchy. To use them is often simply an attempt to govern by working on men's fear of everlasting damnation, and in our case they want the excuse which in other countries has so often covered them. We have at hand other means of accomplishing the same end. We have but to enforce the laws, admit the whole population to a share in the government in accordance with those principles in which we have so long gloried. We may dispense with swearing. We ought not to hold out to traitors the temptation to commit perjury, even if we gained anything by it. We can only prevent their resuming their old influence in the State governments in one way, and that is by giving those who are faithful to us the means of outvoting them. There is no loyal population in any State large enough, or nearly large enough, to exclude from the legislatures for any length of time, under the ordinary constitutional forms, those who are hostile to the national Government. They have neither the strength, nor the influence, nor, as their conduct during the war has shown, the force of character to make head against the secessionists, one month after they have lost the support of the United States troops and President Johnson's "war power."

We may as well make up our minds to this at once. We greatly fear we shall see it all only when too late. The question of admitting the negroes to vote, or, what we consider still better, of substituting some other electoral test for that of color, and of willingness to swear, is, we repeat, not a question of negro welfare simply, but of national safety. Two clumsier, more absurd, or more antiquated tests than these have seldom been invented, and the patience with which a large portion of the public sits and waits for them to solve the great problem of reconstruction, is a remarkable exhibition of fatuity.

THE SOUTHERN PRESS.

WHEN a steamboat becomes old, rotten, unseaworthy, and, losing the confidence of the public, is in danger of losing their patronage, it is hauled off for repairs, the painter and upholsterer are summoned, it is baptized with a new name, and in six months the public are invited to try the qualities of "the new and splendid steamer ———, etc." The thief known to the police, adopts a disguise and an alias; and both thief and steamboat proprietor find, Shakespeare to the contrary notwithstanding, that there is a great deal in a name. This stale trick the press of the South are repeating upon the people, with better success than it deserves. The old papers have dropped their names—and because we do not see the title, we delude ourselves with the idea that their existence is ended. Because we no longer read envenomed extracts from the Sentinel, and Examiner, and Dispatch, we imagine they are dead—but the truth is the newspapers of the South are unchanged, in character, in animus, in all but name. The same capitalists own them; the same proprietors manage them; the same editors write for them. It is true the published names of editor and proprietor are often new. It is true also that their columns are not filled with the same noisy but vapid denunciation of everything Northern, but this is the effect of fear.

Throughout the rebellion Richmond has been regarded as a representative of rebeldom; and the Richmond press as representative of the press of the entire Confederacy. We have made some inquiry into the present condition of that press, and we venture the assertion that there is not a "sound" newspaper among them all. There is not one of them genuinely new. Their editors may have taken the oath of allegiance. They may acquiesce in a state of things which they consider inevitable, and abstain from fighting anew the useless battle over the dead bodies of slavery and secession. But there is not a paper in Richmond which is thoroughly in favor of the new order, of liberty, union, and equality of rights. There is not one which heartily supports a restored nationality and free institutions.

We do not propose to leave this a general assertion. We will make it good by specifications. The principal papers in Richmond are the Whig, the Republic, the Commercial Bulletin, and the Times.

The Richmond Whig has neither changed its name nor its editor—Mr. William Ira Smith, the present proprietor, bought a half interest in it during the war, it is hinted to save himself from conscription. Two others of the firm who owned it were colonels in the rebel army. Their names no longer appear in connection with the paper, but it is more than suspected that they still possess an interest in it. Of all papers in the rebel capital, it was perhaps (if there were any difference) the least obnoxious. It was inclined to be conservative, and secured some respect from the North by its persistent opposition to the Davis administration. But it was never suspected of real unionism, or it never could have lived in Richmond. And though it acquiesces in the restoration of the national authority, and submits to the Pierpont government, it cannot be said to give a cordial support to either. It is not regarded as their organ by the loyal men of Virginia, nor does it enjoy their confidence.

The Richmond Republic is ostensibly a new paper. It was started very soon after the evacuation of Richmond. In its prospectus it promised great things. Securing the editorial services of the former correspondent of a Northern newspaper, the loyalists hoped to find in it the expression of their views. But its proprietors control its columns and give character to its utterances. These are the proprietors respectively of the Richmond Examiner and the Richmond Dispatch. It is in reality a resuscitated form of those defunct newspapers.

The Commercial Bulletin is simply Davis's old organ, the Richmond Sentinel, in a new name, but without a changed spirit.

The Times is the newspaper of Richmond. It has much the largest circulation. It is, perhaps, not too much to say that it equals that of all the other papers combined; this it has acquired by its audacious secessionism. Its editor is Mr. H. R. Pollard, formerly of the Examiner, author of a Southern "History of the War," and for a time a resident of Fort Warren. So outspoken is its secessionism that it has lately been warned by the military that its course must change or its publication stop. And such, with some exceptions, is the press, not only of Richmond, but of the whole South. We are taking great pains to put loyal men in the gubernatorial chairs. But here is a power greater than that of the government, wielded almost wholly in the interest of an aristocracy as yet far from dead.

There is nothing which is so much needed in the Southern States as a loyal, liberty-loving press, yet the South cannot, will not sustain it. In a State where the Governor declares that nineteen-twentieths of the people would be disfranchised by being required to take an oath before voting, that they have not voluntarily aided the rebellion, there is no constituency strong enough now to sustain the right kind of a newspaper. In some form or other assistance must be obtained from abroad. We commend this matter to whom it may concern in New York. In no way could they render a more substantial service to the country, than in clubbing together to furnish Northern daily papers to the city of Richmond, through some authorized agent, at the simple cost of paper, printing, and transportation, where now they can only be purchased for ten cents per copy, and are rare at that. Meanwhile, we warn the public to remember that the extracts which they constantly read from the Southern press, concerning the condition of society, and especially the conduct of the negro, are prepared for our information by the same men whose atrocious calumnies of the North did more to produce the war—whose unblushing falsehoods, during its progress, did more to prolong and embitter it, than all other influences combined.

DEMOCRATIC NATIONALITY.

The issue of the war marks an epoch by the consolidation of nationality under democratic forms. The characteristic feature of modern society, since the close of the feudal period, has been a tendency toward the national polity as the normal type of government. Following the general outline of M. Guizot—that chiefest philosopher of European society—we may divide the history of European nations into three periods—"the period of confusion," consequent upon the disintegration of the Roman empire, and the invasions and counter-invasions of barbarian tribes upon the theatre of the old civilization; "the feudal period," which furnished the first, and perhaps the only possible, nucleus of organization amid the universal chaos; and "the modern period" of national growth and coherence through organic law. The strong arm and the iron will of Charlemagne first arrested the insecurity and disorder of centuries of barbarism; and though his empire perished with him, the local authorities that he had established by grants of lands to his feudatory nobles, survived the central power, and grew into petty states—each an absolute sovereignty within itself;—the feudal lord being master over all lands, property, persons, within his domain, the arbiter of peace and war, of life and death. The feudal castle thus became the light-house of civilization amid the receding floods of barbarism, the nucleus of order in the confusion of a broken empire, the crystallizing centre of society itself. Around its base, under its protection, and through its alliances of interest, of necessity, or of ambition, society gradually grew into a power under whose weight the props that had trained it fell at length as the empire had fallen before.

In England the feudal sovereignty was ground between king and commons, as an upper and a nether millstone, till it was reduced to a malleable aristocracy. In France feudalism was absorbed in the ambitious growth of monarchy, which culminated in Louis XIV., "the supreme personification of kingly government." In him the king was the state; but with him also the absolute type of state-craft began to decline, so that, as Martin so eloquently writes, "if monarchy did not expire on the same day as the monarch, the sullen work of decomposition was never more to be arrested in its organs. We shall witness the decomposition of this vast body, until the day when veritable unity, the sovereign nation, breaks this worn-out shell to appear in its own essence, without figure and without symbol. In the future of society the type of government will be not sacerdotal, nor monarchical, nor aristocratic, but national."

The idea of nationality in its completeness embraces first a distinct and undivided people, having a community of language, of territory, of interest and institutions; and secondly, the combination, or the co-ordinate action, of all interests in their just proportion in the state;—external independence and internal coherence and equilibrium.

Though the Italians were one race, with one language, there was no proper nationality in Italy until the petty kingdoms that divided and oppressed her people were swallowed up in the united kingdom of Victor Emanuel. Turkey is not a nationality, but an agglomeration of many races ruled by the sword of one. And China, though her people, her soil, her language are one, is not a nationality in the contemplation of political philosophy, but a race ruled by a caste, and that of foreign origin. But where the polity is national, there no one class or interest—priestly, military, literary, monetary, numerical—has control of the supreme power, or can use the state for its exclusive benefit, but the common-weal is the idea of the state both as to its essence and as to its functions.

In Europe this idea of a national polity is most nearly approached in the British Constitution; where, though the forms of royalty are still maintained, Parliament is omnipotent; and the voice of the Commons, swollen by the voice of popular assemblies outside of Parliament, makes the nation felt as a power, though the people are still limited in suffrage, and though land, office, and social consideration are largely monopolized by the nobility. In Germany the full realization of nationality is still hindered by vicious and cumbersome political divisions, making the states a pasture ground for petty princes; while France vibrates from the extreme of popular sovereignty to that of imperial absolutism. Nevertheless the tendency of the modern period of society with which we stand connected is toward nationalization, and against either a feudal federation or a despotic centralization.

Within this period our American institutions took their rise; and from the first they have borne the stamp of nationality. It has been forcibly said by Dr. Lieber, that "it is a fact or movement of the greatest significance in the whole history of the human race, that this great continent was colonized by European people, at a period when, in their portion of the globe, great nations had been formed, and the national polity had finally become the nominal type of government; and it is a fact equally pregnant with momentous results, that the northern portion of this hemisphere came to be colonized chiefly by men who brought along with them the seeds of self-government and a living common law, instinct with the principles of manly self-dependence and civil freedom."

Even as colonies, we began our existence as one people, having a community of interest and of destiny in the New World: we were the English nation transplanted without royalty, without aristocracy, and without a state church—even more national than the nation itself; and when common dangers arose, this sentiment of nationality drew the colonies together in one organic form—first as a political sovereignty, independent of foreign control, and next as a national unity, or a unified body politic through a national constitution displacing the confederation of States. No statesman since Hamilton and Madison has more clearly conceived the essential nationality of the American people than did President Lincoln;—nor more ably stated and defended that nationality against the self-destructive dogma of State sovereignty. This Administration has determined both the fact and the perpetuity of a nationality under democratic forms.

In his Message for 1862, he showed conclusively that "the portion of the earth's surface which is owned and inhabited by the people of the United States is adapted to be the home of one national family," and of only one; that, "physically speaking, we cannot separate; since there is no line, straight or crooked, suitable for a national boundary, upon which to divide." "Our national homestead in all its adaptations and aptitudes demands union and abhors separation."

In his first Message of 1861, he showed that historically and politically we are and must be one nation: "Much is said about the sovereignty of the States, but the word even is not in the national Constitution, nor, as is believed, in any of the State constitutions. What is sovereignty in the political sense of the word? Would it be far wrong to define it a political community without a political superior? Tested by this, no one of our States except Texas was a sovereignty; and even Texas gave up the character on coming into the Union, by which act she acknowledged the Constitution of the United States, and the laws and treaties of the United States made in pursuance of the Constitution, to be for her the supreme law. The States have their status in the Union, and they have no other legal status. If they break from this, they can only do so against law and by revolution. The Union, and not themselves separately, procured their independence and their liberty, by conquest or purchase. The Union gave each of them whatever of independence and liberty it has. The Union is older than any of the States, and, in fact, it created them as States. Originally, some dependent colonies made the Union, and in turn the Union threw off their old dependence for them and made them States, such as they are."

This territorial, political, and historical oneness of the nation is now ratified by the blood of thousands of her sons cementing the national polity as the only government possible for the American people. The prime issue in the war was between nationality one and indivisible, and the loose and changeable federation of independent States; and this involved not simply the permanence of our national Union, but the possibility of a nationality under democratic forms. Greece, with her petty state democracies, now leagued together by dangers and now divided by jealousies, never realized a nationality. The Roman republic, centralized in the capital, and governing districts and provinces by military or proconsular power—instead of a local and elected magistracy—invited military ambition and political faction to pervert its imperial unity to the uses of a central despotism. To command Rome was like commanding Paris. The principle of local self-government, the safeguard of popular liberty, secures us against a Roman centralization; but secession was an attempt to erect local self-government into State sovereignty and sectional independence—thus repeating for us Grecian disintegration, and against that we have asserted and established nationality. Said Mr. Lincoln: "Our popular government has often been called an experiment. Two points in it our people have settled: the successful establishing and the successful administering of it. One still remains: its successful maintenance against a formidable internal attempt to overthrow it. It is now for them to demonstrate to the world that those who can fairly carry an election can also suppress a rebellion; that ballots are the rightful and peaceful successors of bullets, and that when ballots have fairly and constitutionally decided, there can be no successful appeal back to bullets; that there can be no successful appeal except to ballots themselves at succeeding elections. Such will be a great lesson of peace, teaching men that what they cannot take by an election, neither can they take by a war."

It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of the decision reached by the war, that the United States are one national sovereignty under democratic forms. Our point of danger, and, as some imagined, of weakness also, was just there. We were proof against aggression, we were proof against despotism. But were we proof against disruption? We were independent, and we were republican; but were we one—a nation, or only a league? The determination of our nationality under democratic forms that guard with sacred jealousy personal liberty and local self-government, marks an era in political philosophy and in popular government. It has settled the permanence of the national polity—that "government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth." It has demonstrated that our institutions of local freedom are but so many roots to feed, strengthen, and uphold our common nationality, and that a nationality thus vitalized from the myriad roots of local, distributed self-government cannot be compressed into a centralized power even under the stupendous weight of war. Sovereignty without centralization, consolidation without despotism, nationality under democratic forms, this is a fact now for the first time established in the history of government. England and France looked on with amazement to see a man of the people, chosen for such a contingency, within twelve hours after the assassination of the head of the Government, stepping into the chief place of power, and speaking not of the rights and prerogatives of his office, but of his duties to the nation. At the very moment when the Emperor of France drops the sword of the usurper for the pen of the eulogist, to persuade us that "when Providence raises up such men as Cæsar, Charlemagne, and Napoleon, it is to trace out to peoples the path they ought to follow," and that nations are safe and happy only when the central power is wielded by these privileged leaders, we see the principle of nationality under democratic forms asserting itself with a grandeur of military strength, a unity of political counsel, a dignity of moral power, before which the empires of Cæsar, of Charlemagne, and of Napoleon dwindle into insignificance.

THE DISFRANCHISING POWER.

It is repeated day after day, that in urging against the admission of negroes to the franchise, those who urge it are asking President Johnson to set aside the Constitution; and it is alleged that in leaving this question to the decision of the Southern whites, he is only doing what the letter of the organic law obliges him to do, and that nobody asks him to interfere in the matter except people who deny the constitution all force. We were told last week, by one of the morning papers, that "in President Johnson's opinion, as indicated by his official acts, the Federal Government has no right to prescribe the qualifications of voters in the several States. He regards that as a matter belonging to the States themselves; and if they are members of the Union (as he believes them to be) they must be allowed to exercise the rights that belong to them. Very many persons assume that, inasmuch as the doctrine of State sovereignty, as against the Federal Government, has been exploded by the war, the doctrine of State rights has been abrogated also. This is a great mistake. The war has not consolidated the national Government in any such way as to blot out the States, or impair, in any degree, those rights and powers which belong to each State under the Constitution. There are very many subjects over which State jurisdiction is perfect and complete; and it is just as important as it ever was that over those subjects that jurisdiction should be maintained. It is only where State authority comes in conflict with national authority, upon subjects committed to the latter by the Constitution, that the former must give way." And again, a day or two previously, that "we can find in the Constitution no shadow of authority for requiring any State to permit negroes to vote as a condition of remaining in the Union. Even if we should deem that measure 'essential to the public safety,' we do not see how the Federal Government could adopt it without exercising power not conferred upon it by the Constitution. Suffrage in the rebel States may and must be restricted, because men who have been rebels cannot be legal voters until they have been restored to their rights by Executive pardon. But we do not see how either the President or Congress can enlarge the suffrage—how they can admit new classes of voters to the ballot-box in any State. That is not one of the modes of punishing treason known to the Constitution; and if the Government may enlarge the suffrage in Georgia because it deems such a measure essential to the 'public safety,' why may it not do the same thing, on the same grounds, in Massachusetts and New York?"

Now, it may or may not be a good thing to allow negroes to vote; but its expediency or inexpediency does not in the least affect President Johnson's power in the matter. There is not a shadow of warrant for the assertion that while he has power to restrict the suffrage, he has no power to enlarge it. There is neither in the Constitution, nor in any act of Congress, a particle of authority expressly granted to him either for the enlargement or restriction of the franchise. His prohibiting persons who have taken part in the rebellion from voting rests simply on the "war power," or is, in other words, revolutionary, done in virtue of the necessity of the case, and in defence of the national existence. He has no more constitutional authority to disfranchise men for offences of which they have not been convicted before a court of justice, than to enfranchise others for services which they have never rendered; and, we may add, he has just as much authority to do the one as the other. The distinction which it is sought to create between his enfranchising and disfranchising power is purely imaginary.

Congress, in chapter 195 of 1862, fixed the punishment of persons taking part in the rebellion. It consisted in the confiscation of their property, the liberation of their slaves, and imprisonment not exceeding ten years, with a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and disqualification for office. But it is to be observed that the infliction of any of these penalties, except the liberation of their slaves, is dependent on conviction before a court of law. Disfranchisement is no doubt a consequence of the commission of treason, but only when the offence has been proved before a jury, and the sentence has been pronounced by a judge.

Therefore, when President Johnson decides who shall be allowed to vote in the disloyal States, at the election of either a convention or legislature, he does so, not in virtue of express constitutional provision, or under an act of Congress, but in the exercise of his power as commander-in-chief of the national armies. In other words, he is regulating the process of construction by martial law, which, in our opinion, he is perfectly justified in doing. But to contend that a general who, in virtue of his military authority, decides who shall not come to the polls, may not, also, in virtue of the same authority, decide who shall come, is absurd on its face.

For our part we should gladly see him go a little further than he has yet done, and exclude everybody from the polls who can neither read nor write, inasmuch as the voting in the South of that class of persons has already nearly ruined the country. We regard any process which arms them with their old power with the utmost apprehension.

POLITICAL CASUISTRY.

The opinion of Mr. Reverdy Johnson of Maryland concerning the moral and political obligation of the oath required of the citizens of that State, as the condition of being allowed to vote upon the constitution framed in convention, has attracted no little attention in various quarters. We ought not to be surprised at this. For the doctrine is not only in itself utterly atrocious in principle, but it becomes portentous of uncomputed evil, if viewed in its possible applications and consequences. Whether considered as an indication or an effect of a widespread demoralization of the public or, so to speak, of the political conscience, or regarded in its purely ethical relations, the enunciation of such an opinion by such a personage is an event of very grave significance.

The circumstances which occasioned the letter of Mr. Johnson were briefly as follows: The Legislature of Maryland ordered a convention of the representatives of the people to frame a new constitution for the State. This constitution when framed, as is provided in the sixth section of the law calling the convention, was "to be submitted to the legal and qualified voters of the State for their adoption or rejection." It was still further provided that it should be submitted "at such time, in such manner, and subject to such regulations as said convention might prescribe." The convention assumed to itself the right of defining who were to be considered as "legal and qualified voters," by requiring an oath in which, with other matter, there was a solemn disclaimer of having aided or sympathized with the rebellion.

The burden of Senator Johnson's letter is to show that the convention had neither authority nor discretion to prescribe any conditions of the kind, least of all conditions so grave and severe as this. His argument to this conclusion takes up nearly the whole of the letter, which purports to give his opinion upon "the constitutionality, legal and binding effect and bearing of the oath." The "constitutionality" of this oath is the only point which he condescends to argue. The "legal and binding effect," as we shall see, is disposed of with most untimely haste and with amazing recklessness of argument and truth.

Having finished his argument and accomplished his chief or sole object, he proceeds to enquire, "But is there any remedy for the wrong done and now about to be consummated?" "Cannot the Governor veto the ordinance?" To this he despairingly replies: he cannot or will not. "But cannot the courts interpose?" Alas! there is no hope from that quarter. Then follow these memorable words: "But the wrong is not without remedy. The people possess the power to reject it. They can take the oath and vote upon the adoption or rejection of the constitution. Because the convention transcended its power, as I am satisfied it has, that is no reason why the people should succumb; on the contrary, it should lead them to adopt the only course left to redress the wrong. The taking of the oath under such circumstances argues no willingness to surrender their rights. It is, indeed, the only way in which they can protect them; no moral injunction will be violated by such a course, because the exaction of the oath was beyond the authority of the convention, and as a law is therefore void."

This is all which is suggested concerning "the legal and binding effect and bearing of the oath." Our sole concern is with the opinion expressed or implied in these words. We do not care to discuss the question whether the author is right or wrong in the opinion given and defended so elaborately in regard to the constitutionality of requiring the oath, or any other condition. We will concede that he is right in his view of that point, for it is only on this assumption that the falsehood and evil of the remedy which he suggests can be made to appear. We do not care to imitate the method of argumentation which he adopts—to distract or confuse the minds of our readers by considering two questions when in reality there is only one before us and them.

The remedy "suggested" by Mr. Johnson is, that conceding or assuming that the law requiring the oath is a usurpation and void, the citizen may take it—and "no moral injunction will be violated by such a course." Or in other words, it is suggested that he may swear falsely, may perjure his soul, may rightfully and innocently declare before God that which is not true. That is, because a man is unlawfully required to swear to something, therefore it is of no consequence to what he swears.

This is a fair interpretation of the remedy which Mr. Johnson suggests. It is true he is very far from using this language. He is far too wily to make the issue in a form so distinct. He phrases the alternative thus: "Because the convention transcended its power, as I am satisfied it has, that is no reason why the people should succumb." Mark the words which he employs. He does not speak of oaths, or of false swearing, or of perjury—but simply says "there is no reason why the people should succumb." He proceeds in the same strain: "On the contrary, it should lead them to adopt the only course left to redress the wrong." Not a word thus far of whether it may be lawful to do the act which he remotely "suggests," but the only question entertained is whether it is possible to assert and defend their invaded rights.

Gathering courage as he proceeds, he ventures to name the act which he has been preparing more distinctly to suggest. "The taking the oath under such circumstances argues"—what? No criminal indifference to right doing—no insensibility to commonly acknowledged obligations? Not in the least. This consideration it is not yet time to touch: "but no willingness to surrender their rights." How such a question could come up, except very indirectly, it is not easy to imagine.

But our skilful advocate still will have it that the only question at issue for these distinguished citizens of Maryland is not whether they shall do right, but whether they shall surrender "a right" or "rights," for he adds, "It is indeed the only way to protect them." Having said this, there appears to dawn upon his mind the possible suggestion that "moral" considerations may be involved—that the question may be one of duty and conscience and truth, as well as of expediency and of the surrendering of rights. That suggestion is responded to by a passing homage—by a phrase interposed in the middle of the sentence thus: "And no moral injunction will be violated by such a course, because the exaction of the oath was beyond the authority of the convention, and as a law is therefore void." Having delivered himself of this part of a sentence, which is all the recognition which he gives to the rightfulness of the procedure, he seems in haste to have done with this very disagreeable and inconvenient side of the subject, signs himself "with regard, your obedient servant," seals his letter in haste, as we can very easily believe, posts it without delay, and, as it is not uncharitable to suppose, tries to dismiss it from his thoughts.

A special pleader might reply, that Mr. Johnson in no way advises the voters of Maryland to take the oath if they could not honestly swear it truly; that he simply "suggests" that those who can swear to its import with a safe conscience, should waive their protest against the imposition of any oath, and thus reclaim their rights. But if this were his meaning, he should and would have said this precisely. That this was not his meaning, and that his language will not bear this construction, is evident from what he says and from what he "suggests." He says explicitly, "The people possess the power to reject it," etc., the wrong. "They can take the oath and vote upon the adoption and rejection of the constitution." The plain import of this advice is this—the convention have endeavored wrongfully to deprive many of you of your rights by interposing an oath as the condition of your voting, viz., such an oath as many of you, as was thought, could not honestly and therefore would not willingly take. The requirements of an oath as a form which presented no difficulty as to its matter, was surely no such invasion of rights as to occasion the slightest difficulty to a practical people in times of high political excitement. Least of all, the difficulty could not be so serious as to require the dexterous advice of an eminent political casuist to relieve.

That this was not his meaning is obvious still further from the fact that he is very distinctly aware, more so than he likes to think very long upon, that there are "moral injunctions" to be considered, to remove which he writes a long letter. The circumstance that these moral considerations are treated and disposed of under another title, "the recovery and defence of rights," illustrates the skilful sophistry of the adviser, but does not in the least obscure the meaning and import of the advice which he "suggests." We must confess that the real doctrine of the author is so covertly phrased, and the argument is so daintily handled, that we are at a loss to decide which is the most offensive, the advice which is given or the manner in which it is suggested and enforced. But the doctrine of Mr. Johnson, when expressed in brave and honest English, is this—it being assumed that "the exaction of the oath was beyond the authority of the convention, and as a law is therefore void:" "no moral injunction will be violated" if all the otherwise legal and qualified voters of Maryland should take the oath—whether they can swear to its matter truly or not. The oath is an imposition, the law is a nullity—therefore to obey the one by taking the other by all the people, i. e., the voters of Maryland, is not only not morally wrong, but under the circumstances becomes a sacred duty as the only practicable method of defending their rights. The convention wrongs me, therefore I may wrong my own soul. The exaction of the oath is unauthorized, and therefore I may call God to witness that I have not done what I know that I have done, or that I intend to avoid what I know that I intend to do!

If this reasoning is valid, it follows not only that I may take a false oath, but may commit any other act commonly called a crime, which may be essential, by the act of a usurping government, to the redress of my political wrongs or the recovery of my political rights. I may blaspheme the Creator; may commit adultery or incest or any other "abhorred deed." I may take the life of the provost marshal or the president of the usurping government, provided only that it is the sole remedy against the usurpation, or the only possible means for the recovery or defence of my rights. The end sanctifies the means. It is the old doctrine, with this difference, that it is not "in gloriam Dei majorem," but it is simply for the recovery of the rights of a "legal and qualified voter" of the State of Maryland.

But is there no shadow of truth in the doctrine which all right-minded men must instinctively reject? How was it possible that such advice should be given or received? These questions it is always wise in such cases to ask. There is a great principle in political ethics of which Mr. Johnson has availed himself, and has dexterously turned to his ends—whether consciously or unconsciously, it is no concern of ours to decide. Every sophism is the caricature of a valid argument. Every false maxim is the distortion of some sound principle. The axiom which in the present instance is caricatured and turned to the most dangerous use, is the generally received doctrine that a usurping government, so long as the government is not yet established de facto, cannot hold the conscience of the citizen or subject to obedience. So long as the protest of non-compliance is likely to be of any advantage, or open resistance may be attended with any prospect of success, the conscience is not only released from obedience, but it may justify open revolt and resistance. If, however, the government is fully established and becomes the government de facto, then it binds the conscience de jure to peaceable conformity, and to entire abstinence even from all revolutionary agitation. If such a government, or one whose authority has never been questioned, commits usurpation in a single unlawful or unconstitutional act, and the conscience is offended, the subject may disobey, but must suffer the loss or penalty which that disobedience involves.

These are all the cases supposable of rightful resistance to a usurping government. None of these justify in the least the inference drawn by Mr. Johnson, that against a government which usurps authority by requiring an unlawful oath, the citizen may take the oath to a falsehood or with a mental reservation, least of all when the oath is prescribed for the very purpose of making an appeal to the conscience, under sanctions the most solemn conceivable. The universal practice of imposing such oaths in times of change and agitation, as a security against any possible evasion, conclusively proves that the oath is supposed to bind all who take it to the faithful assertion of what is true in fact and the honest avowal of what is purposed in intention. The circumstance that the government is regarded and detested as a usurper has never before been held by any casuist to release from the extra-political obligation to swear to the truth, which is absolute and beyond all release or modification.

Whewell, in his "Elements of Morality," divides oaths into two classes—"oaths of testimony or assertion, and oaths of promise or engagement for the future." Oaths of assertion impose the duty of "entire sincerity in asserting, without reserve, equivocation, or straining of the truth." Oaths of promise are "inconsistent with a contemplation of the cases of exception, as prominent or frequent." "A person cannot, without the guilt of perjury, take an oath to administer the laws faithfully and justly, if he believe that to administer the laws faithfully will be to commit habitual injustice. A subject cannot swear allegiance to the reigning sovereign if he not only believe him to be a usurper, but if he also be ready to join in a scheme for opposing him if a favorable occasion should arise." "Besides the general moral engagements contained in oaths of office, such oaths often include some specification of a particular subject with a prescribed course of action relative to it." "If a man has entered upon an office engaging himself to a certain course of conduct, and afterwards thinks such conduct wrong, he is bound by justice and truth to give up his office, and cannot honestly pursue any other course. The oath of office is the expression of a contract between the body and the individual. If he breaks the contract, and keeps his share of the advantage which it gave, he is guilty of fraud and falsehood, aggravated by perjury." That most liberal of all casuists, St. Alphonsus Maria de Ligorio, in his "Moral Theology," finds a few cases in which it is lawful for a person to use equivocation in taking an oath when not lawfully administered; but these are always when the person is brought into court as a respondent or witness. He does not contemplate the case as possible or even conceivable that a man should rush before a magistrate and volunteer to take an oath unlawfully prescribed as a means of defending his political rights. Even Bresenbaum himself, of whom it has been said that if a man desired to commit any crime whatever, he could find some pretext, excuse, or authority for it in his two folio volumes of convenient casuistry, does not suggest the advice of Senator Johnson.

Against the enormity of this doctrine, the whole army of political and religious non-jurors in all ages unite in a protest of scorn and horror. They were men who disdained to take the oath of allegiance to the government which they abhorred, and would scorn still more the convenient and detestable casuistry which would teach that it is lawful to take the oath to a falsehood in order to further their political supremacy, or to defeat the designs of a dominant political party.

We cannot refrain from calling the attention of our readers to the practical demoralization in respect to all political duties and relations which has been at once the cause and the consequent of the late rebellion. A young lieutenant, who had served in the United States Navy, had committed himself to the cause of the insurgents before resigning his commission. Landing at Boston, he was on his way to the South when he was intercepted at New York and brought to the Navy Yard. It was very early in the war, when neither the malignity of the South nor the authority of the lawful Government had as yet been distinctly revealed or asserted. He entreated that he might be allowed to go Southward, as other officers in his condition had done, and affirmed on his honor as a gentleman and an officer that he would make no revelations whatever to the detriment of the Government or the advantage of the rebels. He was ready to take any oath to confirm his word. A veteran commodore, touching the shoulder-strap which he still dared to wear, quietly observed, "You have broken one oath already." The lieutenant was too young in years and too much of a novice in crime not to blush under the deserved reproof.

It was only by the discipline of years that the Southern people were schooled into a practical rejection of their moral obligation to the national Government. It was only by the reiteration by political leaders and spiritual guides of the words "usurpation, tyranny, breach of contract, disregard of Southern rights, violation of the Constitution," etc., that they were ready to break old oaths and to swear new ones to State sovereignty and the inalienable right of secession.

If now the doctrine of Mr. Johnson is received, that usurpation or unlawfulness on the part of the Government, in whole or in part, releases the citizen not only from the common obligation and import of the oath, but to the commission of what, under other circumstances, would be rank perjury concerning truth of fact and honesty of intention,—if this doctrine is even generally suggested and not disowned, the national Government will do well for a time to dispense with all oaths and all projects of amnesty and reconstruction till the felt necessity of order, protection, and civil liberty shall invest the Government itself with the attribute of sacredness, and render the oath of allegiance too sacred to be a vulgar tool of party warfare.

THE LOSSES OF THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of The Nation:

In calculating the severe losses which "the South" has sustained during the rebellion, it is an almost universal error to include the enfranchisement of the slaves. Four millions of slaves have been or will be liberated; each slave was worth so much before the rebellion; therefore we are told "the South" has lost so many millions of capital. A greater mistake cannot be committed. It is intrinsically the same error, although its application is the reverse, which was committed at the time when the Southern journals and speakers were bent on proving the superior wealth possessed by the South compared to that distributed over the North. The whole slave population was valued at the market price, and thus entered as an item of Southern wealth. The writer of these few lines, then living at the South, endeavored in vain to convince his friends that either they must leave out the slave population as an item of Southern wealth, or else they must value the corresponding free laborers at the North, according to their productive power and skill, and enter them as an item of Northern wealth.

The "loss of the South" took place when capital was invested in the first negroes; that is, money paid for the immigration of productive labor, which the North obtained gratis by the immigration of free white labor. In both portions there was an abundance of land; labor and stock were necessary to make it productive. The South required capital to buy horses, mules, and negroes; the North stood in need of capital to buy the same stock, minus the negro. Here the emigrant offered himself and worked for wages.

In the reverse case—the emancipation of the slave—how does the South lose the value of the slaves? Had we extirpated the whole colored population, then, indeed, the whole capital would have been lost; but why was the field hand worth $500, or a good black worth $1,000 or $1,500? Simply because his productive labor was worth so much. Economically speaking, there is nothing worth any money in a slave, except his productive labor, and this productive labor is not destroyed. Those two arms which wielded the hoe are as live after President Lincoln's proclamation as before. The name of the owner of the living reaping or sowing machine has changed, but the machine is there uninjured. How then can "the South" be said to have lost the whole slave capital? What is "the South?" A community; and the source of wealth, consisting in the productive capacity of the colored population, remains in that community as much so as the productive labor of the serfs remained in Russia after their emancipation by the present Emperor. There were many persons who decried Russian emancipation, but not a single one ever maintained that Russia impoverished herself, in freeing the millions of serfs, by the whole amount of the value of all the serfs. Did the whole of Europe impoverish herself by the abolition of serfdom in the Middle Ages and in modern times? Serfdom, or something much resembling it, existed in Mecklenburg, one of the most productive portions of Germany, down to comparatively recent times, but Mecklenburg, so far from becoming poorer by complete emancipation, has greatly profited by it.

It is not the intention to enter here into the questions, whether the negro, being freed, will labor as much as in slavery; or whether the transition period will not of itself create great loss; or whether individual planters will not be injured. This would require a discussion far beyond the limits of this article, which may be concluded with the simple remark, that whichever way the answers to these questions would turn out, one truth is above all others: political economy, however important, is not the only or the most important of things. Economy alone does not save empires, or raise them. Ruinous slavery was to be abolished, and must be abolished, all wincing of single planters or the trade at large to the contrary notwithstanding.

F. L.

THE SOCIAL INFLUENCE OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Senator Sherman, in a recent speech, alluded somewhat indistinctly to one or two probable, or perhaps we should rather say possible, consequences of the national debt, which are worthy of more attention than they have received. There is very little doubt that the effect upon society in this country of the means which it supplies of making sure investments will, in the course of a generation, should the members of the Herald's "Roll of Honor" not have paid it off by that time, be very marked.

The difficulty with which, as every observer of American society knows, large or even small fortunes are kept together for any great length of time in the hands of one family, is usually ascribed to the influence of our laws of descent and distribution, or of the democratic atmosphere in which everybody lives upon the minds of testators. The fact is, however, that the liberty of bequest is as great in England as it is here, and the power of entail in many of the States—that of New York for one—is almost as great.

In England the law of primogeniture, which is popularly supposed to be the foundation on which the aristocracy rests, in reality only operates in case of intestacy. In the absence of a family settlement, a testator might cut his estate up into as many parts as he had children. What really gives the eldest son the preference in the transmission of landed property, is not the law, but the feeling of the class. Almost every marriage settlement entails the estate strictly on the eldest son to be born of the union, and when he comes of age he almost invariably joins his father in executing another entail, handing it down to his own eldest son, and so on from generation to generation, the younger children acquiescing in the arrangement with a cheerfulness which is a wonderful illustration of the strength of aristocratic feeling, and the solid satisfaction which people bred in an aristocratic society take in belonging to a great house.

There is nothing in the law to prevent a man desirous of "founding a family" here from doing the same thing. The obstacles to it are to be found not in the statutes but in the public sentiment, which would visit anything of the kind with reprobation, and in the feeling of the children, who would consider any such display of preference for the eldest son a piece of injustice to themselves. The cases in which a man dies intestate, and leaves it to the law to distribute his estate, are too few in number to exercise much influence on the general distribution of property. Nor can the facility and rapidity with which the accumulations of one generation are usually scattered in the next, be ascribed altogether to the practice of dividing fortunes among one's children. This practice prevails in many countries, Holland and France for instance, without causing them to pass out of the hands of the families. There are various ways well known to lovers of money of keeping a fortune amongst persons of the same blood, for many generations in succession, without marking out any one individual for an undue share of it, such as intermarriage, business partnerships, etc. In Holland and in Switzerland large properties have in this way been transmitted in the same line for two or three hundred years without much, if any diminution, often with considerable increase.

In the United States, however, the cases, as everybody knows, are rare in which the grandson of a wealthy man is found in possession of much of the ancestral fortune. The largest properties are generally dissipated inside fifty years, leaving the descendants of those who built them up to begin life as they did, and go through the tug and struggle over again. How few families who in any of the States were rich at the beginning of the present century can now show much evidence of their former splendor! In fact, there are probably more vicissitudes of fortune crowded into half a century in the history of any prominent American family, than into that of any great house in Europe in a century and a half.

Now there is very little question that though much of this is doubtless due to the practice, enforced by public opinion as well as by family feeling, of dividing properties on the death of the owners, a still larger portion of it is due to the uncertain and precarious character of the modes of investment to which executors, administrators, and heirs have hitherto been compelled to resort. Not only does it require great skill and shrewdness, greater than most men possess, to invest money in such a way as to secure any return, but even in such a way as to prevent total loss. This is a difficulty which is of course encountered in every country; but there is in this country an additional and very formidable difficulty created by the rapidity of its growth, the sudden and wonderful changes which take place in the distribution of population, in the nature and location of particular branches of industry, and of the great seats of commerce. Many of the great seaports of thirty or forty years ago are now well-nigh deserted. Regions that at the same period were wholly agricultural are now wholly manufacturing; places that then were forest-covered are now the sites of great cities; lines of travel then much frequented are now totally abandoned; inventions that were then very valuable have since been superseded by others and are now worthless. And this process is constantly going on all over the Union. Even in the same city the value of property in particular quarters changes greatly inside ten or even five years. Capital, too, deserts one locality to settle in another, as it is attracted by the discovery of peculiar natural advantages.

The effect of these changes on investments could be readily imagined, even if it were not seen. Investments which to-day seem most prudent and fortunate, may turn out in ten years fatal mistakes, owing to causes which the shrewdest calculator could neither foresee nor provide against. And this is a danger against which no provisions, however stringent, in a will can furnish any adequate precaution; for unless money can be invested in landed estates rented to farmers, or in government stocks, as in England, much must be left to the judgment of trustees, or even, if nothing is left to their judgment, much must be left to the course of events.

Our national debt, if it remains in existence long enough, will furnish a means of investment which will not be affected either by the fluctuations in the value of property or in the course of trade, let them be ever so violent. The interest on it will be paid in coin, no matter what convulsions may occur in the commercial world or what changes may occur in the distribution of population or capital. So that a family which was determined to keep what it had got, and was not anxious to get more, would find in it an easy means of transmitting a large estate from generation to generation with little or no risk, trouble, or anxiety.

Some of the consequences of this might be very important, socially if not politically. It might create and perpetuate a class, possessing secured wealth and fixed social tastes and habits, which would gradually grow in influence and size as the wealth of the country increased by gathering to itself the sons of all the "new men," and might at last form in each State a sort of aristocracy. Whether such a class could under our institutions secure any political influence is doubtful; but that it would secure a large amount of social influence there is little question; and though in many ways class feeling is highly objectionable, there are some ways in which a class of this kind would render considerable service to American society. It would create and keep up a more correct taste in art and literature by giving large numbers of educated persons time and means for its cultivation; and it would communicate greater fixity to habits, modes of thought, and social usages, by transmitting them from generation to generation.

But to calculate all the consequences that might flow from its existence would force us on a wider field of speculation than we have time or space to enter upon. The subject is an interesting one, and well worthy of discussion.

THE PARADISE OF MEDIOCRITIES.

THE wits of every age complain of the mediocrity of their times—and always with good reason. It is the vice of France and the Imperial court not less than of England and her aristocracy. What dull mediocrity rules at Berlin, Dresden, and Munich! The progress of civilization seems, indeed, to tend to develop that special combination of defects and of virtues which results in mediocrity, as it certainly tends to promote equality of condition, and to give to the average and undistinguished individual an importance and a position because of his worth as one of the species, utterly without reference to his personal merit. Nowhere is mediocrity more successful, however, than in America; and were it the fashion to erect temples, after the Roman manner, to personified qualities, the shrines erected by her grateful votaries to the goddess Mediocritas would be not less numerous than those of Fortuna Virilis or Conservatrix. Mediocrity has, no doubt, a good side. It would not be hard to show its advantages. But on a large scale it is bad, and has bad results. It leads in England, for example, to the vice of vices—snobbery. It shows itself here in a low standard of taste, of morals, and of intellectual performance. It leads to shallowness of thought and life, to want of thoroughness in work, to a content with the second-rate, destructive alike of high ambition and of purity of conscience.

It is hard to say it—but there are very few first-rate things in America, and scarcely any first-rate work done here. This is the land of promise; but the phrase becomes ironical when we draw the contrast between the mediocrity that marks the present stage of our national development in so many fields and that superiority to which we look forward, and in which we believe as the genuine and inevitable result of the unimpeded development of democratic society and institutions.

It is a slow process to educate a nation. The good Bostonian who when he dies goes to Paris, will be surprised to find how long he had been contented with the commonplace and dull excellence of the great-hearted little city. But dullness is far more tolerable than shallowness; and shallowness in thought, certainly, and in expression is the marked characteristic of our society. To be agreeably frivolous, to be shallow without emptiness, to have a light touch, is no doubt one of the fine social arts. But there are other arts of society which are unknown, or at least unpractised, here; and to understand their charm and refining influences, one must seek them abroad. Is it that our women are without the ambition to hold a salon? or our men without sense and spirit? Or is not rather that both the men and the women who, by fortune, by position, by opportunity, might do something to rescue society in our cities from its present base condition, are without that cultivation, do not possess that breeding, which would put them at ease with themselves, and raise them out of the expanding circle of the mediocrities?

So, too, in our scholarship and literature. Three or four years ago, in a number of one of our leading reviews, there were notices of some thirty recently published books. In seventeen of these notices, the epithet "profound" was applied to the work under review. To a reader of judgment, it was plain that this was merely evidence of the shallowness of the books and the shallowness of the critic. There are a few good scholars in America; there are two or three hundred men whose scholarship is of second-rate quality—neither thorough nor extensive—but who have credit for more learning than they possess. Every year the low standard of learning among us is shown by the publication of crude speculations, of second-hand ideas, of cheap acquisitions, which are sure to pass muster with the majority of our self-constituted and half-educated critics. It is our misfortune to have no body of educated men competent to pass correct judgment, and forming a court of final appeal in matters of learning; not an academy, not an organized body, but a scattered band of men of learning and cultivated critics who would leaven the whole mass of popular ignorance. Criticism as a fine art has indeed hardly been practised among us, and yet there is no country where genuine criticism would be of more use, or is more needed. We are quick to learn, we are willing to be instructed, we desire to know. There is little of the slowness or cramp of the Old World in our veins. Our public is neither bourgeois nor philistine. But alas! shallow critics match shallow authors and shallow scholars, and men who know little are flattered and misled by men who know still less.

Or take our artists. Out of a hundred painters of landscape, who has studied nature so as to paint her in truth? Our pictures, even the best of them, are pretty ornaments for the parlor, or decorations for the dining-room, and not much more. In our exhibitions, how many pieces are there that show either mastery in technical execution, or the deeper power of imagination, or even much sincere and simple feeling? Is it in vain that we ask for better things?

In all branches of work, except in some of the mechanical and manufacturing arts, the same want of thoroughness, the same second-rateness, are obvious. How few of our buildings, for instance, are good either in design or construction? From one end of the United States to the other, we look in vain for specimens of noble building. There are many costly structures, many splendid and showy private houses and public edifices—not one grand piece of architecture, not one work which exhibits the higher moods of a great nation, conscious of its force, desirous to give expression to its sense of its own perpetuity, and to bequeath to future generations the inspiring evidences of its magnanimous designs and successful achievements. We build for the present only, not for the future, and our work has no value as the symbol of our better thoughts, or as a token of our forecasting imagination. We are contented, or if not contented, at least we put up with mediocrity in this as in other things.

New York has, indeed, within the few last years shown the capacity to accomplish works against which no charge of inferiority, want of thoroughness, or want of accomplished skill can be brought, and in so doing has done a service to the whole nation which goes far to redeem the disgrace she has brought on republican institutions by her miserable failure in self-government. The Croton Water Works, the Central Park, the new building for the Academy of Design, are each in its way worthy of any community, and satisfactory examples of thorough and beautiful work. Each is not only the expression of the large and generous spirit of the people, but also of the fidelity and competence of the agents whom it has employed. The Water Works and the Park are truly popular works, such as are befitting and honorable to an enlightened people. They suit the spirit of the times, and are monuments of our modern civilization. They are as characteristic of our age as the cathedrals were of the centuries in which they rose. "There is as much conscience in the making of one of our roads," said Mr. Olmsted, the architect of the Park, "as there ever was in the building of a cathedral."

Such works as these are full of promise. They are not mere offsets to the prevalent vulgarities of "shoddyism," and to the showy pretences of fashionable mediocrity, but they are among the most effective instructors of the public. They educate taste and feeling; they create a demand for similar work, and set a model for future emulation.

But, serviceable as they may be in this way, the instruction they convey is of small moment and amount compared with the lessons on thoroughness which the whole nation has been receiving during the last four years of war. We began war thinking it might be carried on with the same carelessness as the works of peace. It was a costly and terrible mistake, out of which we have been drilled by defeat, disappointment, and debt. At length we have learned the meaning of thorough in war. The lesson will not be wholly forgotten in peace.

Much of the want of thoroughness and the shallowness of thought and work which have been and still are characteristic of the prevalence of mediocrity among us, is due to certain general conditions of our society, and to a temporary but, for the time general, tendency of our institutions. It is to be accounted for in great measure by our newness, by the largeness of the country, and the opportunities and temptations it holds out to rapidity and carelessness of performance. We have had too much work to do in a given time to do it well. We are still in the era of rail fences. Our cities have grown so fast that we have had no time to build them for posterity. We have built cabins of brick, and marble, and granite. We have no right to expect on this continent of day before yesterday the finished solidity of the results of two or three thousand years of civilization. The land of railroads, common schools, and an instructed democracy must for a time be, by the mere force of things, the happy home of flourishing mediocrity. Railroads and common schools are enemies of all feeble originalities. Where education and property are universally diffused, where there is no hereditary lower class, there must be a larger proportion of intelligent mediocrities than in any other country. The average man in America is not up to an appreciation of the best things; he does not want them; but he does want better things than the average man in any other country, and he has an appreciation of good things which is constantly becoming keener.

But though all this is true, and explains in great part the defects which are so conspicuous in our thoughts and life, yet it does not cover the whole ground. Our democracy is not to end in the development of a grand community of mediocrities. This is but its first stage. It is already entering on its second. A nation of mediocrities will not long remain so. A nation where men start on a level, where "every man has a right to be equal with every other man," where every man has "a chance," is not likely to remain for ever the "Paradise of Mediocrities."

THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY.

ONE of the finest possible illustrations of American profuseness has been the liberal endowment during the recent war of the higher institutions of learning. We do not know the whole amount of such contributions, but every statement we have seen regarding them has fallen short of what we know to be the truth. If great emergencies reveal the character of nations as well as of individuals, our reputation as a people for liberality may be regarded as established. Free institutions have not been upheld in this time of conflict by our arms alone. Patriotic men, who could not go with our armies to the fight, have been toiling at home to plant, to build, and to adorn those establishments of learning and education which, in every free country, are the permanent centres of light and influence.

Of all these recent munificent gifts, the most princely is that of Ezra Cornell, a citizen of Ithaca, who has offered to the State of New York more than half a million dollars, and about two hundred acres of land, to aid in the establishment of a university. Such generosity in the lifetime of the giver is almost unexampled. It surpasses the bequests of Astor and Smithson, and if it falls below the endowment of Girard, the terms of the gift are wiser and more liberal.

Happily the only conditions imposed by Mr. Cornell are such as the State can well accede to. Indeed, they are already accepted. It was the requirement of the generous donor that the income from the public lands appropriated to New York by act of Congress for the maintenance of scientific schools, should all be bestowed on an institution to be located in Ithaca, which should also be the recipient of the Cornell gift. These terms have been deliberately considered and approved by the Legislature of the State, a charter has been granted, the trustees are appointed, and already we hear of enquiries which are making and of plans which are forming for the new University of the Empire State.

This great benefaction has fallen into the lap of the commonwealth almost unheeded. In the hour of national triumph, a foundation full of promise for generations yet to come, has been laid as quietly as if a bank had been chartered, or the Metropolitan Washing-house had been specially incorporated. We trust that our educated men will watch the structure which is about to be built up on this liberal basis, removing what is ill advised, and strengthening what is well contrived, by all the influence which it is legitimate to exert.

As a contribution to the discussions which this new enterprise is likely to call out, we lay before our readers an outline of what has now occurred.

Congress, by an act approved in July, 1862, appropriated to every State in the Union a large amount of the public domain, to be devoted to the maintenance of schools of theoretical and practical science. The terms of the bill are vague and comprehensive enough to permit the establishment in every State of such a school or college as will best meet the wants of that particular community, and best fit in with the existing systems of public instruction. The amount of land bestowed on each State is proportioned to the number of its representatives and senators in Congress—thirty thousand acres for every delegate. Thus Connecticut, having four representatives and two senators, receives six times thirty thousand acres. The New York delegation, senators included, numbers thirty-three members, and the State is consequently entitled to nine hundred and ninety thousand acres of land. The scrip for this land must be sold, and the proceeds securely invested, as the capital of the school or schools which may be founded. No portion of principal or income can be expended for buildings. The leading object of the foundation is declared to be "to provide instruction in such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts;" but lest this should seem to be too restricted a course, it is expressly provided that other scientific and classical studies shall not necessarily be excluded. Indeed, the schools may teach whatever will promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life.

In each State special legislation is necessary, of course, for the acceptance of the trust. In Massachusetts the fund was divided between the Institute of Technology, established in Boston, and an agricultural school to be opened in Amherst. Rhode Island gave her fund to Brown University. Connecticut appropriated hers to the Sheffield Scientific School, connected with Yale College. Rutgers College was the recipient of the New Jersey portion. In New York the problem was complicated. It is our misfortune or good fortune to have in this State about a score of colleges and incipient universities. The tradition is that, in the early days of the State, some one travelled through it with a classical dictionary in his hand, and gave a classical name to every region which he found nameless. Whether the seeds of liberal culture were thus sown or not, every thriving town in the interior either has a college or expects to have one at an early day. Consequently, when it was evident that the Legislature would have the appropriation of a million of dollars, received from the public lands, every institution in esse or in posse was ready for its share. Two institutions, the People's College in Havana and the Agricultural College at Ovid, made special claim to the bounty of the State, for the object of their foundation was said to be identical with the purpose of the grant from Congress. The appropriation was made in 1863 to the school at Ovid, but eager as it was to receive the grant, it was not strong enough to comply with the conditions, and, consequently, after two years' delay, no progress was made in the establishment of the new industrial college. The State was thus seriously embarrassed.

Just here came forward Mr. Cornell. He was known to be a man of enlightened views, unquestioned integrity, and most ample resources. He offered his half million dollars and his two hundred acres of land to the State if the proposed school should be located in Ithaca. The Assembly deliberated. Fortunately the chairman of the Committee on Education in the Senate, before which the business came, was a man wise in suggestions as skilful in negotiations, Senator White of Onondaga. A thorough investigation was made, all parties concerned were heard, there were rogues to be thwarted and honest men to be convinced—but at length a conclusion was reached, the problem was solved, and the Cornell University was established at Ithaca and endowed by public and private gifts with a capital of a million and a half dollars in unencumbered and well invested property.

We will not repeat here the provisions of the bill. They are simple and judicious. A competent board of trustees has the responsibility of devising and executing the right methods of administering the trust. As yet they have not spoken to the public. It is fair to presume that they have not themselves decided the many intricate questions which the very beginning of their work involves.

The amount of money at their control seems large, but it is not adequate to the maintenance of all departments of a thorough university. We trust that no attempt will be made to cover too wide a field. Let the new establishment have a specific aim and character. In one direction let it excel. If necessary, leave other colleges to provide for other wants in the community. Let this be restricted in scope, but perfect in its operation.

We take it for granted that the ancient languages are not to be the principal means of discipline. The shade of Homer may hover with indignation over the modern Ithaca—but it will be in vain. The new university we presume will not be fettered by precedents, but will mark out for itself a new path, enlightened by the past but adapted to the present. In such a course there are great dangers, but also great advantages. The question is yet to be determined whether, in a higher seminary, the study of natural science, of modern languages, of history, and of political philosophy, may not lead to high intellectual culture, peculiarly fitted for American life.

The question often arises whether the city or the country is the place for the university. Experience shows that learning flourishes alike in the mart and in the field. In a metropolis like New York or Philadelphia or Boston, libraries and scientific collections, and art and eloquence, abound. A country town like Ithaca can offer no such attractions. But quiet hours of study and reflection, simple modes of life, the wholesome and refreshing influences of good scenery, and moderate expenses, seem to be more than a balance for the advantages of a city.

It may be intrusive for us to offer a suggestion to the managers of the new university, but we cannot refrain from doing so when we reflect how constantly in this country one error is repeated. It is not bricks and mortar, but men and books, which constitute a university. We delight in appropriate and decorated architecture. We hope the day has gone by when a row of brick factories will be deemed good enough for college buildings. But we trust that a desire for suitable edifices will not prevent the supply of higher wants. Let first-rate teachers be first secured. Let no expense be spared to secure the highest educational ability which the country will afford. Then, as the scholars assemble, as the courses and plans of the university are developed, let such buildings go up as will best provide for the wants which have been created.

When Prussia had been devastated by the Napoleon wars, Frederick William III. reinstated his capital in all its former glory, and raised it to higher renown by founding the University of Berlin. The building was a plain structure, with enough ill-ventilated lecture rooms for many hundred students. The attraction was the fame of the professors. Stein, and William von Humboldt, and Wolf, and Schleiermacher took part in the foundation, and a host of men not less distinguished have followed in their steps. We trust that at Ithaca an equally good representation of American scholarship will be found, with equally great results.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE numerous readers in America of Miss Muloch's novels and other books may feel interested in learning that their old favorite will no longer entertain them under the same name, owing to her recent marriage. Her husband is Mr. Craik, eldest son of Prof. Craik, of Queen's College, Belfast, well-known by his co-operation in the literary enterprises of Mr. Charles Knight, and his "History of English Literature," presented in such handsome style to the American public by Mr. C. Scribner. Mr. Craik is a gentleman of talent and culture, but has led a retired life, apart from general society, in consequence of being crippled by a railroad accident a few years since. He is several years younger than his bride, who is yet on the sunny side of forty, though the list of her works and the wide extent of fame she has acquired show how the labor of a life can be crowded into the space of a few years, when the will and the ability coincide.

—Messrs. Ticknor & Fields entitle their new and elegant complete impression of Tennyson's poems the "Farringford Edition," from the poet's home of that name in the Isle of Wight. They may now add the cabalistic letters, F.R.S., to his former title of poet-laureate, as he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society at the last meeting of that body, in company with a goodly band of fourteen associates, who are thus analyzed: two physicians, one mathematician, three astronomers, three natural historians, two engineers, one chemist, one geologist, one traveler (Sir L. McClintock), and one poet—the laureate. The composition of this body, which may be called the scientific parliament of England, is carefully guarded from unworthy intrusion, no persons being recommended for election unless they possess some degree of pretension, founded on the cultivation of science, that adapts them for the honor. It would be interesting to know in what branch of philosophical enquiry the tastes of Alfred Tennyson have developed themselves, but as well as we remember, his poetry affords no clue to the question. The Royal Society embraces all science within its domain. There is a fashion, however, in philosophy as well as in more frivolous things, and its Transactions take their pervading color from the taste of the day. At one time pure mathematics were in the ascendant; to them succeeded researches in physiology and anatomy. At present the most absorbing topics are unquestionably those connected with the operations of the great cosmical agents, as light, heat, electricity, magnetism, etc.—investigations that by their grandeur may well kindle and excite the imagination of the most prosaic of mortals, and add fresh fire to a poet's inspirations.

—Noble authors increase so rapidly in number that a new Horace Walpole is required to chronicle them. The last one in the field is Viscount Milton, the heir of the title and colossal fortune (embracing the domains of the Straffords and Rockinghams of old) now centred in the earldom of Fitzwilliam. The quotation about "scorning delights, and living laborious days" is, perhaps, too hackneyed for longer use, but it aptly expresses the manly vigor of purpose that led a young man thus situated to engage in the search for what is called, in the title-page of his book, "the North-West Passage by land," in reality an expedition from the Atlantic to the Pacific, through British territory, by one of the northern passes in the Rocky Mountains, at a much higher latitude than had ever before been traversed in that region. Lord Milton's companion was a Cambridge B.A., Mr. W. B. Cheadle. The hardships suffered by them were very great, in spite of all the appliances that civilization could command in a district so desolate and untrodden. Though some stress is laid on the commercial utility of the discovery, it is probably most memorable as solving a problem in physical geography and bringing out prominently the good qualities of "pluck" and endurance, the common property of the Anglo-Saxon race. The narrative of the expedition forms a handsome volume, well illustrated with sketches and maps of the route.

—The great event of the present season, in London, to book collectors is undoubtedly the sale of the library of Mr. George Offor—as that of the dramatic and literary collections of Mr. Daniel was of the previous year. Mr. Offor was famous in England and America for the extent and variety of his collection of rare and curious editions of the Bible in all languages, but principally of the English versions from the days of Tyndale and Coverdale downward. The entire sale comprises nearly four thousand lots, and will occupy eleven days in their disposal; of this number twelve hundred lots relate alone to the Bible. They form an assemblage perfectly unique, embracing undescribed or little known editions of the Bibles of Cranmer, Coverdale, Mathewes, etc., the Testaments of Tyndale, Geneva, etc., and hundreds of similar black-letter relics that testify to the untiring energy of the early Reformers, while their scarcity proves how sharply the contest was maintained by the dominant Church party, who sought to destroy every vestige that told of free enquiry while they had the power to do so. It is well known that the vote of one executor only prevented the sale in one lot of Mr. Daniel's library to a wealthy and spirited American amateur, at an expense considerably exceeding (in the existing state of the currency) one hundred thousand dollars. It is equally certain that many of Mr. Offor's choicest treasures are destined to find a resting-place in the United States. Recently Dr. Henry Cotton, the accomplished bibliographer, speaks, in one of his works, of "the steady and strong tide which is fast carrying many of our rarest and most curious books to the western shores of the Atlantic, and depositing them at New York and Boston." This tide is now flowing more vigorously than ever, and Biblical collectors, as Mr. Lenox, of New York, and Mr. Geo. Livermore, of Boston, are pretty certain to avail themselves of so rare an opportunity. Another specialité of Mr. Offor's was the Works of John Bunyan. No less than five hundred and sixteen lots of editions of his writings, or books illustrative of them, occur on the catalogue. Among them is Bunyan's own Bible, given to his son Joseph, and another book with his autograph, written during his unlettered days, in primitive fashion—"John Bunyan is Boock." Mr. Offor was the editor of the best edition of Bunyan's works, and had made a diligent use of these rare volumes. Another unique book is the study and pulpit Bible of the famous Nonconformist divine, Richard Baxter, with autographic memoranda and list of the births and deaths of his family. The catalogue, made out with great care, forms an attractive book of over three hundred pages. The sale is now progressing, and we shall give the prices brought by some of the rarer articles in a future number.

—The literature of the rebellion in England culminates, and in all probability ends, in "Belle Boyd in Camp and Prison," a narrative recently published, to which the indefatigable George A. Sala, moved apparently by motives of gallantry, contributes an introduction. He entreats the public favor for her as "a warm-hearted, impulsive, and brave woman of the South," who dashed into the field, maddened by the wrongs and cruelties inflicted on her people, etc., etc. Though sufficiently bitter against the North, Miss B. B. (or Mrs. Hardinge) is hardly so foolish as her advocate, and confesses that both her deeds and her sufferings have been overrated. Her heroic career began with shooting a Federal soldier who had insulted her mother, a story that, if true (for particulars are carefully avoided), was a strange act for a sensitive, refined girl at the age of seventeen. Her principal achievement after this was the conveyance of contraband information to Stonewall Jackson on a critical occasion that enabled him to surprise the United States troops in the Shenandoah Valley. The account of the Belle's imprisonment in the Old Capitol Prison at Washington affords unwilling testimony to the clemency exercised by the Government in its dealings with one who gloried in the functions of a spy. Scarcely a grain of historical truth can be winnowed from the heap of ill-tempered and untrustworthy gossip of which the work consists. It is valueless except as a means of practising on the credulity of John Bull, and is not worth a reprint.

—The genius of M. Doré, the French artist, is now fully appreciated in England, where the impression from the original wood-cuts of his illustrated edition of Don Quixote, issued in monthly numbers, has met with immense success, and we believe counts a very large number of subscribers in the United States. Though the acquaintance with Spanish life, scenery, costume, manners, etc., displayed in these illustrations is something wonderful, the conception of the hero is unsatisfactory, and few will rank the "Don Quichotte" highest among M. Doré's productions. We are glad to see that an edition of his far superior "Dante" illustrations, accompanied by Cary's translation of the "Divina Commedia," is announced in London by the same publishers, Messrs. Cassell & Co., who are stimulated to the effort by the extensive patronage awarded to the Don Quixote. Though still a very young man (born in 1833), M. Doré has displayed already a fertility of invention and execution such as the world has never before seen, and in fact such as it is difficult for the mind to comprehend. In an essay on his characteristics as an author written by a friend and fellow painter, Mr. Hamerton, last year, the number of his published designs was estimated at more than forty thousand, and these, many of them, among the largest and most elaborate drawings ever made for book illustrations. His easel pictures are also numerous. M. Doré is now engaged in illustrating the Bible for a publishing firm who intend to excel in its production every previous embellished book.

—The earliest of our private printing associations, "The Bradford Club," has just brought out, in limited number for its members only, a volume that should possess special attractions for every Knickerbocker. It is "Anthology of New Netherland, or Translations from the Early Dutch Poets of New York (Steendam, Selyns, De Sille), with Memoirs of their Lives, by Henry C. Murphy." How completely the memory of these classics of a country "that knew of none" had faded away from the recollection of their ungrateful posterity, it is needless to say. To the researches of Mr. Murphy, our best scholar in all that relates to the literature of Holland, while Minister at the Hague their rehabilitation is due; and their second lease of fame bids fair to be more lasting than the first. The Bradford Club have in hand, we learn, a work that will be a proper tribute to the worthy from whom they derive their name—William Bradford, the first printer of the Province of New York. It is a catalogue raisonné of all the known productions of his press yet extant, with fac-similes, and got up in a manner worthy of the subject and its undertakers.

—Though something more than a mere literary man, Sir Joseph Paxton had sufficient connection with books to insure a place for the record of his recent death among the losses sustained by literature, art, and science. He was physically and mentally a fine specimen of the working classes from whence he rose, and, as far as their peculiar attribute of labor is concerned, to which he continued to belong during his busy and well occupied life. When working as laborer for a few shillings a week in the Horticultural Society's Gardens at Chiswick, his intelligence and civility attracted the notice of the Duke of Devonshire, who appointed him head gardener at Chatsworth. Here he gradually succeeded to the stewardship and entire management of the Duke's large Derbyshire estates. The exigencies of the ducal conservatories finally led to the erection of the great iron and glass structure for the accommodation of the "Victoria Regia" that gave the hint for Paxton's design for the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park, and ensured its reception and the consequent rejection of 233 other plans. He was knighted after this great success, practised as an architect, and sat in Parliament as member for Coventry, still continuing his honorable connection with the Duke of Devonshire, who presented him shortly before his own death with a life policy for £20,000. His "Magazine of Botany" in 15 volumes, and "Flower Garden," are among the most beautiful illustrated works of the kind, and his other contributions to the literature of his favorite science were numerous and valuable. Sir J. Paxton was born in 1803, and died on the 8th of June last.

—The obituary of the month includes also the name of another man of science intimately connected with the annals of Polar exploration, whose theatre has been this continent. Sir John Richardson commenced his career as a surgeon in the navy. The spirit and energy displayed by him when in the service pointed him out as a proper companion for Sir John Franklin, whom he accompanied in two Arctic expeditions; and he subsequently undertook the charge of one of the parties despatched in the vain search for traces of his former comrade, spending altogether seven years in these regions. Few accounts of human endurance equal in interest Sir J. Richardson's narrative of the sufferings sustained by himself and companions from the failure of the means of sustenance during his first overland journey. The striking account he gives of the shooting of the Indian guide who had played them false, and was only waiting the gradual exhaustion of the survivors to appropriate to himself their property, etc., is a situation of more than dramatic interest, simply and earnestly told, that must live in the memories of all who have once read it. Sir J. Richardson's labors, in illustration of the Polar natural history, were important. They are summed up in his large work, "Fauna Borealis Americani." Sir John married a niece of Franklin's, and died in a pleasant retirement in the Lake country, at Grassmere, after a life of energetic labor.

—Sir Lascelles Wraxall, whose death is also chronicled in June, at the age of thirty-seven, inherited the baronetcy conferred on his grandfather of memoir-writing fame with but little to support it. He commenced life in the army, but latterly took up the career of a littérateur, and displayed at this vocation a commendable industry in the absence of higher qualities. His books, produced within a few years, are numerous enough to fill the shelf of a circulating library; and, with the possible exception of his "Memoirs of Queen Caroline Matilda of Denmark," can scarcely aspire to a more lengthened existence. The sole connection of his literary ancestor with public affairs was derived from his participation in an attempt to rescue from imprisonment this ill-fated sister of George III., and some original materials derived from this source give permanent value to the work.

—Among recently published scientific works in England is an elaborate monograph by Mr. R. A. Proctor of the planet "Saturn and its System." His attention was called to the subject by the anomalies presented by the physical conditions of that body, and after years of study and observation he propounds a hypothesis that explains more fully than any other the phenomena of its unique rings. He believes they are not continuous bodies, either solid or fluid, but a multitude of loose, disconnected secondary planets, grouped like a bead necklace round its equatorial regions, just as if we were furnished, not with one moon, but as many moons as would span the whole earth. Whether or not a scientific truth, this is a fine poetical idea, illustrating in a striking manner our conceptions of the lavish opulence of nature's plan. Mr. Proctor is of St. John's College, Cambridge, the institution which produced Mr. Adams, the co-discoverer of the planet Neptune, and famous for the eminence of its mathematicians and astronomers in a community where all are scientific.

—The interest attaching to bibliography, not in regard to the fantastic fopperies that usually pass under that name, but as a study of the sources of knowledge, is increased by the impossibility of a subject being exhausted by the labors of any one individual, and the constant opportunities afforded by its pursuit for fresh discoveries. Thus Mr. Henry G. Bohn, who probably has more active working knowledge of books than any other man alive, had published only a year or two since a bibliography of Shakespeare, in his own words, "elaborated up to an extreme point," when Mr. Thimm, an intelligent foreign bookseller of London, brings out "Shakesperiana from 1564 to 1864," which adds at least one hundred and twenty English works to Mr. Bohn's list, and nearly three hundred in the German and French departments. Mr. Thimm's book also contains interesting sketches of the progress of Shakespearian criticism in England, Germany, and France, embracing many facts new to English readers. It appears certain that even in the lifetime of Shakespeare his plays were represented in Germany by English strolling actors, and were speedily adapted to the German popular stage. Critics, however, lived in a higher sphere, and ignored the existence of these favorites of the people. Morhof, writing in 1682, said that John Dryden had written with much erudition on "Dramatica Poesi," but of Shakespeare he confesses he knows nothing. Fifty years later Bodmer, a German critic of great celebrity, was acquainted only with the name (and not rightly that) of an English poet, "Saspar" or "Sasper." Even his first translator, Wieland, pronounces his plays to be "full of chaff and empty straw." Intelligent criticism commences with Lessing and Nicolai about 1760. In France Voltaire was the first person who spoke of Shakespeare's "barbarous genius" with a warmth that offended the literary public of the day, that could bear no approach to rivalry of its established faith in Racine and Corneille. Since that time about twelve different French versions evince a more liberal estimate of literary merit.

—The new work of Mr. Grote, "Plato, and the other companions of Sokrates," proves to be a book well justifying the labor of years bestowed upon it, and second only in importance to the same writer's "History ot Greece." Though a reprint is promised, the sight of the three bulky volumes makes us fear that an American edition may be postponed till a more convenient season, when paper is cheaper and printers' wages lower than at present. The writer's purpose is to exhibit, at its full height, the activity of Greek speculative thought, as contrasting and supplementing the political and social manifestations that form the matter of history proper. Two chapters sketch the pre-Sokratic philosophy, preparatory to the full and exhaustive review and analysis of the life, writings, and opinions of Plato that form the body of the work. As Sokrates wrote nothing, it is to Plato that recourse must be had for the full scope and purpose of his philosophy, rather than to Xenophon, who, though a faithful reporter, presents us with the practical side of the sage, and "never soars high in the regions of ideality, or grasps at ethereal visions, like Plato." Another book, of which Aristotle is the hero, is promised by Mr. Grote, should his health permit its execution. He will then have accomplished the purpose he has set before him, to delineate the originality and grandeur of Greek philosophy, as exemplified in its two principal heroes, while yet it was purely Hellenic, unmixed by any amalgamation with Oriental veins of thought—"before (in the happy language of the writer) the Orontes and the Jordan had yet begun to flow westward and impart their own color to the waters of Attica and Latium."

—The reprint of Mr. Collier's "Account of the Rarest Books in the English Language," alluded to last week, has been undertaken by Mr. David G. Francis, of 506 Broadway, who is now receiving the names of subscribers to the limited edition that he purposes to issue. The work will be executed at the Cambridge Riverside Press, forming four handsome volumes of the size well known by its adoption for the standard works proceeding from the same establishment. It will not be stereotyped, and only a sufficient number will be printed to supply the probable demand. All students of Shakespeare will find in this book the fullest exhibition of the literature contemporary with the great dramatist—from whence the only satisfactory illustrations of his writings can be drawn—that has ever been brought together by unequalled opportunities for research and untiring vigor in the pursuit. It is the last and most important offering of a literary veteran in elucidation of the studies that his life has been too brief to exhaust.

—After the sale of four editions of Lord Derby's translation of "The Iliad" without alteration, he has submitted the fifth impression to revision, profiting, no doubt, by the critical opinions called forth by his work. The alterations are said to be very slight and unimportant, so that the book may now be presumed to take its permanent and acknowledged place in English literature. Its reception in the United States has been so cordial that we understand an edition in the popular "blue and gold," or small pocket size, is in preparation by the American publisher, in addition to the handsome library copy already issued.

FORSYTH'S CICERO.*

In these volumes, which are elegantly reprinted from the London edition, Mr. Forsyth, well known as author of "Hortensius," "Napoleon at St. Helena and Sir Hudson Lowe," "History of Trial by Jury," presents a new biography of Cicero, not only as an orator and politician, but as a private man, speaking and acting like other men in the ordinary affairs of life. The work is faithfully done according to the author's capacity. The letters of Cicero have been diligently studied, and the labors of the most recent scholars, English and German, have been carefully used. The style is easy, natural, occasionally piquant, never florid or highly adorned, but business-like rather, and with a certain raciness as of actual life which holds the attention. An extensive acquaintance with the history of legal usages enables Mr. Forsyth to explain the Roman customs in a way that makes them intelligible to the ordinary reader, and places him in the midst of the political and social world of the great city as no other writer has done. His book, however, is gravely deficient in literary art. While it is composed without affectation, it is composed entirely without elegance. There is not a flash of brilliancy in both the volumes. The writer of a biography like this may not only be permitted to indulge in an occasional play of imagination or fancy, it is expected and demanded of him that he shall light up his picture with all the glory he can legitimately command. The actual scenery of Cicero's life was attractive, often gorgeous, and it was exceedingly diversified. His working time was spent in the city of Rome; his months of leisure were passed at his different villas, which were placed amid the loveliest landscapes of Southern Italy. But we have in these pages no picture of Rome, or of any part of it, not even of the Forum or the Capitol; and the reader's fancy tries in vain to bring up any one of those delicious residences among the mountains or by the sea whose names are associated for ever with philosophy, letters, and elegant hospitality. Merivale's history is level almost to monotony. We read his calm judicial pages, thirsting as we go along for the sparkling fountain of poetic feeling. But Merivale is a splendid artist compared with Forsyth. His descriptions of Cicero's villa, overlooking the Campagna, of the retreat of Tiberius at Capri, of Cæsar's triumphal procession into Rome, would together, or even singly, make Mr. Forsyth's literary fortune. To write about a famous Italian and leave out Italy is unpardonable.

The author's legal accomplishments are a disadvantage to him as well as an advantage. He gives undue space to the law cases which Cicero undertook, and dwells with tedious and pedantic minuteness on points as little calculated to interest the reader in Mr. Forsyth as in Cicero. The "profession" crops out with a prominence that is needless, and not seldom impertinent, as when it seems to assume that none but lawyers are capable of making ethical discriminations in the simplest questions.

A graver fault than either of those we have mentioned is, in our judgment, the absence of a suitable historical background for the display of his main figure. A great historical personage should be surrounded by the historical personages and scenes whereof he made a part, if he is to be fairly seen in his just proportions. There must be something like a mise en scène skilfully arranged. Mr. Forsyth should have given us a condensed, but firm and vivid sketch of the Empire as it was when Cicero lived, of the men who were passing off the stage on one side and of the men who were coming on to the stage from the other. He does nothing of the kind. He is content with adverting, in a cursory way, to the passages in which his hero played a part, leaving wide spaces of the story unfilled with record or comment, so that we are obliged to take a succession of leaps from one episode to another, very disagreeably conscious that we are losing a great many things that we ought to know before we can intelligently proceed. The reader who is unfortunately ignorant of Roman history, as most readers are, will find himself in the condition of a man picking his way across a marsh, wondering how he reached his actual footing, and wondering yet more how he is to leave it for another.

In treating the character of Cicero himself, Mr. Forsyth exhibits a fairness and candor which we can hardly praise more than they deserve. He is no eulogist; he is not even an apologist. He has no passion, and probably finds it easy to hold the scales of an impartial judgment. He speaks more severely of Middleton, the fulsome panegyrist, than of Drumann or Mommsen, the steady depreciators of the man he celebrates. He has clearly studied for himself; and he judges for himself; and he would rather his readers should follow his example than accept his criticism. He dilates on Cicero's vanity—smiles at his eagerness to perpetuate the memory of his great consulship by a Greek and a Latin history, and by a poem, all from his own hand—calls attention to the absurdity of his figure, as he wanders about with his troublesome lictors, cherishing "his idle and silly dream" of a triumph he did not deserve—and laughs a little grimly at his declining the perilous embassy to Antony on the ground that his life was too precious to the state to be sacrificed. He reports some of his jokes with due apology for their worthlessness and due rebuke of their indecency. He details several cases of insincerity—amounting to dishonor and false hood—and does not spare his condemnation. He mentions the ora tor's cool proposal to deny the authorship of a speech which was making him unpopular—refers to his letter to the historian whom he pressed to write a history of the famous consulship, and to write it without regard to literal facts, but with such a latitude of panegyric as would go beyond his private estimate of the actor's merit —and narrates fairly the defence of Gabinius, in the course of which he came forward "as a witness to the character of a man whom he had branded with every term of opprobrium and contempt." He quotes with astonishment the orator's flattering letter to Appius, whom, in another letter to his friend Atticus, he had charged with every kind of outrage as a governor, with every form of vice as a man. He characterizes as "abject flattery" a short oration delivered to Cæsar, the man whom of all others he hated, and whose assassination later was a cause of rejoicing to him. He expresses manly disgust at his complimentary letter to Antony, complying with a request which, as he wrote to Atticus, "showed such disgraceful baseness on Antony's part, that he sometimes almost wished to have Cæsar back;" and he is astonished at finding Cicero on the most intimate terms with the infamous Dolabella, cracking jokes at his table, and doing his best to ingratiate himself with the victorious party of Cæsar, justifying his course at the same time by the plea that he must march with the time. He makes no attempt to extenuate Cicero's conduct in the case of Scaptius vs. Inhabitants of Salamis, in which case he connived at an atrocious swindle of the Salaminians, in order to gratify the "impudent request" of a personal friend. Nor does he expect us to be other than shocked that the great man should have selected as a husband for his daughter "a profligate young nobleman, one of the worst men of that bad age," who was, moreover, married when he first set his heart on him. That Cicero, seeing through Pompey, as he showed that he did at last, discovering that he was in all respects as ambitious as Cæsar himself, having full revelation of his horrible purpose to invade Italy with legions of foreign barbarians and lay it waste with fire and sword,—that Cicero, understanding this, and feeling all the atrocity of it, should still cling to his former idol, and give as a reason for his allegiance that it would be ungrateful to abandon the man who had conferred so many favors on him, strikes Mr. Forsyth, as it must strike everybody, with wonder at the great moralist who could so interpret his duty, with amazement at the patriot who could thus put his personal feeling before his country's safety, with scorn of the man whose personal honor could hesitate in such an emergency to choose between principle and prejudice.

And to counterbalance these terrible defects, as he himself diplays and pronounces them, Mr. Forsyth puts forward—what? Cicero's amiability and kindness of disposition, his conscientiousness in the discharge of the routine of his duty, his exemplary, generous, even noble conduct as quæstor in Sicily and as proconsul in Asia Minor, his courage on the occasion of the Catilinian conspiracy, and his magnificent audacity as the deliverer of the philippics against Antony. His military exploits he passes lightly over, hardly awarding to them their merited praise, under the circumstances; and his real grandeur as a man of thought scarcely attracts his attention. Surely this leaves the argument weak in favor of Cicero. And yet, our author records his judgment that "Cicero loved his country with a passionate affection;" that "he never could act boldly unless his conscience was at ease;" that "in the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey he was always haunted with the idea that he might be deciding wrong;" that "his moral instinct was too strong to allow him to resort to means of which his conscience disapproved;" that "his constant aim was to do right;" that "his standard of morality was as high as it was perhaps possible to elevate it by the mere light of nature, and to fall below that standard made him feel dissatisfied with himself and ashamed."

We submit that this verdict does not accord with the evidence as laid before us by Mr. Forsyth himself. It is very easy to say that Cicero's vanity "was after all a harmless failing;" but was it a harmless failing that kept him on two occasions from going on important embassies because in his conceit the state could not spare him? Was it a harmless failing that led him to desire that history might be falsified for the glorification of his consul ship? Was it a harmless failing that kept him dawdling about in the vain expectation of a military triumph when urgent public affairs required his attention?

"The chief fault of Cicero's moral character was a want of sincerity," says Mr. Forsyth, in a careless tone, as if he were speaking of some slight foible. But, in the course ofhis narrative, that "want of sincerity" betrays Cicero into actions which, in such a man, must be characterized as crimes and turpitudes that can neither be justified nor pardoned.

"He was one of the most forgiving of men,and it was in perfect sincerity that he uttered the noble sentiment that he was not ashamed to confess that his enmities were mortal and his friendships eternal." But that "noble sentiment" was uttered in a speech wherein he undertook to justify his unprincipled defence of Gabinius—of which speech, at that particular passage, Mr. Forsyth remarks, "Brave words, but, after all we know of the circumstances, they cannot be accepted as true." Nor must it be forgotten, in speaking of the "forgiveness," that Cicero spoke with disgusting levity of Cæsar's assassination, and prayed that the gods would damn his soul.

Cicero was a trimmer. Mr. Forsyth quotes from Macrobius the story that Laberius, a knight, when looking for a seat at the theatre, was accosted by the orator, who said, "I would take you in here if I had room," on which Laberius replied, "What! you have no room! I am surprised at that, for you commonly sit on two stools." Our author rebuts the charge of irresolution by an appeal to the decision exhibited in the contest with Catiline, and in the final struggle with Antony. But the resolution in these cases was spasmodic rather than constitutional. In the conflict with Catiline, Cicero was nerved to the utmost by personal ambition, which seized this open opportunity for aggrandizement; and in the contest with Antony he was strung up to the highest pitch by personal ambition, which could not bear to forfeit a fame so dearly won. In the first instance he had a reputation to make; in the second a reputation to save. Cicero had no steadfastness. He could not be trusted either to counsel, to lead, or to follow. The conspirators against Cæsar did not sound him, because they were not sure of him. He could not forget himself either his personal safety or his personal fame. Each party wanted him, and each party thought it could have him; but no party could hold him, for success was fluctuating, and his allegiance wavered with fortune.

As compared with other great men of his age, Cicero was certainly a man of extraordinary private virtue. He was not cruel; he was not rapacious; he was not licentious; he was not intemperate in meat and drink; he was not a tyrant in his family; he was capable of at least one constant friendship, that with Atticus. His private and domestic life are, on the whole, rather lovely to contemplate in that hideous age. But when we seek the real greatness of Cicero, we find ourselves instinctively turning away from the actor in human affairs to the thinker on themes that concern all mankind; from the vacillating politician to the patriot whose love of country was certainly purer than was common in his time; from the jealous competitor for the paltry distinctions of the Roman populace to the sage whose comprehensive mind could in the day of trouble breathe the atmosphere of serene ideas and sweep the whole horizon of speculative thought; from the vain courtier of the powerful and the base to the noble moralist whose conceptions of human dignity and duty are worthy of an advanced Christian age.

We complain of Mr. Forsyth that he does his hero less than justice by trying to vindicate him on grounds of ordinary morality, instead of throwing about his person the glory of his illuminated and illuminating mind. He rates him too high as an individual; he rates him too low as an intelligence. Merivale is more just, and more generous, too, though less indulgent. Merivale's verdict is terribly severe, but his tribute is magnificent. Cicero, he says, "is convicted from his own mouth of vanity, inconstancy, sordidness, jealousy, malice, selfishness, and timidity." "From his pages there flows an incessant stream of abuse of all the great masters of political power in his time." "He certainly left on his contemporaries an unfavorable impression of the qualities of his heart." "To the pursuit of fame he sacrificed many interests and friendships." "He had no nice sense of honor, and was controlled by no delicacy of sentiment, where public opinion was silent, or a transaction strictly private." But Merivale does not forget that Cicero is his own most cruel accuser, and has unconsciously submitted his character to a test under which none but saintly characters could stand. Those letters to Atticus, in which he speaks to his bosom friend with a frankness which few people indulge in even in their secret closets, furnish the material for his condemnation. The generous mind is half inclined to overlook faults thus disclosed. There is something mean in bringing against a man the secrets of the confessional; and while we cannot help noting the confession, we let the frankness that uttered them dim the impression they make.

And while Cicero's avowal of his moral weaknesses is a palliation of his weaknesses, it is positively and grandly to his credit that we find ourselves judging him by a higher moral standard than we apply to other distinguished men of antiquity. There is that in him that demands this at our hands. We feel after all that his was a great intellect and a great soul. We bear testimony to something lovely in his character, high in his aspiration, noble in his precept, beyond all ancient example. To use the language of Merivale, "Cicero lived and died in faith. He made converts to the belief in virtue, and had disciples in the wisdom of love." We feel no compunction in applying to the man what Quintilian says of the orator: "You may be sure that you are in the way of improvement if Cicero is your favorite."

MISS MACKENZIE.*

We have long entertained for Mr. Trollope a partiality of which we have yet been somewhat ashamed. Perhaps, indeed, we do wrong to say that we have entertained it. It has rather usurped our hospitality, and has resisted several attempts at forcible expulsion. If it remains, therefore, in however diminished vigor, we confess that it will be through our weakness.

Miss Mackenzie is a worthy gentlewoman, who, coming at the age of thirty-six into a comfortable little fortune, retires to enjoy it at a quiet watering-place, where, in the course of time, she is beset by a brace of mercenary suitors. After the lapse of a year she discovers that she holds her property by a wrongful title, and is compelled to transfer it to her cousin, a widowed baronet, with several children, who, however, gallantly repairs the injury thus judicially inflicted, by making her his wife. The work may be qualified, therefore, in strictness, as the history of the pecuniary embarrassments of a middle-aged spinster. The subject has, at least, the charm of novelty, a merit of which the author has wisely appreciated the force. We had had heroines of many kinds, maidens in their teens, yea, even in their units, and matrons in their twenties, but as yet we had had no maidens in their thirties. We, for our part, have often been called upon to protest against the inveterate and excessive immaturity of the ladies in whose fortunes we are expected to interest ourselves, and we are sincerely grateful to Mr. Trollope for having practically recognized the truth that a woman is potentially a heroine as long as she lives. To many persons a middle-aged woman in love trenches upon the ridiculous. Such persons may be assured, however, that although there is considerable talk about this passion in "Miss Mackenzie," there is very little of its substance. Mr. Trollope has evidently been conscious of the precarious nature of his heroine's dignity, and in attempting to cancel the peril to which it is exposed, he has diminished the real elements of passion. This is apt to be the case in Mr. Trollope's stories. Passion has to await the convenience of so many other claimants that in the end she is but scantily served. As for action, we all know what we are to expect of Mr. Trollope in this direction; and the admirers of "quiet novels," as they are somewhat euphuistically termed, will not be disappointed here. Miss Mackenzie loses her brother, and assumes his property: she then adopts her little niece, takes lodgings at Littlebath, returns a few visits, procures a seat at church, puts her niece at school, receives a few awkward visits from a couple of vulgar bachelors, quarrels with her pastor's wife, goes to stay with some dull old relatives, loses her money, falls out with the dull relatives, is taken up by a fashionable cousin and made to serve in a fancy fair, and finally receives and accepts an offer from another cousin. Except the acquisition and loss of her property, which events are detailed at great length, she has no adventures. Her life could not well be more peaceful. She certainly suffers and enjoys less than most women. Granting, however, that the adventures entailed upon her by her luckless £800 a year are such as may properly mark her for our observation and compensate for the lack of incidents more dramatic, Mr. Trollope may consider that he has hit the average of the experience of unmarried English ladies. It is perhaps impossible to overstate the habitual monotony of such lives; and at all events, as far as the chronicler of domestic events has courage to go in this direction, so far will a certain proportion of facts bear him out. Literally, then, Mr. Trollope accomplishes his purpose of being true to common life. But in reading his pages, we were constantly induced to ask ourselves whether he is equally true to nature; that is, whether in the midst of this multitude of real things, of uncompromisingly real circumstances, the persons put before us are equally real. Mr. Trollope has proposed to himself to describe those facts which are so close under every one's nose that no one notices them. Life is vulgar, but we know not how vulgar it is till we see it set down in his pages. It may be said therefore that the emotions which depend upon such facts as these cannot be too prosaic; that as prison discipline makes men idiots, an approach, however slight, to this kind of influence perceptibly weakens the mind. We are yet compelled to doubt whether men and women of healthy intellect take life, even in its smallest manifestation, as stupidly as Miss Mackenzie and her friends. Mr. Trollope has, we conceive, simply wished to interest us in ordinary mortals: it has not been his intention to introduce us to a company of imbeciles. But, seriously, we do not consider these people to be much better. Detach them from their circumstances, reduce them to their essences, and what do they amount to? They are but the halves of men and women. The accumulation of minute and felicitous circumstances which constitutes the modern novel sheds such a glamour of reality over the figures which sustain the action that we forbear to scrutinize them separately. The figures are the generals in the argument; the facts are the particulars. The persons should accordingly reflect life upon the details, and not borrow it from them. To do so is only to borrow the contagion of death. This latter part is the part they play, and with this result, as it seems to us, in "Miss Mackenzie." It is possible that this result is Mr. Trollope's misfortune rather than his fault. He has encountered it in trying to avoid an error which he doubtless considers more pernicious still, that of overcharging nature. He has doubtless done his best to give us the happy middle truth. But ah, if the truth is not so black as she is sometimes painted, neither is she so pale!

* "Miss Mackenzie. A novel. By Anthony Trollope." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1865.

We do not expect from the writers of Mr. Trollope's school (and this we esteem already a great concession) that they shall contribute to the glory of human nature; but we may at least exact that they do not wantonly detract from it. Mr. Trollope's offence is, after all, deliberate. He has deliberately selected vulgar illustrations. His choice may indeed be explained by an infirmity for which he is not responsible: we mean his lack of imagination. But when a novelist's imagination is weak, his judgment should be strong. Such was the case with Thackeray. Mr. Trollope is of course wise, in view of the infirmity in question, in devoting himself to those subjects which least expose it. He is an excellent, an admirable observer; and such an one may accomplish much. But why does he not observe great things as well as little ones? It was by doing so that Thackeray wrote "Henry Esmond." Mr. Trollope's devotion to little things, inveterate, self-sufficient as it is, begets upon the reader the very disagreeable impression that not only no imagination was required for the work before him, but that a man of imagination could not possibly have written it. This impression is fostered by many of Mr. Trollope's very excellences. A more richly-gifted writer would miss many of his small (that is, his great) effects. It must be admitted, however, that he would obtain on the other hand a number of truly great ones. Yet, as great effects are generally produced at present by small means, Mr. Trollope is master of a wide field. He deals wholly in small effects. His manner, like most of the literary manners of the day, is a small manner. And what a strange phenomenon, when we reflect upon it, is this same small manner! What an anomaly in a work of imagination is such a chapter as that in which our author describes Mrs. Tom Mackenzie's shabby dinner party. It is as well described as it possibly could be. Nothing is omitted. It is almost as good as certain similar scenes in the "Book of Snobs." It makes the reader's ear tingle and his cheeks to redden with shame. Nothing, we say, is omitted; but, alas! nothing is infused. The scene possesses no interest but such as resides in the crude facts: and as this is null, the picture is clever, it is faithful, it is even horrible, but it is not interesting. There we touch upon the difference between the great manner and the small manner; herein lies the reason why in such scenes Mr. Trollope is only almost as good as Thackeray. It can generally be said of this small manner that it succeeds; cleverness is certain of success; it never has the vertigo; it is only genius and folly that fail. But in what does it succeed? That is the test question: the question which it behooves us to impose now-a-days with ever growing stringency upon works of art; for it is the answer to this question that should approve or condemn them. It is small praise to say of a novelist that he succeeds in mortifying the reader. Yet Mr. Trollope is master of but two effects: he renders his reader comfortable or the reverse. As long as he restricts himself to this scale of emotion, of course he has no need of imagination, for imagination speaks to the heart. In the scene here mentioned, Mr. Trollope, as we have said, mortifies the reader; in other scenes he fosters his equanimity, and his plan, indeed, is generally to leave him in a pleasant frame of mind.

This is all very well; and we are perhaps ill advised to expect sympathy for any harsh strictures upon a writer who renders such excellent service. Let us, however, plainly disavow a harsh intention. Let us, in the interest of our argument, heartily recognize his merits. His merits, indeed! he has only too many. His manner is literally freckled with virtues. We use this term advisedly, because its virtues are all virtues of detail: the virtues of the photograph. The photograph lacks the supreme virtue of possessing a character. It is the detail alone that distinguishes one photograph from another. What but the details distinguishes one of Mr. Trollope's novels from another, and, if we may use the expression, consigns it to itself? Of course the details are charming, some of them ineffably charming. The ingenuous loves, the innocent flirtations, of Young England, have been described by Mr. Trollope in such a way as to secure him the universal public good-will; described minutely, sympathetically, accurately; if it were not that an indefinable instinct bade us to keep the word in reserve, we should say truthfully. The story of Miss Mackenzie lacks this element of vernal love-making. The most that can be said of the affairs of this lady's heart is that they are not ridiculous. They are assuredly not interesting; and they are involved in much that is absolutely repulsive. When you draw on the grand scale, a certain amount of coarseness in your lines is excusable; but when you work with such short and cautious strokes as Mr. Trollope, it behooves you, above all things, to be delicate. Still, taking the book in its best points, the development of Miss Mackenzie's affections would not, in actual life, be a phenomenon worthy of an intelligent spectator. What rights, then, accrue to it in print? Miss Mackenzie is an utterly commonplace person, and her lover is almost a fool. He is apparently unsusceptible of the smallest inspiration from the events of his life. Why should we follow the fortunes of such people? They vulgarize experience and all the other heavenly gifts. Why should we stoop to gather nettles when there are roses blooming under our hands? Why should we batten upon overcooked prose while the air is redolent with undistilled poetry? It is perhaps well that we should learn how superficial, how spiritless, how literal human feeling may become; but is a novel here our proper lesson-book? Clever novels may be manufactured of such material as this; but to outweigh a thousand merits they will have the one defect, that they are monstrous. They will be anomalies. Mr. Matthew Arnold, however, has recently told us that a large class of Englishmen consider it no objection to a thing that it is an anomaly. Mr. Trollope is doubtless one of the number.

WINTHROP MACKWORTH PRAED.*

This publication of Praed's poetical works forms the fifth collection of them that has been made in America, and is much more complete and accurate than any of its predecessors. It is an exact reprint of the recent English edition, prepared by the Rev. Derwent Coleridge, and issued under direction of the poet's daughters. A very excellent memoir is prefixed to the poems; the editor has every aid that could be rendered him by the author's surviving friends and relatives; and in these volumes Praed's claim to poetic honors is finally submitted to the world for judgment. The editor's labor has been well performed, and deficiency can be imputed to him in respect of one thing only. Necessarily an important part of his duty consisted in rejection and selection. How difficult a task this may have been we have no means of knowing, but to us it seems that if more had been rejected, even if these two volumes had been compressed into one, the ends which the editor had in view would perhaps have been more surely attained.

Much that Praed wrote was written hastily; much of it was written while he was yet very young. Of much, then, the intrinsic value is small. Some of his verses were not printed in his lifetime, but copied in manuscript, and handed about by admiring friends; others were printed, indeed, but printed in publications so ephemeral that a man who wrote for them might, without impropriety, again make use of contributions which, if not used a second time, would have seemed to be material wasted and thrown away. But when an editor collects these repetitions and the reader collates them, the fame of the author is to a certain slight extent injured. Praed when living may have used the same witticisms more than once, for all wits are supposed to do that. But if they do employ the same joke five or six times, they take care to have five or six different audiences. The jest upon a politician's love for his place would hardly have been of so frequent recurrence in these pages had Praed himself prepared them for the press. And as repetition hurts his fame as a wit, so also it is of no especial advantage to his fame as a poet to give us fifty poems, of not very diverse character, and of about equal poetic merit, when ten would have satisfied the reader as fully and tired him somewhat less. This fault is, however, the only one that can be charged upon the editor, and it is a slight one. For if in rearing this commemorative column every stone is used, and some that add nothing to its beauty, we must recollect that something is to be pardoned to filial love and to the zeal of friendship.

Traces of carelessness on the part of printer and proof-reader are numerous, but on the whole the elegant outward appearance of these volumes is not unworthy of the pleasant reading to be found within.

More than a quarter of a century has elapsed since his death, but the memory of Praed is still green in the hearts of his many friends. He was born in 1802. His life ended just as the achievements of early manhood were redeeming the high promise of his youth. A witty and singularly facile writer; an accomplished scholar; a rising statesman; of manners so attractive that he was a pet in society; of a kindly disposition that won the love of all who knew him well; possessed of talents so brilliant as to command universal and admiring respect; of perfect purity and integrity of character,—it is not wonderful that high expectations were formed of him, and that he was perhaps the most noted young Englishman of his day.

His literary reputation was doubtless higher in his lifetime than it has ever been since; for in his lifetime his other claims to respect heightened the opinion that was entertained of his literary abilities; and we are further to consider that if what he has left behind him may not seem great when regarded as a performance, yet to his contemporaries, as the promise of future excellence given by the lad at school and the youth at college, the prose of the "Etonian" and the sparkling verse of "Knight's Quarterly Magazine" seemed worthy of very high praise.

Whatever distinction might have awaited him in his parliamentary career, we are of opinion that, in his character of poet, in which alone it is necessary for this generation to consider him, he had already, at the time of his death, reached as high a place as his talents would have ever enabled him to attain.

This place cannot be pronounced a high one. Praed was not without a certain measure of the poetic faculty. But, aside from that, but two things seem to have made him a writer of verse: his imitative ability, of which the reader is made aware by being often reminded of other writers, as Byron, Scott, Hood, while never arrested by any strong marks of originality; and, secondly, the persistent cultivation given to such poetic ability as he had by his father at home, by his tutors at school and college, and at the university by the competition for prizes, of which honors he bore off many. He thus acquired all the arts of versification. The precocity of his parts was, perhaps, their most distinguishing feature, and his early productions are characterized by that neat finish which appears rarely in the first essays of genius but is often found in the works of youthful talent. His father and his tutors subjected all he wrote to severe pruning, and his own taste and judgment, thus refined and educated, preserved him from any obscurity or turgidity of language, as well as from any affectation in sentiment. Indeed, it would be difficult to find any writer of English verse since Swift who is so habitually clear, simple, and correct as Praed. But these things do not make a poet. Style, we are truly told, depends as much upon what we say as upon how it is said. The praise that must be accorded to Praed will be found to apply mainly to his manner—to his phraseology rather than to his style. For example, we may say of him that he is witty. Now true wit, says Coleridge, in general difference sees partial resemblance, and finds unsuspected links connecting objects apparently diverse. Praed's wit finds these connecting links not between the things themselves so often as between the signs signifying the things. His wit is the wit of words. Paranomasia and fun abound in him.

And so of the other qualities of his style. Yet it would be wrong to say that Praed is a mere versifier. If he is tried by his thoughts, if we enquire what, amidst much that is temporary and trivial, we may find that is noble, beautiful, and enduring, we shall discover here and there amid the prose some gleams of golden poetry. He is the possessor of a fancy not powerful and capable of sustained flights, but very quick and fertile in details. It can create for us the nymph of a single tree, but if we would wander in enchanted forests we must commit ourselves to some mightier master of the spell than he.

When we watch the flames that consume the heart of a Byron or a Heine, we often see looking out upon us, as in the magical fires of romantic legend, the eyes of some sardonic fiend, or the face of an imp, mocking and jeering. The nature of Praed was not intense or powerful, and the delicacy of feeling which made him shrink from displaying to the world the deepest feelings of his soul, caused him to hide his earnestness and sadness under light trifling rather than under the bitter jests that conceal a stronger spirit's pain. But underneath many of his lightest strains there runs a current of gentle melancholy. The divine discontent of the soul with the life that now is, which in religion looks forward to the life that is to come, takes in his poetry the form of a pensive regret for time past that is irrecoverably vanished away. This dissatisfaction is as old as humanity. It is an everlasting and universal sentiment, and when it finds adequate expression, the result may truly be called poetry. Never forcibly expressed, but often present in his verse, this sentiment gives Praed his best title to the abused name of poet.

HOW SHALL WE RECOGNIZE THE MESSIAHS?*

A PRUDENT man will not always give his reasons, though they be plenty as blackberries and there be no compulsion. Doubtless it is an event sufficiently rare for a throned monarch to turn author and deal with type-setters and booksellers, and rarer still to turn biographer for one of his kind, of greater or less antiquity. But because the motive for such a step would be enquired by everybody, it does not follow that the Emperor of the French was bound to satisfy the world's curiosity. We esteem it a weakness, therefore, that he indulged in a preface, and did not leave his aim to be discovered from the book itself. He would certainly have been more likely to obtain believers, and, what is of prime consequence, readers for his doctrines. For while it is unquestionably true, as Labienus says, that one cannot debate with the master of thirty legions, in his own domain at least, it is a remarkable fact that the immediate criticisms of the "History of Cæsar" have been almost wholly expended upon the preface. M. Rogeard, indeed, went back to the title-page, and asserted that the king who attempted history before abdicating, proclaimed ipso facto his incapacity. Besides, there are some books of which it is enough to know the author, and especially the intent, to condemn them outright, without a perusal or so much as a glance even. The very notoriety of Napoleon, in connection with his "History," is the most serious impediment to his success. Not only, because he is an absolute despot, is he deprived of honest criticism in France, and compelled to listen to praises which are to him only self-adulation in a very gauzy disguise; he has not the advantage of the obscurest writer, the anonymous aspirant for a popular hearing. His arguments will not be weighed, his statements examined, his opinions considered, on their own merits, for never is the reader permitted to forget that they issue from the Tuileries, and that not Cæsar, not Charlemagne, not the Corsican Bonaparte, is the object of his vindication, but himself, the hero of the 2d December, the inventor of the coup d'état and of political deportations to Cayenne.

A composition of which every line is thus stamped with the timbre impérial is provocative of caution and mistrust. The mind, once put upon its guard, challenges every appearance, however innocent. The initial sentence becomes a stumbling-block: "Historic truth ought to be no less sacred than religion." One straightway asks: "Why historic truth alone, and not all truth?" And again: "Who is this stickler for veracity? It is he whose history cannot bear to be truly spoken of. It is he who erected his dynasty on a lie, and has maintained it by a gag upon free expression. Who is it that pretends to measure the sanctity of religion? The man who broke his oath to Liberty, and slew her at the altar of which she had made him priest." And so the commentary proceeds with the reading, a judgment being formed at every step instead of being held in solution, as is commonly the case with ordinary books which are written by indifferent men.

The value of a preface consists in procuring favor for that which succeeds it. In the present instance it is a perfect discouragement. Whereas it should seem like a wicket to a lawn, it is here like the door of a dungeon which we are assured is unlocked—while we remain on the outside. We repeat that the Emperor was not constrained to betray his aim in whitewashing Cæsar. Decency apart, to which he may have fancied that something was due, his policy evidently lay in keeping silent. Had his aim been noble, the case might have been different; but a sophism which appears unheralded and is diffused through eleven chapters, runs a much less risk of detection than when tersely stated in as many lines. And the purpose of this work is to defend the morality of temporal success—to trace the hand of the Almighty in the elevation, and claim His sanction for the career, of the world's rulers. It is not exactly the doctrine of the status quo, nor yet of the divine right of kings, though it partakes of both. It is not that the end justifies the means—for your Alexanders and Napoleons are only the instruments of Providence—but the result does. And the logic which is vaunted as the key to historic verity cannot fail, from this premiss, to arrive at a complete justification of these instruments against every imputation of littleness or personal defect. So that the author is not ashamed to ask: "When extraordinary facts attest an eminent genius, what is more contrary to good sense than to ascribe to him all the passions and sentiments of mediocrity?"

Celebrity alone will not invariably ensure an audience. The most famous orators are careful to select an attractive theme, or title at least. No such shrewdness is exhibited in the announcement of an office-holder that he will harangue against rotation in office: the "outs" will not come to hear him. It is so at this epoch with all civilized peoples. They choose to listen to other discourses than those which uphold the régimes under which they groan. It is clear, too, that the nations are not tending to Cæsarism, but to constitutional government; and clearer still, that this tendency has been irresistibly heightened by the triumph of democracy in America. When our literary despot insists that "we must recognize in the long duration of an institution the proof of its goodness," a twofold rejoinder is possible for the republicans of Europe. They can deny the proposition by pointing to the character and fate of slavery; or confirm it by the example of the free society which has asserted its right, determination, and power to monopolize the Union. Above all, there is one question that will surely be asked, and which it is of the utmost importance should receive a categorical answer. It relates to the Messiahs, of whom the Emperor exclaims: "Happy the peoples who comprehend and follow them! woe to those who misunderstand and combat them!" As if anticipating the difficulty, he remarks: "But by what sign are we to recognize a man's greatness? By the empire of his ideas, when his principles and his system triumph in spite of his death or defeat." This may do well enough for posterity, but is evidently no help at all for the contemporaries of the Messiahs. These predestined saviours of mankind so uniformly preserve by destroying, and resort to the most violent means to authenticate their commissions, that it is scarcely strange that they are misunderstood and combated. It would be an inestimable relief to both parties if they could agree at once upon the marks of a Messiah, and there make an end of resistance on the one hand and of butchery on the other We have in these times, moreover, a conflict of charters purporting to emanate from the same source, the people having somehow got the notion that they are divinely appointed to govern themselves; and something like the old Russian custom which Doré depicts, would be a decided convenience. For when, by the law establishing a scale of fines for mayhem and mutilation, the capacity for crime was regulated by the means of every one; if two pleasure-seeking Muscovites had confronted each other with felonious intent, a comparison of purses decided which should fear and flee from the other without unsheathing his sword. But unless the Messiah has something to show, how can such an arrangement be effected?

It is an old regret that the men of any given generation cannot live in the succeeding, and thus have the benefit of their own experience. How much smoother would have been the course of that Messiah who was misunderstood at Strasburg in 1836, and again at Boulogne in 1840, and even as late as 1851, when he made himself understood with a vengeance! He might have been spared exile and incarceration, had his aureola shone as it does now about his saintly head. But they who crucified him in that early day were pardonably blind. For the Emperor does not present the other side of the picture: "Woe to the people who follow a false Messiah!" And, success being the standard, where does history furnish so plausible a candidate for canonization as was Jefferson Davis before his downfall? Not only was he hailed as the Messiah of independence by the South, but by almost the united world, and all those powers which itched for our national dismemberment would fain have persuaded the North, as they had persuaded themselves, that he was a divine commissioner, to be respected accordingly. All the world now confesses its mistake, but very illogically, if we may trust Napoleon, who is himself at fault, however. For in the light of the hereafter the baffled convict may be converted into the triumphant martyr, "by the empire of his ideas." Perhaps some of us will outlive the suspense of this agonizing doubt.

We are far from warning anybody against reading the "History" beyond the preface, in which we have preferred to linger. It is well to observe how skilfully the author carries out the aim he professes, and much is doubtless to be learned from his archæological researches, conducted, by-the-bye, at the expense of the people for whose enslavement he argues. We would grant that none knows better than he what manner of bridge Cæsar stretched across the Rhine, or the equipment of a Roman trireme, or the very location of the Roman camps in Gaul. But when it comes to reproducing the spirit of the age with which he deals, he must yield the palm to his painter Gérome, who is more concerned to be graphic than logical. Of the two American editions much praise can be honestly spoken. The Harpers have spared no pains to make their authorized version the handsomest volume they have ever published, while the Messrs. Appleton have reprinted the original in a style of rare accuracy and finish. Particularly is Mr. Smith's engraving of the Imperator commendable in the latter edition.

A PHILOLOGIST AMONGST THE TURKOMANS.*

This is one of the most curious and interesting books of travel which has been published for many years. It is the story of a young Hungarian scholar, highly educated in the languages of the East, who penetrated in the tattered garb of a Mohammedan beggar to the heart of Turkistan, to Bokhara, and Samarkand, the famous capital of Tamerlane. The region which he traversed is almost unknown to Europeans, and death would have been the penalty of his boldness in visiting it, if his rare linguistic attainments, complete familiarity with the Koran and with Mohammedan usages, and his never-failing wit, had not enabled him to elude the scrutiny of those suspicious barbarians among whom his lot was cast.

He tells us in his modest preface that his attention was early directed to the affinities and the origin of the Hungarian language, his own mother tongue, and that a desire to determine whether it should be referred to the Finnish or the Tartaric branch of the stock called Altaic led him to undertake his perilous journey. It was philological enthusiasm therefore which carried him on step by step through his long and wearisome course, and the results of his philological enquiries he naturally regards as the principal fruits of his labor. The publication of these researches he leaves for a later volume, and now only gives us the general observations which he made on the country through which he passed.

Before we dwell upon the particulars of his story, the reader may be interested in knowing something of the previous life of this remarkable scholar. An interesting sketch from the pen of the Hungarian biographer Kertbeny enables us to supply the desired information.

Arminius Vámbéry was born in 1832, at Gutta, a village in the Island Schütt in Hungary. His mother, early left a widow, could with difficulty provide an education for him. By a boyish acquaintance with Hungarian, Slovakian, and German, he was prepared to go forward to other linguistic attainments, and while yet a youth he showed great proficiency in Latin, Greek, French, Italian, English, Serbian, and Croatian. Soon after he became of age he went to Constantinople, in great poverty; and in order to gain admission to the schools of the Mohammedan clergy, he conformed to Islamism; then he became thoroughly acquainted with the Mohammedan faith and practice. He learned to write Turkish like a native. He directed his attention to some twenty Oriental tongues, and finally became well known in the East for his various contributions to philological literature. In 1860, the Hungarian Academy furnished him with 1,000 gulden to enable him to make a journey to Samarkand for the purposes already stated—and in July, 1862, we find him at Teheran, ready to enter the unknown region beyond. It is here that his own narrative begins.

The difficulties of travel in Turkistan, which are always serious, were then greater than usual on account of a prevailing war, and Vámbéry could not make any satisfactory arrangements for his trip until several months had passed. The account of his stay in Teheran is an interesting but less important portion of his story. At length, in January, 1863, by good management, after many efforts, he succeeded in attaching himself to a band of twenty-three persons returning to Bokhara from a pilgrimage to Mecca. He passed himself off for a Turkish dervish, pretending that he desired to visit the fountain of pure Islamism and to pay his homage to certain saints of the country. Finding that the good dresses of his companions were not to be worn on the journey, he put on the appropriate costume of Bokhara, "a thousand rags fastened around the loins with a cord." In this wretched dress, surmounted by a wearisome turban, to Mohammedans the ever-present memento of death, he set out on his journey. Wretched food and scanty water were his constant grievances. Great risk of detection at almost every stage of his journey imperilled his life—but skilfully extricating himself from each entanglement, he crossed the south-east extremity of the Caspian Sea, at the limit of the Russian dominion, passing northward between the Little and the Great Balkan, and across the fiery desert, over the former bed of the Oxus, and so forward to the city of Khiva, south of the Aral Sea. After a short sojourn here, the band of returning pilgrims followed the right bank of the Oxus upward till it was necessary to quit it in order to reach Bokhara. Here Vámbéry remained a month, and then pursued his journey to Samarkand.

The account which Mr. Vámbéry gives us of these two places is highly entertaining. In Bokhara he was closely watched, but his disguise was not penetrated. "What extreme piety," he overheard some one say, "to come all the way from Constantinople to Bokhara alone, in order to visit our Baha-ed-din" (that being the name of a celebrated saint renowned through Islam, who died in 1388). The duties of a dervish, rigorously performed in order to keep up appearances, and the investigations of a shrewd and learned traveller, were amusingly combined in his every-day routine.

Bokhara he describes as a city four miles in circumference, having eleven gates, and divided into two principal parts, the inner and the outer city. It is said to contain 365 mosques, and also 365 colleges — this number apparently being a favorite figure, perhaps we should say, a figure of speech. Vámbéry could find but half that number of churches, and only eighty colleges. These latter institutions are seminaries not of learning but fanaticism; the chief instruction being in the Koran and religious casuistry, with a little logic and philosophy. The number of students is represented at 5,000, gathered not only from Central Asia but from India, Cashmere, Afghanistan, Russia, and China. The emir, or chief magistrate, is said to govern by justice, and to do all in his power to discourage luxury and maintain among the people their primitive simplicity.

The traffic of Bokhara appears to be but moderate, consisting chiefly in the sale of such articles of Asiatic or Russian manufacture as the people of the town require. Printed books are rarities—but many precious manuscripts are offered for sale in the twenty-six shops of the book-bazaar.

Bokhara appeared to Vámbéry to be noteworthy for its strict maintenance of Mohammedanism. He terms it the Romé of Islam, as Mecca and Medina are the Jerusalem. Bokhara plumes herself on this superiority, even in the face of the Sultan who is charged with corrupting religion by the influence of the "Frenghis" (Franks).

Samarkand, so celebrated in the past as the home of Timour, disappointed our traveller. Several hundred places of pilgrimage were pointed out to him, one of the most remarkable of which is the sepulchre of the great Timour—a neat chapel surmounted by a splendid dome—beneath which are the graves of Timour and Mir Seid Berke, the teacher at whose side the mighty emir desired to be buried.

Many colleges or medresses are also found in Samarkand, but Vámbéry could find no trace of the once famous Armenian-Greek library which is said to have been carried thither to ornament the capital.

Our limits will not allow us to give even a résumé of all that is fresh and entertaining in this volume. The author returned by way of Herat to Teheran, and soon afterwards found his way to London, where his story was told to the Geographical Society, and awakened great interest, not only for its own sake, but because the region which he traversed is the border between the Russian empire and the British possessions in India. So inhospitable, however, are the inhabitants, that rarely, if ever, since the days of Marco Polo, has a European traveller seen so much as Vámbéry. Clavijo, a Spanish ambassador from Henry III. of Castile to Timour, reached Samarkand in the year 1404, and the narrative of his visit has lately been printed by the Hakluyt Society. In 1620, a Russian envoy named Chochlow, and in 1780 another Russian traveller named Jefremow, are believed to have reached Samarkand. In 1841, the Chevalier Khanikoff, a distinguished Russian explorer, visited the same city, in company with other scientific men, and a volume containing his observations on that city and on the Khanat of Bokhara was published soon afterwards and translated into English. The eccentric Dr. Wolff also gave to the public an account of his observations in Bokhara. With these qualifications, Mr. Vámbéry may be regarded as having opened to us a region almost unknown. In doing so he has shown a degree of sagacity and intrepidity rarely equalled in the annals of discovery.

TWO RECENT NOVELS.*

To persons of correct taste, it is usually a great pleasure to read a good novel of well-bred domestic life. "The Heir of Redclyffe" and "Heartsease" were really good novels of well-bred domestic life; and, accordingly, it is with great expectations that we see, from time to time, the advertisement of a new novel by the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe" and "Heartsease."

To say, however, that our satisfaction in reading it always equals our interest in opening it, might be saying a little too much. Those two above mentioned admirable tales have been, so far as we have seen, equalled by none of their successors. "The Heir of Redclyffe" was, indeed, such a piece of good luck and good conduct combined as falls to few novelists twice in a lifetime; but to reach the height of "Heartsease" again would not appear to demand any tiptoe stretch of the author's uniformly admirable powers.

Her materials are usually rich, but the structures into which, of late, she rears them look poor from the artistic point of view. Her characters are generally lifelike; her ladies and gentlemen ladylike and gentlemanlike. But having brought before us one or more fine creatures, she beats them; she binds them; she lets her other inferior creatures make butts of them; she sticks pins into them; she impales them; she makes them declare it is "so comfortable" to be impaled; she calls upon us to congratulate them; then, in triumph, she bears them out of our sight.

Now we expect to be "harrowed." In fact, we like it, as Mawworm did to be despised. But we also expect our tears to be dried afterward by the same skilful hand that wrung them from us. In these novels, however, even when, at the close, they offer us what professes to be compensation for sufferings, salutary, as we do not undertake to deny, the dénouement is invariably too incomplete or too improbable for our acceptance.

"Beechcroft" and "Hopes and Fears" might be admitted to a share in the alias of "The Young Stepmother," "A Chronicle of Mistakes"—mistakes, moreover, very deplorable if not irreparable. "The Daisy Chain" was too long and complex, and linked together at least two most dismal catastrophes. Its continuation—"The Trial"—tried almost to annihilation two interesting characters—Ethel and Leonard. "Dynevor Terrace" attempted to make a good end; but, though it is always encouraging to virtuous minds to see virtue rewarded, we would rather, if Louis is to be the sacrifice, see him bestowed upon virtue in the person of his "most dear she-younger-brother," Clara, than that of the commonplace and ponderous Mary.

And now comes in "The Clever Woman of the Family," the dreariest story by our author that we have ever read—the dreariest one by her, we hope, that any one will ever have a chance to read. It is able; but it is disagree-able! It is not high tragedy; it is low tragedy—not sublime, but miserable.

The would-be heroine, Rachel, is a personage too radically unpleasant for even her sufferings to render her interesting, or for any amount of reformation to render her engaging. We pity her, notwithstanding, to such a degree that, in spite of our regard for Alick, it would be a relief to us if we could receive in faith their biographer's report, of her being sheltered by and married to him; but we cannot receive it on any other ground than that of the devotee, who exclaimed with pious fervor, "I believe—for it is impossible!"

Rachel is a foeman scarcely worthy of so much of such steel as that of the pen employed upon her. She is not even, in fact, a clever woman—out of the study. She has neither wit, eloquence, logic, penetration, nor invention. Indeed, as the author hints at the end of the book, the first part of the title belongs rather, of right, to Ermine; and we are inclined to wish the whole to run, "The Clever Woman of the Neighborhood," that it might be made over to her entire.

Such attractions as the story has we will not take away from our present, and its future, readers, by telling ill what the story-teller tells well. It has two morals, however, which we see little danger of making duller than morals usually are; and we dwell upon the second, the rather that it is, from the plan of the book, therein necessarily subordinated to the first. The one is a timely and most impressive warning against that particular form of weakness of mind, which—as the good word nervousness has been perverted to signify the bad quality, want of nerve—has come to be called strong-mindedness; and the other, a no less timely suggestion that some other elements are wanted toward the fulfilment of any fine woman beside what is often cantingly apotheosized as "the feminine element."

We object to the term altogether. We have old and excellent authority for calling elements, taken by themselves, "beggarly." Useful and indispensable as they are in combination, they are useless or deadly apart. Moreover, this very misnamed element in question is not an element at all. It is a compound which Bon Gaultier, speaking for Leigh Hunt, might happily characterize as a sweety limpidness. It is made up of tenderness and innocence—sugar and distilled water—and neither sugar nor distilled water is an element.

Some human people, notwithstanding, have a blind partiality for human eau sucrée—and they have a right to their taste. We do not grudge it to them. We own that there are some things to be truly said in behalf of eau sucrée. For example, it is probably much nicer than aquafortis, and indisputably much more wholesome. If that were the only alternative presented to us, we should certainly say, Take away your aquafortis directly, and we will never call for anything more piquant than your eau sucrée. But then that is not the only alternative.

It must not be forgotten—as it seems to have been by most who have written upon, for, or against them—that women are human, and neither naiads, sylphs, or gnomes, nor any other sort of unearthly and unmeaning phantasms, unintelligible and unnatural. Tenderness and innocence are ingredients, not only desirable but indispensable, but not the only indispensable ingredients, in the making up of any pure, noble, symmetrical human nature; and feminine intellect, spirit, and wit are too interesting, entertaining, and, if rightly used, valuable things to be turned over—as Wesley said all the best tunes were—to Satan.

Many feminine—and no unfeminine—women are charming; but too many feminine-elementary women are, like rudimentary fins or pinions, mere unworthy appendages, not to say encumbrances, to finer and better developed frames. Further, the natural reaction from feminine-elementary women like Mrs. Curtis is to masculine-elementary girls like Miss Rachel. We need say no more.

Whenever Rachel's Cousin Fanny found occasion to administer a bitter pill to Conny, Francie, Leo, Hubert, Wilfrid, Cyril, or "Stephana, the baby," we have no doubt that her feminine element suggested a sweet successive sugar-plum. We wish that her example herein might move her chronicler to follow up the dose which she has now administered to the spirit of the age with its fitting complement—the story of one high-minded woman—there have lived such—whose generous enthusiasm, unlike that of Honora, Albinia, and their compeers, shall be guided by judgment and crowned by success. We could consent, of course, to her being placed in circumstances sometimes painful and perplexing, but never undignified nor humiliating. Such a theme would be worthy of our author's abilities, and we think her abilities worthy of such a theme.

Let her plot, at all events, once more deserve the expenditure upon it of her rare wealth in the invention of characters, her healthy feeling, sound if somewhat timid good sense, and Christian spirit. Let her henceforward—unless she determines to write throughout in German or Irish—forbid her ideal young ladies to call their mother "the mother;" and the lovers of genius consecrated to the noblest ends will have much to thank her for, besides the much for which we would fain beg leave to thank her already, and little better to ask.

Almost too dissimilar for a comparison is the next book on our critical table. The history of "Beatrice" scarcely makes one think enough to enable him to say what he thinks of it. Still, we believe we shall scarcely perjure ourselves in affirming that one might easily find much worse reading for a summer's day, as it is spirited, not very mischievous, full of incident, written with correctness and grace, and ornamented with tasteful pen-and-ink sketches of lovely scenery.

The plot is somewhat complex, yet has a certain simplicity in its variety. Through the usual quantum suff. of love and woe, expanded in the present case into a thick volume, it walks to a happy conclusion on these two feet, put forth alternately: the villain does villainously,—somebody dies suddenly.

We can further encourage the admirers of Miss Kavanagh's previous novels by informing them that the present bears a certain family likeness to "Grace Lee" and "Zaidee"—which were, if we recollect right, attributed to the same author—in the unexpected inheritance of a fortune by the heroine in her childhood, and the migratory nature of the adventures, and that we have some reason for supposing "Beatrice" may be better than "Nathalie," for the former we could read, and the latter we—did not.

THE FORTIETH ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

[Second Notice.]

THIS exhibition is stronger in landscape painting than in any other department of art. The exhibition is not, on the whole, a creditable one, but it is perhaps as strong in landscape painting as any that have preceded it. It is true that several of those painters who have, in former years, sent the best landscapes, are either unrepresented or badly represented this year. Were it otherwise, this exhibition would be far better than any former one in this department, for there are pictures here of great worth and greater promise signed by new names, and the work of some artists whose names are well known is better than it has ever been.

There is a marked disposition on the part of some of the best landscapists we have to paint small pictures of simple but not hackneyed subjects, and to paint them very well—nearly as well as they can. There are very few painters who give their whole strength to their pictures—we shall presently name one who has done so this year—but there are those who give nearly their whole strength, and who do well, and will do well, but never excellently. This disposition to paint small pictures we are very glad to see. It takes more power of invention than most painters have to rightly fill a large canvass with minute incident, and it takes more power of drawing than most painters have to draw rightly on a larger scale.

Consider, for instance, Mr. McEntee's picture, No. 291, "Last of October." It has been a surprise to observers of this and of former exhibitions, because of the really good tree-drawing in it, showing a knowledge of tree form and growth which few had supposed the painter to possess. The color is so far true that it is really and not superficially autumnal. It is almost a good picture. Now, it is prevented from being a good picture by inexcusable coarseness of detail, and therefore by untruth of detail; for that painting is not true to the autumn woods which looks like rough and crumbly paint at whatever distance from it one may stand. But imagine this canvass apparently diminished, by a concave lens, to one-half its length and height, that is, to quarter of its superficies, and it will seem a better picture. There will be nothing more in it; but we can accept less. Turner, by working more minutely, would often put as much incident into a small picture as he was accustomed to put into a large one; but it seemed that large and small had no absolute meaning to Turner any more than in nature. With most of our painters we are willing to accept less detail in a smaller picture; and, if Mr. McEntee will not give us more detail or better detail than he has given us in this, it would be better if he would paint smaller pictures. The worst faults of this picture, however, would remain very visible even through a very powerful diminishing lens. The vaporous, palely-tinted, almost homogeneous substance that clings around each tree has really no right to pass itself off for foliage, and hide what would otherwise have been visible, the much better drawn branches.

Mr. George B. Wood's little picture, No. 584, "Clearing off Cold," is an instance of the tendency we spoke of above. Two years ago Mr. Wood exhibited a small painting of Mulleins, and these two pictures are all we know of his work. We think it wisely done to limit himself to small cabinet pictures, not because of any discreditable weakness in either of the two good works named, but because of what seems to us his as yet immature strength as an artist. "Clearing off Cold" is very good and true, as can be seen through an opera-glass; it cannot be seen without, for it is at the end of the gallery and high, so that an annoying flash of light from its surface makes a near look impossible. The pale sky with horizontal bars of cloud, and the cedar tree which shows sharply against it, are seen from afar to be good. A careful look with the necessary appliances shows the foreground to be nearly as good, and very original in treatment.

Mr. Hotchkiss' picture, No. 570, "Cypresses at the Convent of San Miniato, Florence," is a good portrait of the trees, and the sunset light falling on the trees and hillside in bars alternated with bars of shadow from other trees unseen, is warm and real. The picture is therefore very interesting, for the cypress is a strange tree to us in America, and of strongly individual character, and these are noble specimens of their kind. The monks are not successful, but are not to be wished away, only to be wished better. "Torre de Schiava," No. 262, seems to be good, but is perched up above a large picture, and half hidden by the frame thereof, and is altogether too high to be judged aright, even with the useful opera-glass.

This cataloguing of painters and their works is wearying, now the exhibition is closed, and is generally foreign to our purpose. But the names we are calling over are the names of men who hold the future of our landscape art in their hands. Let us go on, therefore—there are not many more.

Mr. Wyant, we think, is one of these. "The Ohio Valley," No. 264, has been carefully studied. There is good work and a real striving for excellence in the near hill-top and rocks. The distance, moreover, is distant, and well down below the spectator's lofty stand. "Cooper's Bottom, Ohio River," is a much better picture, and is capable of giving real pleasure and rewarding a careful examination. The color of either is not very good. There is no evident feeling for color. The green of summer woods is not given here in its true quality and brilliancy.

Mr. Farrer is certainly one of those landscape painters from whom we hope the most, although this year he has only one little picture of any great merit, besides two drawings. "Mt. Washington under Three Feet of Snow," No. 361, is a very beautiful picture. It is very small, and evidently a study of color, mainly, probably an accurate transcript of some individual autumn sunset. The sun has set beyond the mountain, whose sides toward the spectator being in shade are nearly as blue as the reality—and no one can know how blue snow shadows are until he tries to match them with color, but the right-hand edge is reddened by the sun, which still touches it. The sky is yellow and pure behind the mountain, with only two clouds floating, and those beautifully rosy. The foreground has that strange bronze green which we remember in only one other picture, also by Mr. Farrer, a sunset piece, Mr. Farrer's "Pro Patria," at the great fair in New York for the Sanitary Commission. It is successful as a rendering of the phenomenon represented, and powerful in the picture. Our impression that this picture represents an actual scene is confirmed by the beautiful mass of the mountain. A picture rapidly painted, as this seems to have been, would hardly have been so successful both in color and in form without the direct dictation of nature. The two little pencil drawings, No. 133, "Study of Pumpkin Vine," and No. 154, "Study of Dandelion," are work of a class which would have been thought peculiar to Mr. Farrer but that Mr. Moore has one quite similar in this exhibition. The delicate beauty of the drawing of the large leaves of the pumpkin vine is hardly to be surpassed. It is cause for regret that Mr. Farrer has no large and important landscape this year. His picture, called, if we remember aright, "White Mountain Brook," is more needed in this exhibition than it was in the Artists' Fund Exhibition last fall. Mr. Farrer has some very unfortunate figure pictures on these walls, and should have shown his full strength in landscape.

Mr. Colman must be classed among the more able landscape painters on the unsupported testimony of his little "Tuscan Cottage," No. 527. It is very charming; but we have to speak of Mr. Colman in another place, where he will command even greater respect than here.

There is one picture, we have said, to which the painter gave his whole strength. It is Mr. Charles H. Moore's "Study in the Catskill Valley," No. 60. It is a representation on a very small scale of a very wide range of country. The spectator stands on a slightly rising ground, and looks across perhaps ten miles of low-lying country to the Catskill Mountains beyond. There is, in this small picture, the material for a very large one; it is so minutely painted throughout that it is, in amount of incident, a very large one. Now, the minuteness is nothing of itself. Microscopic fineness of workmanship is not to be sought for its own sake. The true line may be drawn with a crumbly bit of charcoal as well as with the point of a needle on steel. It is, indeed, well to have the power of drawing minutely, for, even if objects are represented in foreground of the size of nature, the detail of nature will be too minute to be entirely represented, and it is always well to be able to represent all that art can of what is visible. But a painter's eye-sight might render him incapable of such execution as this, and he might yet be a better painter even than Mr. Moore. The merit of this picture is in its almost perfect truth of drawing, and in the love of nature so evident in it, and the evident purpose to get perfect truth. Consider the apple tree on the extreme right—it is well and completely drawn. Look at the corn, see how perfectly its form is rendered, the broad leaves sheathing the undeveloped stalk, each leaf rippled along its edges by the fullness of its growth: in drawing at least it is wonderfully real. The drawing is not only noticeably good in these prominent objects of accented form; the old road which passes near the corn-field and dips out of sight over the brow of the hill is excellent, overgrown with grass and seeding plantains, and watched by a sentry mullein here and there; the middle distance, too, dotted with farm-houses and barns, and varied by grove and field, miles of country visible at once, is admirably rendered in a narrow belt of canvass, which, as one looks too close, is merely mottled with color, but resolves itself into broad tracts of land as the eye is withdrawn. This middle distance is the best part of the picture, and hardly to be surpassed.

Mr. Moore's drawing is already so good that but few observers will see that it grows better in the future. But his color may be greatly improved; it is pale and not strong, and we ask all those interested in art to watch it hereafter and see it improve. The artist is not deficient in feeling for color or love of color. His effort seems to have been to get truth of gradation, both in light and shade and in local color, and the strength of tone has been partly lost in the resolute striving to reach all nature's delicacy. Nature is delicate and strong. Mr. Moore would like his work to be delicate and strong, but seems to be fixed in his purpose that it shall, at all hazards, be delicate. The delicacy he loves is not, observe, smoothness of surface, or absence of brush marks, or even microscopic elaboration, but it is that wonderful subtlety of gradation in nature of which the closest observer sees the most, and at which the oldest observer wonders the most—a subtlety only partially imitable by art, but which this painter closely copies.

This painter's work is to us full of promise for the future, because we expect a refined strength to grow out of his now somewhat weak refinement. That there are admirers of his patience and carefulness who do not fully share our hopes, we can well believe. But we confidently look to the next exhibition to show unmistakable advance, and to confirm every hope for the future.

Mr. Moore has, also, a very beautiful little pencil drawing, "Mandrakes," No. 143. The drawing is very small, and is a careful study of foreground detail; a little patch of ground covered thick with dry leaves, the trunks of half a dozen trees seen for a few feet from the ground, and a cluster of May apple or mandrake plants in front of them.

We have noticed two or three very interesting studies from foreign lands; Mr. Colman's "Tuscan Cottage," which is the best of them, and two good ones by Mr. Hotchkiss. There ought to be more such than there are, for our painters should remember that there are beautiful things in Europe of a very different character from anything American, and that the subtle charm of historical association and ancient date gives them an additional beauty. There are two others, by Mr. Edward L. Henry. The picture No. 568, "Via St. (Sta?) Catarina, Naples," has not great artistic merit, but will give a really accurate idea of a thing utterly foreign to the experiences or the ideas of untravelled Americans—a narrow, crowded Naples street, no thoroughfare for wheeled vehicles, fifteen feet wide between the walls of the five-story white houses, filled with jostling pedestrians and ringing with shrill cries of itinerant merchants and whines of importunate beggars, the whole street startled into unwonted excitement by some church festival, which brings a procession of monks and a great display of flags and drapery into the scene. No. 552, "A Canal Scene, Venice," is less pleasing. It is of a better subject, and it is really a portrait of it, for the sotto-portico and the riva (words untranslatable except by circumlocutory paraphrases), the canal and bridge and house-fronts, are all drawn from the reality. But the architectural detail of the palace is spoiled, is false both in drawing and in color—the cusped arches and window-shafts wholly wrong.

There is no city whose outside Americans ought to study so carefully as Venice, and this on many accounts. There is no city so unlike anything in America. There is no city having its early architecture of all the great schools generally in such good repair. There is no city which it is so easy to study, thanks to the delicious gondola. There is no city from which the New York of the future might so well be copied, for the two great commercial cities are somewhat alike in sentiment, and the magnificence ruled by true feeling in art of mediæval Venice our would-be grandiose city might be made to appreciate, when it would not be impressed by the simpler and purer art of Verona or Ferrara. Venice, therefore, should be studied, and rightly painted or drawn. But it has not been by Americans. A single Prout drawing, even one of Ponte's photographs at one Austrian gulden each, will give the untravelled man a better idea of Venice than all the pictures together that our painters have made. Mr. Henry's canal scene is only good in comparison with the dreadful libels upon the Sea City by which our galleries are often disfigured.

Of such libels, the worst are probably those exhibited by Mr. C. P. Cranch. Without alluding to those of former years, there are a few words to be said of the three in this exhibition. "Venice: View from the Giardino Publico," No. 379, is the most daring, for a part of a Gothic palace is in the near foreground, and close to the spectator, and some of the best known and most important buildings of the city are not far away, and in full daylight. The palace nearest the beholder presents a wall such as Venice does not hold, built of large squared blocks of stone of a purplish hue, with quoins of white marble. It will not pass to say that these seeming blocks are thin slabs of marble, veneering a brick wall, as often in Venice. Such slabs are never set so as to look like blocks of stone, breaking joints, but are always used as a sort of armor, held in their places often by visible contrivances, and generally having their greatest length vertical; moreover, there is no material of the color shown of which slabs are used in Venice. The use of quoins of one material or color, with a wall surface of another, is a fashion foreign to Gothic art, and certainly unknown in Venetian Gothic, nor is there any building in Venice of any age, so far as we know, that is so decorated. The archivolts of the two-light window are of another color still, and an unknown material, certainly unknown to Venice, and are altogether impossible in their shape and seeming construction. The window-shaft is as bad as the arches that spring from its capital, for it has no less than three peculiarities which separate it from all Venetian Gothic architecture. The shaft tapers instead of being cylindrical. The capital is of an impossible form, and the base is on a level with the top of the parapet of the window balcony. All this technicality is uninteresting, except as it establishes the fact that the right-hand corner of this picture gives an utterly false report about a thing which is well worth describing truly. Why the description is so false is evident. The balcony is nearly copied from the lower story balconies of the famous Ca' d'Oro, on the Grand Canal, the parapet consisting of a large white marble slab, with quatrefoils of uniform size pierced in it at equal distances. No one could begin to draw this without a certain knowledge that these distances are equal, and the size uniform. But the painted parapet here follows no such laws; its quatrefoils are pierced with entire freedom from restraint, in such irregular order, and at such accidental distances, as carelessness has pleased. It is a small matter, and a minor fault, but it gives the key to the whole of the bad work.

Remember that Venetian architecture of every great school was formal, severe, and observant of rules beyond the architecture of other lands. Remember that delicate mouldings and carved foliage in white marble or in whitish Istrian stone are universal in all the Gothic palaces; the stone work built into rough brick walls, which are afterwards faced with thin slabs of marble or alabaster, or else stuccoed. The painter has represented the lower part of his palace wall as stuccoed; perhaps he would urge this in his defense, that the palace is one of those which have been modernized, and that the purplish blocks are an imitation of stone on a surface of stucco. This position, however, cannot be assumed, for its assumption would argue incredible bad taste in the choice of subjects, and, moreover, it would involve an anachronism. Such destructive repairs have, indeed, been made in Venice, but only within a few years; while the costume of the figures in this picture, especially of the gondolier taking his orders, and of the gentleman under the awning of the gondola, is very ancient indeed, certainly not more recent than a couple of centuries ago. The view is not that from the Giardino Publico. It is an abstract of it, indeed, but with its essential features left out. The name of the picture is but a small matter. If the picture could give any knowledge of Venice, or if it could give any pleasure, or excite any admiration for noble architecture and splendid color, even though neither were truly Venetian, we would not ask for the name. A painter who disregarded his reputation for accuracy of statement might paint Veronese architecture and call it Venice unchallenged; but no one has a right to paint an ugly and uninteresting city, of meaningless architecture, and of no beauty of color, and call that—Venice.

No. 12, "Moonlight on the Giudecca, Venice," is not a view on the Giudecca, but a view on that open water off the Riva de' Schiavoni which is sometimes called the Grand Canal, as if a continuance of that channel itself, sometimes the sea, as Mr. Ruskin calls it, and sometimes the Canal of St. Mark. But it is evident that we must allow the painter to miscall at his pleasure. The picture is painted to get the glaring red and yellow lights from the windows and vessels, and there is no pleasure apparent in any other fact or "effect," even the Doges' palace being made to serve this vulgar purpose of a colored lantern. The palace is sadly misused; the decorated central window of the sea front is turned into a sort of turret, and the window itself has vanished, is evidently built up, for it opens into the same hall with the three windows to the left, and they are brilliantly lighted up. Other important buildings visible are misrepresented as badly as the palace, especially the Campanile of San Marco, which is entirely false in drawing.

No. 393, "The Dogana, Venice," is less bad than the other two, because the Dogana building itself is somewhat like the real building in shape. It is not at all well drawn, however, and is coarsely painted; and the rest of the picture is not better than its companions.

There is a seemingly irreconcilable difference of opinion, embodied in difference of practice, between landscape painters, on this question of the representation of the actual features of landscape. There are those who seem to believe that all created things are given to them for a prey and for a spoil; that they are to represent these enough to get ideas and suggestions, and to distort and alter enough to leave their own fancies free play. These words are not intended for ridicule, but for a strictly accurate expression of the avowed principle of some painters, and the seeming purpose of others. Now, without discussing here the general question, we would make one suggestion, and put it in the form of a parable. When school-boys ask their teacher, as school-boys often do, "Shall we learn it so as to give the words of the book?" they often get the wise answer, "Not if you can give better words." That is, you must give the exact meaning; and if you can do that better than the book has done it, well. But the conclusion follows, unstated. Give the book's words, unless you can give better. De te fabula narratur, his better judgment will say to every painter. Paint nature as you see it, unless you can improve upon it. Perhaps you can. Turner sometimes did, sometimes, we think, failed to. When it is human nature, you often can. So to the painters of Venice this is to be said, If you can give a better idea of the real beauty of Venice than by exactly copying any one building or scene, do so, but be sure you are not spoiling what you would concentrate and develop. You must understand Venetian architecture better than any painter America yet owns, before you can paint its essence regardless of the special embodiments of it.

We have alluded to Mr. Farrer's figure pictures, which are so harmful to his reputation this year, and so astounding to most of those who have seen the evident conscientiousness of his work in former years and the real power of drawing he possesses. To us they are only thus far surprising, that we thought Mr. Farrer would have steadily improved from year to year, overcoming his difficulties and enlarging his powers. Thus he has never yet handled oil color very skilfully;—this year it should have been better managed than ever, but it is worse. No figure drawing of his has yet been exhibited which is faultless, though much has which is full of merit; this year his figure drawing should have approached real excellence, but it has fallen far below what it has formerly been. Speculations as to causes of failure are, of course, useless and unprofitable, as they must from their very nature be generally untraceable. But there is one point worthy of a moment's consideration. These pictures illustrate a not uncommon inability or neglect, the inability or neglect to conceive a subject thoroughly before painting it.

To illustrate: In the picture No. 161, "April, 1861," the spectator is within a room, and looks towards one of its corners, in which corner is placed a small table with books and a statuette; a large window is in the wall on the right hand, and no opening whatever in the wall on the left hand, of which only a small part is seen. Now, the carpet on the floor is of a strongly marked pattern, large squares, the breadths being easily definable one from another. The converging lines which represent in perspective the seams between these breadths of carpet converge nearly in the direction of the corner of the room. That is, if we may trust the statements of this picture, there is a square room somewhere, with a carpet laid down diagonally, one breadth running from corner to opposite corner, and the others parallel to it. We have nothing to do now with the bad drawing of this carpet; it is the lack of power to combine facts that is the question. It is evident that the carpet was painted in another room than that of which the walls and window are represented, and that the artist was unable or neglected to fit one to the other. In the picture No. 526, "Home Scenes—Morning," a similar and even more fatal error occurs. A round table occupies the middle of the picture, and obscures the junction of the wall and floor. But from the wall and window seen above the table we learn this—that only one wall is visible, that this is seen at a considerable angle, and that the window is in that wall, the cross-bar of the window-sash proving this latter to be true. Now, looking at the junction of this wall and the floor, we find an entirely different condition of things: we find that there is not one wall visible, but that two walls meet nearly at the window-trimming, and that we look toward a corner in this picture as in No. 161. In this case no explanation is possible. The fault must be classed with the fault in the drawing of the easel in this same picture, where the leg seen above the painting upon it does not continue in the direction of the same leg seen below the painting. It is incredible that any painter should begin an important picture without a perfectly clear perception in his mind of the place of every line and the meaning of every line. It is proved possible for even a painter who would be thought from his work a declared realist to paint a picture without knowing what he intends to represent.

Mr. C. C. Coleman paints better than ever this year, and better than any one who chooses the same kind of subjects. His largest picture, "The Antiquary," No. 518, is certainly a great triumph for him, for he has painted in it difficult things as well as he has painted easy things before. The books and the carved wood are wonderfully successful. But the subject is so entirely unpicturesque, so devoid of interest, so unpoetical, that it puts the careful and elaborate painting out of the pale of art meant for the world, and classes it with such study of ugly things, for practice' sake, as Mr. Ruskin recommends in "The Elements of Drawing." New Yorkers all know "Gibson's Building," at the corner of Broadway and Thirteenth Street. This picture is at once recognizable as a view in the large show-room in that building for stained glass and decorative materials. Of course nine-tenths of the individual articles for sale are dreadfully ugly, as the stained glass especially is. Of course a bric-a-brac shop is not a good subject for a painter. Capital practice, though, and next year Mr. Coleman is sure to paint something really lovely, for he is quite strong enough now to do so, as this picture proves.

Mr. Winslow Homer has found a class of subjects worthy of his most careful painting, and is, in this, wiser or more fortunate than most of his contemporaries. He paints the scenes and incidents of our great war, and paints them well, with a true perception of their character and meaning, and with unusual technical skill. "Pitching Quoits," No. 460, is a large picture of Zouaves, apparently of the Fifth New York Volunteers, some in the foreground engaged in the standard amusement which gives name to the picture, with horse-shoes for their missiles, others looking on, keeping tally of the game, smoking, and, in the background, cooking and lounging. The improvement in the technical skill and force in Mr. Homer's work is, from year to year, very noticeable. He promises to retain the position, which we think he has already won, of our first painter of the human figure in action. An honorable position! Let the claims be well examined which the painters urge for any such rank as that. But as we have no space now for such examination, and as no one in this exhibition can dispute Mr. Homer's claim, we may let our award above given remain unexplained, in the belief that the future will approve it.

The small picture No. 190, "The Bright Side," seems to us even better than "Pitching Quoits." It represents a group of negro teamsters lounging and dozing under the sunny wall of a Sibley tent; another teamster's black head, broad hat, and pipe are thrust out from between the tent folds; wagons and mules are in the background. No improvement could be suggested that would make this picture a more expressive work or more effective as a representation of the scene. The nearest man and the most distant mule are equally good, and both as true and full of expression as if Mr. Homer could paint like Gérome.

Mr. Vedder has seven pictures this year on the walls, of which the smaller and the less pretentious are the better. The aim of this painter seems to be not representation of anything or record of anything, or skill in painting or in drawing, but the excitement in the beholder's nature of sympathy with solemn, terrible, or jocular fancies of his own. In this his chosen walk he does not advance as we ought to expect from one who seems so strong and abundant in his peculiar natural gifts. The Sphynx of two years ago was his best work, we then thought, and remains his best work, we think. The "Lost Mind," this year, No. 601, seems to us his weakest large picture, as devoid of any real meaning, or of any meaning which can be gathered from the work itself, as a picture by a man of brains and heart can be made. It is a matter of serious doubt if the painter knew what he meant to represent. It is a matter of doubt if the name have any connection with the picture. The landscape is the best part of the picture, and is vastly more efficacious in making the spectator uncomfortable and in sympathy with the wretched woman in the foreground,—which we take to be the object of the picture, if it have any object,—than anything in the face or action of the woman herself. This woman is taken out of the sphere of humanity, and made a myth, by her incredible dress, certainly not the dress of any nation under heaven. Nor does it seem the fancy of a madwoman this strange apparel, for the careful arrangement of the broad white scarf, a capital bit of composition, is a more studied "effect" in costume than most women in their senses attain to.

No. 76, "Girl feeding Chickens," is very charming in sentiment, a very real and pathetic little picture. What it lacks is good painting, delicate painting; so small a picture must be carried further into detail or it is coarse and repulsive. This picture on the walls of the gallery will pass, and seems even well painted after a look at its neighbors, but its unrefined, unfinished manner of painting soon makes itself felt. One cannot but look close at a little picture; one takes it in hand, if he own it and love it, or hangs it low and in a strong light.

Of one thing there is no doubt, Mr. Vedder needs great technical skill to be all he aspires to be. He needs the power of powerful and delicate drawing and a complete mastery of color. We cannot wish him a kinder wish than this, that he may learn to join French science to his own daring and originality. And so, with sincere regret that we have not space to give his work, past and present, the careful examination it deserves, we hope for him a better exhibition next year.

UNITED STATES 7.30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES,

$230,000,000.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the

7.30 LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of July 15, 1865, and are payable three years from that date in currency, or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.

GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These Bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum to their value, according to the rate levied upon other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The Interest at 7.30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents per day on a $100 note.
Ten cents per day on a $500 note.
Twenty cents per day on a $1,000 note.
One dollar per day on a $5,000 note.

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already sold, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at per 6 cent., instead of 7 3-10ths in currency. Subscribers will deduct the interest in currency up to July 15, at the time when they subcribe.

The slight change made in the conditions of this THIRD SERIES affects only the matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in Gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalize prices that purchases made with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

GREAT POPULAR LOAN OF THE PEOPLE.

Less than $230,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY A.M.

THE establishment of THE NATION dates with the beginning of a new fiscal year of the Government. All the official Treasury reports of customs, finance, and commerce run from July 1 to June 30, in place of January to December with the calendar year. The fiscal year 1865 ended on the 30th ult., under much happier auspices, financial as well as political, than the circumstances which attended its inauguration in July, 1864. The trade and commerce of the country, as well as the currency and public credit, were then supposed to be menaced with disaster by the rapid and enormous rise in gold, the embittered excitement of a pending Presidential canvass, and the partisan use which was industriously made in the money market and on the exchange of the bloody but inconclusive results of the war then going on. The prospects of a foreign trade equal to the customs revenue in gold which the interest on the public debt would require through the year, were deemed gloomy by many of the timid friends of the War Administration of Mr. Lincoln, and pronounced desperate by its enemies in Wall Street and in and around the Gold Room. If we rejected such fears as unworthy the great cause to which our country had pledged its resources, it was not without apprehension that the extravagant premium to which gold was running up might seriously enhance the cost of the war, which it really did for six or eight months. But beyond this effect on the public credit we felt sure the danger could not go, without a radical change in the temper of the nation in respect to the prosecution of the war, and this contingency the fall elections soon proved to be wholly out of the question.

We begin the new year with gold at 140 in place of 280 per cent. The Treasury alone holds over thirty millions in gold, as the surplus derived last year from customs over the sum required in gold for interest on the public debt; the New York banks hold about sixteen millions additional, and over sixty millions legal tender greenbacks. Above all, the country is at peace, and trade and commerce freed from the embarrassments on land and piracies at sea which for four years had been the incidents of war. The money market is equal to all the demands of legitimate trade and adventure at very cheap rates, and the unemployed balances in Wall Street are at the moment tempting fresh speculations on the stock exchange. We record the changes of the week as follows:

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The long 6 per cents. of 1881, of which the total issue is $282,570,650, gold interest January and July, have advanced from 106 to 106¾ per cent. ex July dividend, and are in good request.

The 6 per cents., 5-20s running 20 years to the year 1882, but redeemable at the option of the Government after five years, the original issue being $514,780,500, gold interest May and November, have advanced from 103¾ to 105⅜, chiefly on orders to buy for English and Continental account.

The 6 per cents., 5-20s running to 1884, but redeemable after 1869, issue of 1864, $90,789,000, gold interest May and November, have advanced from 103½ and 103¾ to 104⅞ and 105 per cent. on domestic demand, some of the holders of the first issue making the exchange at ⅛ to ¼ per cent. difference.

The 5 per cents., 10-40s, the issue $172,770,100, gold interest March and September, running to 1904, but redeemable after 1874, are in steady demand at 97¾ to 98 per cent.

All the foregoing quotations include the accumulated interest since the last dividend.

The 7-30 per cents., running on currency interest for three years from the date of issue, and then convertible into 5-20 years 6 per cent. gold-bearing bonds, are divided into three series. The first, of $300,000,000, August, 1864, interest February 15 and August 15, are selling at par and interest, which interest is easily calculated at two cents a day on each $100. The second, June, 1865, interest June 15 and December 15, $300,000,000, are selling in large sums at 99⅞ and interest. The third, July, 1865, interest July 15 and January 15, authorized for $230,000,000, are now being rapidly taken up by popular subscription at the rate of $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 per day at par, and a commission of ⅜ and ½ per cent. to large dealers and subscribers. There remains of this loan about $120,000,000 to be absorbed.

Treasury certificates of indebtedness, running twelve months from date, on 6 per cent. currency interest, are selling at 99¾ and interest for the issue of 1864, of which about $104,000,000 were outstanding on July 1, and 98½ and interest for the recent series, dating in June and July, 1865. The brokers are paying a premium of ½ and 1½ per cent. for the compound interest legal tender greenbacks, of 1864 dates, but the table of interest on the back of these notes will show that they are worth from 3 to 6 per cent. to holders who are obliged to use or sell them as ordinary currency. At the end of the three years for which they were issued, each $100 note will be worth $119 50. The whole issue on June 1 was $175,143,620, of which $111,497,370 bear date from 1864. The legal tender greenbacks, bearing no interest and constituting currency, amount to $433,160,569, which has not varied for twelve months past, except as to the balances held in the Treasury.

STATE SECURITIES.

New York Bounty Loan 7 per cent. is selling at 98½ and interest from July 1. The interest is at present payable quarterly, but should the people at the next election sanction the loan as a twelve-years stock, the interest will be paid January and July. If such sanction is not given, the whole loan will be paid off by special direct taxation next spring. There is not much doing in other New York State stocks, the bulk of which is held in the Bank Department as the basis of New York free bank currency.

Missouri 6 per cents. have advanced to 73 to 74 per cent., which includes 27 per cent. arrearages of interest. An ordinance of the late convention has just been adopted by the people by a majority of 18,000, requiring the railroads to which these bonds were issued to set aside, first, 15 per cent. for two years, and then 20 per cent. a year of their gross earnings, for the redemption of the debt and its arrearages.

Tennessee bonds of the railroad issues, of which there are about $12,000,000, as a $10,000 per mile first lien upon 1,200 miles of finished railway, have also recently advanced from 55 and 60 to 72 and 75 per cent. And old North Carolinas and Georgias, both of moderate issue since the war, find buyers at from 70 to 75 per cent. The whole issues of the eleven States recently in insurrection amount to about $87,000,000 (the heaviest being by Virginia), including $7,000,000 repudiated Union and Planters' Bank bonds of the State of Mississippi, and $6,500,000 or $7,000,000 of Louisiana bonds, specially secured by real estate mortgages to the Citizens' Bank and Bank of Consolidated Planters, of New Orleans, now in liquidation.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Most of the good railway mortgage bonds of the country have found their way to permanent holders, and scarcely any of the issues are in sufficient supply in Wall Street to induce speculation at the Stock Exchange. They are all called up for dealings every day, but business in them is confined to a few investment orders for $3,000, $5,000, or $10,000. Prices rule steady, notwithstanding the United States tax of 5 per cent. on their dividends, which leaves only 6.65 per cent. net to the holder of 7 per cent. bonds. The railway shares constitute the great staple of Stock Exchange speculation. They are classified as New York, Philadelphia & Reading, and Western lines. There is something done in the way of investment in one or two of the New England roads. Erie common shares, of which the present issue is 164,001 shares, or $16,400,100, advanced to 81 and 82 on the eve of the Fourth of July holiday, and have since ruled at 80¾ to 83 to 81⅞ per cent. New York Central, 243,860 shares, or $24,386,000, have a dividend from 94¾ to 96½ per cent.; Hudson River, 60,000 shares, from 108¾ to 110¾; Reading, about 400,000 shares of $50 each, or $20,000,000, from 97⅞ to 98¾ per cent. On the Western list, Michigan Central from 107 to 108½; Michigan Southern, 62½ to 63½; Illinois Central, 128½ to 137; Pittsburg, 69½ to 70¼; Fort Wayne, 95½ to 97½; Rock Island, 101¾ to 107½; North West, 26 to 68; and North West Preferred, 56½ to 62½.

MISCELLANEOUS STOCKS.

Pacific Mail Steamship Shares are $280 for $100; Atlantic Mail, 156 per cent., subject to future assessment of 30 per cent. or $126 a share for $70 now paid up. Almaden Quicksilver have advanced from 53½ to 61½ per cent.; Cumberland Coal, from 41 to 43½; Canton Land Company from 37 to 42; and Mariposa shares steady at $13 50.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Bills on London are chiefly negotiated as in gold, and rate 109 per cent. on the nominal par of $4 44 and 4 mills to the pound sterling. But the actual value of the pound sterling, by weight of the gold, being $4 84 by act of our Congress, the par of exchange is 109.23 per cent., or adding the 60 days' interest on the bill on London and the expenses of transmitting gold to pay such bill, the rate here should be 109¾ to 110¼ per cent. in gold, before the export of gold is profitable to the banker. With gold at 139 to 140 the exchange on London, in currency, is now worth about 151½ to 152½. The latest advices from England quote money at 3 per cent. a year at the Bank, and our 5.20 bonds 70¾ to 71 per cent. sterling money, which, with exchange at 152 per cent., is equal to about 108 per cent. currency for the bonds here, less commissions for executing the orders, and steamers' charges and insurance across the Atlantic.

NEW YORK PRODUCE AND LIVE-STOCK MARKETS

FOR WEEK ENDING JULY 8, 1865.

ASHES.—The demand has been only moderate this week. Prices have been rather unsettled, but at the close unsteady, at $7 25 to $7 50 for Pots, and $7 75 to $8 00 for Pearls.

BEESWAX has been in moderate request and steady, at 48 to 50c. for Yellow Western and Southern.

BREADSTUFFS.—The market for State and Western Flour has been less active than the week previous, and prices have fluctuated to some extent, but at the close show an advance of 10 to 15c. over last week's quotations. The following are our quotations: Superfine State, $5 15 to $5 50; Extra do., $5 90 to $6 10; Fancy do., $6 15 to $6 30; low grades Western Extra, $6 00 to $6 15; Shipping Ohio, $6 50 to $6 75; Trade and Family do., $6 80 to $7 60; St. Louis Extras at $7 80 to $11 00. Canadian Flour has been in very moderate demand, but prices are a shade better, our quotations showing an advance of from 5 to 10c. over last week. The closing prices are $5 90 to $6 15 for common to fair Extra, and $6 20 to $7 80 for Trade do. Southern Flour has been rather dull, but at the close we noticed a more active demand, and there is a slight improvement in prices. We quote common Baltimore and Country at $6 85 to $7 60, and Trade and Family do. at $7 65 to $11 50. Rye Flour is without change. The demand has been good, and prices are steady. The supply has been moderate. We quote at $5 00 to $5 30. Corn Meal has been quiet, and prices remain unchanged, viz., $4 75 for Jersey, and $5 20 for Brandywine. Wheat has been more active, and with the increased arrivals we have a better assortment in the market, and prices have declined, although at the close, with quite an active demand, prices had advanced, and closed firm at the following quotations: Chicago Spring, $1 24 to $1 29½; Milwaukee Club, $1 26 to $1 28; Amber do., $1 29 to $1 29½; Red Western, $1 40 to $1 42; Amber do., $1 45 to $1 50; White Michigan, $1 65, and very choice lots at $1 80 to $1 85. Barley Malt has been dull and scarce and prices nominal, the very small supply restricting business. We quote at $1 60 to $1 65. Oats have been quite active, and prices have fluctuated, Western having advanced to 77c. during the week, but with more liberal arrivals prices declined, and closed at the following quotations: Canadian, 60 to 62c.; State, 65 to 66c.; and Western at 69 to 70c. Rye has been quiet, but with the small supply prices have not materially changed. We quote Western at 85c. and State at 95c. Corn has been in active demand, both for export and home use, and prices have advanced, and closed firm at 68 to 70c. for Unsound; 78c. for Western Mixed; 78 to 80c. for Kiln Dried; and 80c. for Western White.

CANDLES.—Have been moderately active and steady at 21 to 24c. for Adamantine, 35c. for Sperm, and 45c. for Patent.

COPPER.—American ingot has been in less active demand, prices have declined, but at the close rather more steady. We quote at 28½ to 30c. for Lake and Baltimore. New Sheathing and Yellow Metal are steady at 35c. for the latter.

COFFEE.—Rio has been in good demand, but prices are without change to note. We quote: Prime, 21½c.; Good, 20 to 20½c.; Fair, 19 to 19½c.; Ordinary, 17½ to 18c.; and Fair to Good cargoes 19 to 20c. Other kinds are without change.

COTTON.—Our market has been much excited and very unsettled during the week; prices have fluctuated considerably, but as compared with last week show an advance of fully 6 to 7c. per lb. The market closes to-day (Thursday) very firm at 49 to 50c. for Middlings.

DYEWOODS.—Have been very dull, and as the market is well supplied, prices have ruled very heavy.

STOCK, JULY 1, 1865.

	Tons.		Tons.

FISH.—Dry Cod have been in good demand and very firm at $6 75 to $7 00 for St. George's and Grand Bank. Mackerel have also met with a fair jobbing demand and high prices. We quote No. 1 Mass. at $22 50 to $23, and No. 2 at $15 25 to $15 75. Smoked Herrings are in demand, and firmer sales at from 32½ to 40c. for Scaled, and 20 to 30c. for No. 1. Picked ditto are dull and nominal.

FRUIT.—Raisins still meet with a good inquiry and improving prices. We quote at $5 50 to $5 60 for New Bunch, and $6 20 to $6 25 for do. Layers. Sicily Oranges and Lemons are scarce and wanted. Foreign Green Fruits have also ruled very firm, and a fair business was done. Domestic Dried Fruits dull, and prices nominal.

HOPS.—A very fair demand still prevails for home consumption, but in prices we have no special change to note. Choice qualities are scarce and wanted, while other grades are plenty. We quote Old and New Crops as follows: 10 to 20c. for Inferior and Common, 25 to 30c. for Fair to Choice, and 35c. for a small lot of Fancy.

IRON.—There has been but little of importance done in Pig during the week. The only sales we hear of are small jobbing lots. In prices we have no change to note, but at the close they must be regarded as nominal. We quote at $35 to $36 for No. 1 American, and $40 to $45 for No. 1 Scotch.

LEAD.—Pig has ruled dull and heavy, but prices are without particular variation, though at the close they are nominal at $9 50 for Galena, and $8 75 to $9 00 for Spanish, German, Refined, and English. Bar is quoted at 12c., and Sheet and Pipe at 16c.

MOLASSES.—There has been a good business doing in the better grades, which are firm; but Low and Medium are not in much request. We quote Porto Rico at 65 to 70c., and Trinidad at 50c.

NAVAL STORES.—Spirits Turpentine has been in good demand and prices have improved. We quote at $1 40. Rosin has been in fair request at about same prices. We quote Common, $5 50 to $6 25: Strained and No. 2, $6 00 to $9 00; No. 1, $10 00 to $11 00; Pale and Extra, $12 00 to $14 00. Tar has been inactive and prices are a shade lower. We quote Domestic at $4 00 to $4 50, and Foreign at $6 00 to $6 50. Pitch is unchanged at $8 00 to $9 00.

OILS.—Whale oils have been in fair request at steady prices. We quote Crude Whale at $1 00 to $1 05, and Crude Sperm at $1 80 to $1 85. Linseed has been steady and in fair request at $1 18 to $1 20 for City. Lard Oil is steady at $1 55 to $1 65 for Prime Winter.

PETROLEUM.—The market for Crude was quite active and very firm in the fore part of the week; prices improved, and sales were made at 36c. per gallon, but ere the close the demand fell off, and, in order to effect sales, holders took off two cents per gallon. The market closes to-day dull at 34 to 34½c. Refined in bond has been only moderately active, but prices have ruled very firm, and closed at 54 to 55c. Free oil has been quiet, but there is no change in quotations, closing at 72 to 74c.

PROVISIONS.—We have had a very active market for Pork since our last, the enquiry being in part to cover contracts. The stock on the 1st inst. was 100,971 barrels, which is less than many anticipated, though these figures show a slight increase from last month. Prices have ruled very firm, and show a decided improvement. New Mess closes firm at $26 50 to $26 75; Western Prime Mess, $20 00 to $20 50; and Prime at $18 50. Beef has been in improved demand, and as there is a considerable reduction in the stock prices generally have ruled firm. Tierce Beef is scarce, and is held above the views of buyers. Beef Hams have been in fair demand, and prices ruled very firm, but at the close they are nominal at from $26 50 to $27 50 for Western. Bacon is in small supply and much wanted, in part for the Southern trade; prices at the close are nominal. Cut Meats have been in very good demand, the arrivals are light, and prices in consequence are well sustained. Sales of Shoulders in salt at 14 to 14½c., do. Hams at 18 to 18½c., and Pickled do. at 20 to 22c. Lard has been in active demand for the trade and for export; prices are well sustained; the stock of Prime Kettle is very moderate, closing at 15⅞ to 19c. for No. 1 and Prime Steam, and 19 to 19⅜c. for Kettle Rendered, the latter rate for Choice.

RICE.—There has a fair business been done during the week, and prices remain without change. We quote Carolina at 10 to 10⅜c., and Rangoon at 8 to 9⅛c.

SEEDS.—Grass Seeds, as usual at this season of the year, very dull, and prices nominal. Rough Flax has been in good request, and prices have advanced. We hear sales at $2 20 to $2 40 per lot of 56 lbs.

SUGAR.—Raw Sugars have been in good demand, and prices are very firm. We quote good refining Cuba at 11 to 11¾c., Porto Rico at 13 to 15c.; Refined have been firm at 19½ to 19¾c. for Hards.

SALT.—We hear of no sales, but holders, in the absence of any arrivals of moment, have advanced their prices.

TIN.—There has been only a limited enquiry for Pig since our last. Prices at the close are nominal. Small sales of Malacca at 26c., English 24c., and Banca at 27½c., all gold. Plates have been in moderate jobbing demand, and steady sales at $11 50 to $13 00 for J. C. Charcoal; $9 75 to $11 00 for J. C. Coke; $9 50 to $10 00 for Coke Fine; and $13 25 to $13 50 for Charcoal do.

TOBACCO.—The business done during the week has not been large, but prices have remained steady at the following quotations: Light Leaf, 4½ to 6c.; Lugs, 6 to 6¼c.; Common Leaf, 7 to 8c.; Medium do., 8½ to 10c.; Good do., 12 to 14c.; Fine do., 15 to 16c.; Selections, 17 to 18c.; Heavy Western Lugs, 7 to 8½c.; Common Leaf, 9 to 10¾c.; Medium do., 11 to 12c.; Good do., 13 to 15c.; Fine do., 16 to 18c.; Selections, 19 to 22c.

WOOL.—Domestic and Foreign Fleeces have not been active since our last, and prices are without change to note. The business doing has been confined to small lots.

BEEF CATTLE.

On Saturday morning the market opened quite steady with a fair demand, but later in the day, and up to Monday, a very heavy feeling prevailed, and prices gradually fell off. Our quotations as compared with last week show a large decline.

PRICES OF BEEF CATTLE AT FORTY-FOURTH STREET.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.

Sheep have suffered a material decline during the week. The enquiry has been extremely light, the market closing very dull. Lambs have also ruled heavy, and prices are lower, though they have not experienced as much depression as sheep. Some prime lots were sold at full previous prices. The market closes, however, very dull and heavy.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

TERMS:—Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

ARTICLES
HOUSEKEEPER SHOULD USE,
AND EVERY
GROCER SHOULD SELL!

Designed for the best Family Trade—celebrated for good weight and uniform quality. Have always taken the highest Prize at the State Exhibitions.

PYLE'S O. K. SOAP,

An effectual labor-saving and economic Soap, that only needs a trial to be appreciated. Wonderful success has attended its introduction. All classes of society approve it, and the sale is rapidly increasing. Being made from clean stock it serves both for Laundry and Toilet use. Send to your grocer and give it a trial.

PYLE'S BLUING POWDER,

A new article designed for the Household Laundry, which imparts that peculiar Pearly Whiteness to Laces, Linens, and Muslins so much desired by the ladies, and which makes this article an especial favorite. The Powder, also, makes a splendid Blue Writing Ink; thus the ladies can give delicacy to the appearance of their correspondence as well as to their linens. A trial will manifest its usefulness. See that your grocer procures it for you.

PYLE'S SALÆRATUS,
CREAM TARTAR, AND BAKING SODA,

Have gained a reputation for purity, good weight, and uniformity, that renders further recommendation unnecessary. Those who have never used them, and yet prefer the best articles of the kind that can be found, have only to call upon the grocer for those bearing the name of JAMES PYLE, and judge of the economy of their use.
Sold by grocers generally.

New Skirt for 1865.

THE GREAT INVENTION OF THE AGE IN

HOOP SKIRTS.

J. W. BRADLEY'S NEW PATENT DUPLEX ELLIPTIC (OR DOUBLE) SPRING SKIRT.

This invention consists of Duplex (or two) Elliptic Steel Springs, ingeniously braided tightly and firmly together, edge to edge, making the toughest, most flexible, elastic, and durable Spring ever used. They seldom bend or break like the single Springs, and consequently preserve their perfect and beautiful shape twice as long as any other skirt.

The wonderful flexibility and great comfort and pleasure to any lady wearing the Duplex Elliptic Skirt will be experienced particularly in all crowded assemblies, operas, carriages, railroad cars, church pews, arm-chairs, for promenade and house dress, as the Skirt can be folded when in use to occupy a small place as easily as a Silk or Muslin Dress.

A lady having enjoyed the pleasure, comfort, and great convenience of wearing the Duplex Elliptic Steel Spring Skirt for a single day will never afterward willingly dispense with their use. For children, misses, and young ladies they are superior to all others.

They are the best quality in every part, and unquestionably the lightest, most desirable, comfortable, and economical Skirt ever made.

For sale in all first-class Stores in this City, and throughout the United States, Havana de Cuba, Mexico, South America, and the West Indies.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

WE have this week commenced the publication of a series of letters from the South, which will constitute at least an honest attempt to describe its condition, without regard to the possible effects of what we publish on the fortunes or position of any political party. The public has had enough of correspondence in support of theories. And the faculty of generalizing correctly and rapidly is so rare, that we propose to allow our readers to perform most of the inferring process for themselves, contenting ourselves, as a general rule, with furnishing the bare facts.

SWIFT as was the collapse of armed rebellion, it has been attended with no appreciable shock to the country. War had come to be our normal condition, yet we relapse without disturbance into the ways of peace again. One by one the evidences of change accumulate: to-day the return of regiments to be mustered out; to-morrow a sale of war-vessels and transports; the unsealing of the ports followed by the removal of all restraints on inter-state traffic. To these is now added the farewell address of the managers of the Sanitary Commission to its agents throughout the land. With the fourth of this month the work of making and procuring supplies was officially directed to be brought to a close, and all that remains for the Commission is to attend to the distribution of stores on hand, to collect the pensions and back pay of the soldiers through its one hundred and twenty-seven offices, to account for its stewardship to the public, and make up its scientific record, for the advantage of every nation that is so luckless as to be involved in war. These duties, though assuredly not trifling, do not require that vast combination of charitable workers which has hitherto existed at the North, and to the members of which, especially, the Commission proffers its admiration and gratitude. It is indeed marvellous that a scheme of benevolence so extensive and so efficient as we know the Commission to have been, should have been sustained without ostentation, without bustle, and with so much certainty that, as the address says, "volunteer work has had all the regularity of paid labor," by the women of the loyal States. The phenomenon is without example in the history of this or any country, and deserves something more than applause and compliments. Honor as we may the tender sympathy, the devotion, the self-sacrifice, the faith that faltered not, the patient endurance of the wives and mothers and sisters whose toils are now ended, their harmonious co-operation and business-like punctuality —their division of labor and calculation of means, excite surprise in almost an equal degree. In thus displaying qualities which are commonly appropriated to the other sex, they suggest the permanent enlargement of their field of usefulness, since what they have accomplished in an extraordinary emergency, without previous training, is an earnest of their achievements when they shall have been regularly bred to habits of industry and self-support. Not one of them, we are sure, is grieved that the necessity for her task of love has ceased; yet thousands, we venture to believe, have found in serving the Commission a satisfaction not altogether attributable to a sense of duty fulfilled, and regret the return to a life of inactivity, from which they are forbidden to long for a second rescue similar to the first. As for the connection between our women at home and our soldiers in the field, it is enough to say that the influence of the former upon the morals, the constancy, the patriotism, and the health of the latter exceeds the power of computation. Had they, who at any time might be widows and orphans, been seduced by the peace faction of the North into joining the cry against the continuance of the war, it may be doubted whether the Government could have withstood the combination, or the army retained its discipline. That peril, however, never even threatened us, and to the women let due praise be given.

IT is impossible to see what is gained by such acts as the closing of Ford's Theatre in Washington by a military force. We can see some reasons, but they are diminishing very rapidly in number, why the Government should wish to keep the "war power" in their hands at Washington for a while longer; but why they should exercise it unnecessarily and in cases involving the violation of private rights, we do not see. It may be in bad taste for Mr. Ford to reopen his theatre; it may show a want of proper sensibility; but we have not reached such a pass in the United States that bad taste needs to be punished by martial law. If the theatre ought not to be reopened, the nation ought to buy it. To mulct a private individual of everything he has in the world, and suspend the conduct of his business, by the mere fiat of the Secretary of War, simply because the President happened to be murdered on his premises, is a very extraordinary proceeding, and has a very unpleasant savor of Vienna about it.

Now that the arrival of the Great Eastern with its precious freight is daily expected, it is almost superfluous to record the latest items indicative of the probable efficiency of the cable if laid. These are that, under conditions as nearly as practicable like those to which it will be subjected in ocean, the connected wire exhibited almost perfect insulation and conductivity, and with rude instruments a despatch of four words was made to traverse the 2,500 miles in a minute and a quarter. The Company believe that this interval can be shortened one half by their improved appliances. But even if it should not be, twenty thousand dollars per diem is a pretty revenue, and ought to content the stockholders and managers.

A CORRESPONDENT calls our attention to the fact that the Boston Transcript pronounces the word "chiefest," used by a writer in the last number of THE NATION, "not English, even if it can be said to belong to any language used by human beings." Our correspondent adds:

"The person who wrote this, had he been in the habit of reading his Bible, and remembering what he read, would have found the word chiefest four times in the Old and three times in the New Testament."

As a philological point, the above is hardly worth notice. We mention it as another illustration of the current style of "criticism," which consists mainly in sweeping and violent assertions by persons possessing very little acquaintance with their subject.

What Kennedy failed to accomplish, accident, or, as some insist, the design of a fellow incendiary, has brought about for Barnum's Museum. Seldom has a fire made quicker progress than that by which this famous building was consumed last week. In the present disorganization of our Fire Department, and the compactness of the city at this point, it is a wonder that the ruin was stayed within its actual limits. A high wind would have ensured a much more disastrous result. As it is, the loss is sufficiently great. Various are the regrets expressed on all sides at the destruction of the Museum. Some deplore the cabinets of geology and natural history, which it must be confessed were not attractively arranged; others the aquaria, which were tolerably well stocked and preserved; others the coins, engravings, paintings, etc., valuable for their antiquity or their contributions to history, chiefly American; others, again, the menagerie, which, truth to tell, affected unpleasantly the atmosphere of the establishment, and created an impression of uncleanliness perhaps ill-founded but certainly strong. For the proprietor, Mr. Barnum, there is but one feeling, that of sympathy. Whatever his reputation as a showman, as a citizen he is without reproach, and his services as a legislator in the State of Connecticut are too recent to be forgotten by the friends of human equality. Mr. Barnum has met reverses before, and refuses to be troubled by this the latest. He thanks the public, in a card, for their good-will, and promises to erect a nobler museum immediately, with surpassing collections. To this end he has despatched his agents forthwith to Europe, and announces his own departure after no great delay. Judging of his undertaking in advance, we cannot err in saying that it will not satisfy the highest wants of two such cities as New York and Brooklyn, and that there is need as well as room for a genuine Museum, which the student and the man of science may frequent with profit, and the public with unalloyed delight.

The President's plainness of speech seems to increase with each fresh delegation that attacks him. The Virginia gentlemen who professed ignorance that "men had aided the rebellion according to the extent of their pecuniary means," were told very flatly that they knew better. In the latitude of Richmond this impeachment of their intelligence or their veracity, it would make little difference which, would have called for a murderous display of chivalry. At Washington, while the graves of the assassins were still new, discretion was the better part of valor. Nor did the supplicants fare better by suggesting that they did not happen to have been leaders in rebellion, but joined it at the last reluctantly. Mr. Johnson had a counter-suggestion, that the last too frequently became the first and the worst of traitors. Finally, he told them he did not credit their assertion that his amnesty obstructed the revival of business and bore heavily upon the poor, and dismissed them with a pretty positive intimation that it was easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rebel, who was worth more than $20,000, to crawl under the Executive pardon.

Judge William Marvin has been appointed Provisional Governor of Florida; so that if there are as many States as heads thereof, the Union is restored to its original fulness. The President has had his way without hindrance, and protest against the extension of his policy must resolve into criticism of its workings from the Potomac to the Rio Grande.

The Richmond Whig, of which we spoke in our last as having changed neither its name nor proprietor, has been suppressed by General Terry for stigmatizing the President's amnesty as "heathenish," and a duly approved law of Congress as "mean, brutal, and cowardly, revoltingly absurd and atrociously unjust." We presume that nobody will criticize this procedure who objects to a reversal of all that has been gained by the war, by the identical means which were employed to excite and foster the rebellion. Nor is it surprising that martial law should overtake a newspaper, after having been required for a city like Norfolk. But do the authorities at Washington understand the lesson of their own intervention in both these cases? There never could have been a rebel mayor chosen in Norfolk, nor a treasonable journal perpetuated in Richmond, if there had been nothing in either community to correspond with these disgraceful facts. The immediate officers in command necessarily act upon emergencies as they arise; but it behooves the Executive to deal, not with isolated symptoms, but with the disease itself. There is no mistaking its nature. The signs are legion that the whole State of Virginia, and, it may be safely averred, every other State late in arms, is unfit to be trusted with self-control. So long as the materials are unchanged, it is folly to expect to alter the character of the edifice. "Brick I found it, and marble I left it," is not destined to be said of the South by our Augustus at the end of a reconstruction with bricks alone: clay will be clay—not limestone nor granite.

Two good illustrations of carrying coals to Newcastle were afforded by the British authorities when, in 1812, they sent out water-casks to their fresh-water squadron on the Lakes, and, later, a flagstaff to Canada of dressed Canadian pine! A third would seem to be, in this country, sending "negro minstrels" to the South. Yet we know that they flourished there before the war, and now one reads of their performances in Charleston. We do not share the surprise of a writer in the Courier of that city at certain "ungenteel interruptions" which marred a late exhibition, nor agree that the presence of the improper persons who caused them had no connection with the character of the entertainment. It would be idle to deny that negro minstrelsy is attractive to people of cultivation as well as to the rabble, since a disposition to laugh and a sensibility to music are common to all ranks of society. Mixed, however, with these legitimate appeals to human nature is much that is coarse and offensive, while the object of the caricature itself is degrading both to participants and spectators, and increases the popular contempt for a race which is under the ban. Neither humor nor melody would be exhausted if plantation manners, costumes, and complexions were banished from the stage of minstrelsy. On the other hand, the negro will never be fully recognized as a man so long as decent folks are willing to patronize the buffoons who make their mock of him.

One George W. L. Bickley, M.D., who styles himself "President of the Golden Circle," issues from his present lodgings in Fort Warren an order and a circular. The order suspends the operations of the Circle till 1870. The circular purports to be a defence of that organization and a partial exposition of its designs. Dr. Bickley says he is a Southern-born man, and thinks he knows the people of the South, though he asserts that "they have no superiors in the higher and nobler qualities of human nature." Furthermore, he is a white man, and therefore prefers white society—say of the sentinel who guards his cell, to that of a negro servant in the days when he could command one. The particular aversion of the Golden Circle was radicalism of every sort, and hence no lodges were erected in South Carolina or Massachusetts, and Wendell Phillips and Barnwell Rhett are relieved from the suspicion of being "K. G. C.s." The guiding precept of Dr. Bickley's followers was the Golden Rule, and an applicant for membership was only required to admit his faith in the tenets and principles of the Bible, his determination to obey the laws of the United States, and to take especial care of the "honor, glory, and interest" of the national Government, "or of the State in which he lived." Beyond this no questions were asked concerning a man's political opinions or his views touching slavery. To be sure, no Knight with an "honest, unbiassed judgment," having declared his belief in the Bible, could deny that "slavery was recognized by the expressed letter of the Old and New Testaments;" and this being the case, it is difficult to credit the Doctor's statement that the order contained thousands of the supporters of Garrison, Beecher, Giddings, Chase, Wade, and Winter Davis. Foreseeing civil war from the assaults upon slavery which the North was for ever making, the Golden Circle hit upon a most ingenious plan—shall we call it Bickley's patent preventive?—for avoiding the dire calamity. This was by fortifying the South politically, which could only be done by expanding her territory; the grand object being to "allay her morbid apprehensions," and make her "so strong in the Union that there could no longer be a pretext for separating from the North." The way to settle the Kansas difficulty was clearly to surrender Kansas to slavery, and the Doctor regards Missouri and Texas as irreproachable peace plasters, of blessed memory. A good deal of rebellious denunciation of the war, and lamentation for liberties lost in the great overthrow of the South; a charge, which the Abolition Knights of the Circle could readily substantiate, that the weapons which preceded the bayonet in the fight with the South on the slavery issue were not "the pulpit, the rostrum, and the press;" and a vindication of fillibustering under the Christian motto before mentioned, compose the remaining substance of the long-winded document. The imprisoned physician who has been unable to heal his country and himself announces his resolve to retire to the pursuits of private life,—we presume with a pass from Secretary Stanton. Thus obscured, he will pray "for the final triumph of Saxon liberty [to wallop niggers] over Latin monarchism on this continent," and await the assembling of the Decennial Congress of the Golden Circle at Washington on the 1st of July, 1870.

Fort Laramie is situated at the junction of the Nebraska and Laramie Rivers, in almost the exact latitude of Boston, but about thirty-five degrees nearer to the Pacific. Some estimate of Western emigration may be formed from the passage of trains through this point in the last two months. In May, over 5,000 teams and 40,000 head of stock. In June, about 4,000 emigrants and 30,000 head of stock. This monstrous tide is pouring over the Rocky Mountains, while the plains they have traversed are lined with the trains of their immediate successors. Our subjugated brethren at the South find any portion of their prospect more agreeable than the inevitable invasion of Northern settlers. One great secret of their eagerness to resume the political control of their respective States is—let President Johnson heed!—their determination to bar out these pestilent intruders, these fellows who come to renew their wasted soil, to raise unheard-of crops, to clear the forest and drain the swamp, to impress the water-power into their service, to set up the cotton-mill alongside of the cotton-field, to build highways, to explore mines, and in short to turn the slothful, shiftless Southern world upside down—the fanatics! The Yankee may be bothered, but he cannot be baulked, nor shut out from the territory which he has enriched with his blood. What foothold he has already secured cannot be stated accurately. It is too early to look, as we reasonably may, for the migrations of families and individuals whom the war has directly acquainted with the advantages of the South. To a large extent it is probable our military campaigns have been surveying excursions, in which a goodly share of the land has been mentally appropriated, in lots to suit, by the enterprising lads in army blue. The most unruly districts will naturally be avoided, and the plan of the chivalry is clearly to make their visitors uncomfortable at all points. The emigration to Maryland is described as very large, though the lower counties, which have been most cursed by slave labor, are less favored by the new comers than the others. Many fine farms, however, are for sale in Talbot and Kent, the best of these, at prices ranging from forty to eighty dollars an acre. Some need to be subdivided, and all to be fertilized artificially.

Everybody remembers Gen. Sherman's liberal estimate of the number of men required to put down the rebellion, at the very outset. The story has been somewhat distorted, and the General gave the true version at a recent festival at Columbus, Ohio. While he was in command in Kentucky, he represented to Secretary Cameron, who was there in person, the smallness of the force with which he would be compelled to march by divergent lines towards Nashville and East Tennessee. When asked how many troops would suffice for the present campaign, he replied: "Sixty thousand; and two hundred thousand before you can subjugate the South." This was the "something as black, sir, as a crow," which was exaggerated into the remark of a madman.

French manufacturers have actually made contracts with an English railroad for the supply of railroad iron and locomotives at lower rates as well as of better workmanship than the English. This, coming in the same week with the winning of the Derby, has caused a sensation. In casting about for the reason why, one wiseacre has lighted on the existence of patents in England. But there are issued in France two huudred and sixty patents to every million of population, to one hundred in England There can be little doubt that the cause is moral and not economical. Continental workmen are gaining on the English every year in character, and intelligence, and education.

Apropos of the disorderly speeches of Emerson Etheridge and others, and the recent arrest of the former in Tennessee, Gov. Brownlow has issued an address to the people, and especially to that portion of it which shows an ugly disposition toward its present rulers and the new Constitution. He argues with great moderation and at some length the nature of the government now existing in the State. He says rebellion usurped the former legitimate authority, and constrained the United States to establish there a republican form of government according to the guaranty of the Constitution. This establishment, being in the nature of a gift, was not conditional with the donor, who might have copied the model of Kentucky or of Maine indifferently. The convention which framed the new Constitution of Tennessee was appointed as an act of grace, not of necessity. Its submission to the people for ratification or rejection was equally optional with the Executive at Washington. As for its being forced upon the disloyal majority without their being permitted to vote upon it, "so," says the Governor, "was the authority of the United States forced upon them, and at the point of the bayonet." Besides, the convention was empowered to determine the qualifications of suffrage, and the people confirmed its action. The law is lenient rather than harsh, as it substitutes temporary disfranchisement for the graver penalties of treason—death and confiscation of property. The Governor gives warning that no attempt to evade the statutes or to excite a hostile reaction will be tolerated by the civil or military officials, who understand each other perfectly and will work harmoniously. All illegal elections will be nullified, and the State shall go unrepresented in Congress rather than be represented by rebels.

Art does not take kindly to bronze in Boston. The statue of Webster in the State House yard was mated on the Fourth with one of Horace Mann, though the living subjects of these monuments were wont—to borrow a jest from Sidney Smith—to argue from different premises. Mr. Powers, the sculptor of the former, did not succeed in overawing criticism by the weight of his reputation. Tailors, even, in their advertisements to the public, disavowed being responsible for the cut of the Webster costume. Now, if we may trust a Boston paper, the adverse opinion which has hitherto prevailed is softening into approbation, since Miss Stebbins has evidently studied the Philosophy ot Clothes with much less insight than her rival artist. He took the modern garb and made the most of it. She attempted to mitigate its stiffness with drapery, and the resulting impression "is of a Salem or Palmer leg, booted and trowsered, sewed on to the front of a sail-cloth."

Forty-three miles of the Central Pacific Railroad have been completed, from Sacramento to Clipper Gap, an elevation of 1,800 feet in the Snowy Mountains. The summit to be overcome is 7,000 feet high, and, this once achieved, the rest of the route to Salt Lake City, up the Humboldt Valley, presents no serious obstacles. With commensurate diligence on the part of those constructing the eastern portion, the perfection of the entire line is warranted within five years. The mountain grades are trifling when contrasted with those of Mont Cenis, upon which an experimental railway has just been successfully built and tested. The mean gradient is one in thirteen, the maximum one in twelve; the distance from base to summit a mile and a quarter. The transit is pronounced even safer than by the ordinary road.

The great "servant gal" question is dividing with the general elections the attention of London society. The interest in it has become so intense that a lady recently "read a paper on it" at St. James's Hall. The English servants, it seems, are displaying all the faults of the age—individualism, independence, love of money, love of dress, and love of "company." Why they should be expected to escape the weaknesses of their contemporaries in other walks of life we cannot well see; and we confess we do not hope for improvement either in their manners or morals by means of a "reform agitation." Their ways, like those of New York aldermen, will hardly be mended, except by the general progress of society.

Perhaps the ablest argument on reconstruction now before the country is the Faneuil Hall address, bearing date of June 21, and signed by the officers of the meeting from which it emanated, as well as by the committee who drew it up. After tersely exhibiting the tendency and final posture of Southern society, in opposition to that of the North, the conclusion is reached that it was controlled by three ideas: Slavery, Aristocracy, State Supremacy. These regulated its political warfare in 1860, were the foundation of its empire in 1861, and sustained it during four years of battle. No surrender has taken place from political considerations. The Southern States were broken down by force, and must be held by force. "The right of this republic to be a sovereign, amongst the sovereignties of the earth, must be put beyond future dispute, abroad as well as at home." The object of the rebellious communities is to resume the exercise of State functions with the least delay and the least change of institutions. The dangers of immediate restoration are imminent, for slavery is the law of every rebel State, and the free colored man is disabled from testimony, education, the franchise, and even from residence. The spirit of the people will be hostile to the introduction of schools, of colonies, of Northern capital and enterprise, and of all philanthropic undertakings. They will oppose being taxed to pay the national debt. It is a fallacy to contend that States are rehabilitated by the mere cessation of war. The rebel country is in military occupation, and the nation has something to say before this is yielded up. "It is our right and duty to secure whatever the public safety and the public faith may require." For instance, that the republic has a permanent claim on the allegiance of every citizen; that the public faith be pledged to every person of color at the South for his complete and veritable freedom for ever, and that of his posterity; that slavery be abolished and prohibited by irreversible law; that the system of the States be truly republican. Most of these ends can be attained only while the States are still under military control. The gentlemen who met in Faneuil Hall do not ask for unconditional, universal suffrage:

"We declare it to be our belief that if the nation admits a rebel State to its full functions with a constitution which does not secure to the freedmen the right of suffrage in such manner as to be impartial, and not based in principle upon color, and as to be reasonably attainable by intelligence and character, and which does not place in their hands a substantial power to defend their rights as citizens at the ballot-box, with the right to be educated, to acquire homesteads, and to testify in courts, the nation will be recreant to its duty to itself and to them, and will incur and deserve to incur danger and reproach proportioned to the magnitude of its responsibility."

Political justice and safety, not social equality, is in question. The South gains two-fifths in the next apportionment of representatives. We have to choose between four millions of ignorant, indolent, disfranchised, degraded, helpless beings, and the reverse. The return of the States is desirable only so fast and so far as they come back "with constitutions in which the public safety and public faith shall be secured."

It appears, now that the plan of reconstruction or reconciliation, or whatever it may be called, has been settled on, the Government begins to think of trying to get some information as to whether it is a good plan or not—in other words, they are making preparations to lock the stable-door after the steed is stolen. We are told that Carl Schurz has been sent on a commission of enquiry through the Southern States to report upon the condition of feeling of both blacks and whites, and still another commission composed of several members is talked of. We still think, as we said a fortnight ago, that the Cabinet ought to have been made through some channel thoroughly familiar with the state of Southern society before setting to work to reorganize it. The off-hand way in which the task is disposed of in talk, both in Washington and New York, has, to us, always been alarming.

Slavery in Kentucky is like a man in the article of death, whose quietus depends not so much on the course of nature as on the verdict of a physician. The wrangle is as to who shall pronounce the fact, and incur the claim of damages which the disappointed creditors of the bankrupt are prepared to set up. Certain owners of what was lately property and had an appreciable value, are hoping that the State will inform them that their proprietorship is a delusion. Certain others, who are none the less eager for indemnification, prefer that the United States should speak the fatal word. To this latter class Gov. Bramlette belongs, and he therefore urges the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment as the surest mode of obtaining compensation. This policy smacks of shrewdness, but we think the event will show that a claim which the people of Kentucky would assuredly reject, and which the slaveholding oligarchy dare not even present to them, will scarcely be allowed by the nation at large. Great indeed is the impudence of men who, having scouted an overture of compensation in the days of President Lincoln, when it was worth while, perhaps, to buy out the institution, now send up their bill as if it were still optional with them whether to sell or to keep the subject of the former bargain.

Considering the number and political weight of the Germans in this country, too little is known of their sentiments and doings by native-born citizens. Almost as numerous as our Irish population, they are far less subject to the control of demagogues, and have a greater natural adaptation to our democratic society. Their interest in the late struggle has been deep, and their concern for the proper use of the victory which has been gained is proportionately earnest. The "Unionbund" of this city has just prepared an address to the German-Americans of every locality, the sum of which we shall endeavor to reproduce. The President's plan of reconstruction is criticized, first because it is undertaken hastily, by the Executive alone, without consulting Congress—contrary to the spirit of our institutions. The sphere of the Executive has been liberally enlarged in war time, of necessity; now we ought to be jealous of its exceeding its usual limits. The failure to call Congress together has tended to occasion a breach between the Administration and the leaders of the loyal party, which may be seriously widened when the former body shall reject the States which the President, perhaps, will insist have been legally re-established. The dogma of State sovereignty, which has just been battled down, reappears in the concession to the rebel States of the right of reconstruction, by which they are enabled to affect the welfare of the Union according to their own pernicious ideas; and in recognizing the actual validity of their former constitutions, with the single exception of bondage. Against this it is asserted that these instruments were abrogated along with the State governments themselves by the act and consequences of rebellion, and that only territories are left to be managed by the victorious nation. What is wanted is guardianship for the security of the loyal whites in life, property, and political power, and for the similar protection of the blacks—an armed hand that shall mould deliberately the new society of the South—a firm system, rather than an experiment or a trial. The duty of the United States is to impose a complete, not partial, republican form of government for all the inhabitants, and not for a class alone. The Northern States are striving, such of them as perceive their deficiency, to conform their practice more nearly to the basis of equal rights. The Southern States should be made to obey the universal tendency. The mischievous results of the President's policy are pointed out in Tennessee, North Carolina, and Mississippi. While the unrepentant rebels are everywhere boasting of a speedy return to power, pardons which precede judgment are plentifully distributed, and the peril is imminent of losing both the conviction of traitors and the confiscation of their estates. The Unionbund warns the President and the people to see that the republic sustain no detriment.

The subject of prison discipline is attracting renewed attention all over the world. The "Irish System" is modifying the views of men most versed in such matters as to the best modes of penal discipline. At one time our prisons were almost as much vaunted as our schools, but recent facts show that in some of the most noted among them there are terrible abuses. There is need of a general reform and revision of our system. In Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New York, and Ohio, the modes of improvement are being discussed with vigor. In Canada there is great interest in the subject, and the need of reform is strongly urged. No one who examines the subject seriously can doubt that the Irish system is vastly more humane and humanizing than those which are followed in this country. It will not answer for us to fall behind in a matter in which we ought to keep the advance.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

THE LATEST BUGBEAR.

It is beginning to be whispered about that if the agitation in favor of negro suffrage should make such progress as to create a strong probability of its success, a panic would ensue in the foreign money market as to its possible effects on the national credit, and we should witness a rapid return of United States bonds held abroad, and the withdrawal of large amounts of gold in exchange, thus causing a further depreciation of the currency. No matter what the capacity of the negroes for self-government may be, it is said, foreigners will not place much faith in it, and will not be persuaded that a large body of voters so grossly ignorant as the most of them must be, will not be used by demagogues in a crusade against the public credit. Nothing is easier than to make the uneducated and unenlightened restive under taxation, and the advantage of keeping faith with public creditors is, even to those who see it at all, rather remote, while the individual advantage of not keeping it, is immediate, and apparent to everybody. Considerations of honor or duty, or of patriotism, which influence most good citizens in bearing cheerfully their share of the public burdens, and which serve to counterbalance the inconvenience it may occasion, can, it is said, hardly be expected to have much weight in the eyes of men who have only within the last year come into possession of their own persons.

It is hardly necessary to say that this vision of the possible consequence of pushing the triumph of Northern principles to its legitimate consequences, has been conjured up in England. The Confederate sympathizers there were momentarily stunned by the collapse of the Confederacy and the utter falsification of all their prophecies with regard to the course of the military struggle; but they have recovered, and are now assuring the world that they always knew that the South would have to succumb in the field; what they always said was—and its truth was now about to be made apparent—that the real difficulties of the North would only begin when the fighting was over; that foremost amongst these is the determination of the political status of the negro; that he must be made a voter, and that if he is, he will pull down the pillars of the state, and bury himself and the whites in a common ruin. We believe on the whole there is nearly as much pity affected for Americans in Belgravia at this moment as there was in 1862.

Happily, not only is there no country in Europe in which there is less confidence in human nature and in really popular government felt than in England, but the quantity of United States bonds in English hands is very small. Nine-tenths at least of those which are held abroad are held on the Continent, principally in Germany, and there, strange as it may seem, there is really far stronger belief in the soundness of the democratic principle, and the strength of democratic institutions, than in England, where the government is professedly popular. That persons who have never acknowledged that any government could be carried on where all white men voted, and who were confident only six months ago that ours had failed for that reason, should now be confident that the voting of black men will prove our ruin, is nothing wonderful.

We believe there is no great difference of opinion, in this country, as to the necessity for popular education as the only sound basis of democratic government. But when we ask for an application of this principle, we are apt to find that those who urge it most strongly just now really think it only good for blacks, and care very little, if a voter's skin is white, whether he can tell his right hand from his left. The forebodings which many excellent people feel as to the probable effects of negro suffrage on our Government, they have really seen all realized in the case of the Southern whites, and yet they propose to commit the management of the affairs of half the continent, at once, to the hands of these very same men, without a particle of question or misgiving. The negroes can neither read nor write; no more can nine-tenths of the Southern whites. The negroes are lazy and shiftless; so are the whites. The negroes are incapable of forming an intelligent opinion on any public question; but who does not know that public opinion at the South has always been formed by a few leaders—that the mass of the population took no part whatever in the work? What does a poor white know of finance, or credit, or constitution, or international law? What argument could any demagogue address to a negro in favor of repudiation that would not produce just as much effect on the common mass of Caucasians? What worse could a convention of "degraded blacks" do in the matter of the public debt than was done in Mississippi by the members of the "superior race," led on by that model Caucasian, Jefferson Davis? And if the blacks get complete possession of the South, what scurvier trick could they play us, or the public creditors, than seize our forts, arsenals, sub-treasuries, post-offices, refuse to pay taxes, block up the rivers, tear up the railroads, and finally declare war on us?

They may, if they are armed with the franchise, be led by Southern demagogues into an assault on the public credit. Black as well as white men are mighty uncertain; but we do not well see how this would make the case worse than it stands at present. We may be pretty sure that every Southern voter and member of Congress will do everything he can to get rid of taxation imposed for the express purpose of putting down the rebellion. We have not the slightest doubt that we shall see parliamentary tactics exhausted by them for some years to come in the effort to evade the liabilities with which their revolt has saddled the country. But the number of Southern representatives, as was recently pointed out by the New York Times, cannot be increased before 1870, and even then the liberation of the negroes will only add two-fifths to the basis. That is to say, of 4,000,000 of blacks, 2,400,000 have been already represented; in 1870, 1,600,000 will be added—a matter certainly of no great importance at present, even if they possessed the franchise and used it under the dictation of their late masters.

For if they did use it under the dictation of the planters, we should be no worse off than we are now. The poor whites who will vote under the present régime will be as much under their influence as ever they were, and are as ignorant and degraded as any planter could desire; and the negro will be hereafter represented in Congress whether we allow him to vote or not. So that, so far from gaining any security against repudiating demagogues, by shutting him out from the citizenship, we lose the chance of his refusing to do their bidding. And that this chance is not small we may fairly infer from all that has occurred during the war. If the slaveholder's influence was not sufficient to convert the negro into a rebel, why should the employer's influence be sufficient to convert him into the political enemy of the party to which he knows he owes his freedom?

We repeat, that the proper course for those who are alarmed at the prospect of seeing the negroes allowed to share in the work of reorganizing and governing the South, on the ground of their ignorance, is to agitate not for his exclusion, but for the abolition of the color test and the substitution of that of intelligence or education. In the existing social condition of the South they gain nothing by merely shutting out the blacks, for they leave within the pale about the same number of stupid, ignorant, and degraded white people. Not a single danger is got rid of in this way, while a distinction is perpetuated by it which is repugnant to the spirit of democratic institutions, and keeps society in a state of constant agitation. And we know of no matter which is more deeply affected by the manner in which we now settle the question of Southern suffrage, than that of the national credit.

THOSE BELLIGERENT RIGHTS.

The old question as to the concession of belligerent rights to the Southern Confederates has been brought to the surface again, and a new hearing got for it on both sides of the ocean. Should the only effect of this be to keep open a blister that ought now to be healed, it might be regretted. If the controversy will bring some permanent principle to light, it will in the end make for peace; if not, it were better to drop it. If it were to continue, little could be gained by a captious and splenetic style of argument.

In March last Mr. Bright, in a characteristic speech, made a fresh attack on the course taken by England in regard to American affairs. His remarks on belligerent rights called out Earl Russell in the other House, and afterwards in the Times the distinguished writer who signs himself "Historicus." Some weeks later Mr. Bemis, of Boston, the author of a pamphlet on "Precedents of American Neutrality," which attracted attention in this country and in England, published in one of the journals of that city an elaborate bill of charges against the English Government, mainly in reply to the defence set up by Lord Russell and Historicus. This paper has since been reprinted in pamphlet form with additions, under the title of "Hasty Recognition of Rebel Belligerency, and Our Right to Complain of It." Mr. Bemis's positions have been opposed with temper and ability by a member of the Boston bar and by Mr. Lyulph Stanley, son of the Postmaster-General of England, whom many Americans will remember as a young traveller of great intelligence.

The longest and most elaborate of these productions is that of Mr. Bemis. His purpose is frankly announced in his title. The first word is an indictment. Like a man who is sure that he "does well to be angry," he has no doubt of his "right to complain." And he complains throughout. There is not, we believe, a page of his pamphlet that is not in that strain. It is not necessary to complain of him for complaining. He had to deal with advocates, whose case he sought to demolish. And he has given a most vehement exhibition of the weak side, as it appears to him, of the policy of the English Government. He has used his industry as an explorer and his ability as a commentator to prove the folly and the injustice of the concession of belligerent rights, as it was made. If some points are over-emphasized, and some small differences magnified; if there is occasionally a rather loose mixture of ethical opinion and historical fact, it is what an open assailant can hardly be expected wholly to avoid.

So far as the mere date of the Queen's proclamation is concerned, it may be doubted whether any good end will be reached by re-arguing the point of discourtesy. To us it may be difficult to see how England could have suffered much by a few days' delay. She certainly would have avoided the appearance of casting a slight on an embarrassed friend, and she would not have roused the resentment of a susceptible nation. In diplomacy surprises are always dangerous tools. And yet, on the other hand, it was probably thought that what must soon be done might as well be done at once. A definite line of conduct seemed better than the chances of international debate, which might in the end cause more irritation than a decisive act. A government, as trustee for the people, must first look to the interest of the people; and that might well appear in this case to demand a neutral position. And it may be that the risk of deranging the politics of the country was not left out of sight. To take either side might provoke others to take the opposite side, and the American question might become the foremost English question—a thing for English interests not to be desired. Discourtesy lies in the needlessness of an ungracious act, or in the ungracious manner of a necessary act. The proclamation is in itself free from any offensive phrase. And mere absence of cordiality, even at a critical time, is not necessarily discourtesy. Doubtless, we were grievously disappointed; we shall learn to expect less hereafter, and perhaps to give less. But a controversy that turns on past mortifications is seldom fruitful or wholesome. It might, indeed, be worth while to bring up for rebuke Lord John Russell's gratuitous tartness of phrase, if at this advanced day such expressions as "the northern portion of the late Union" were not rather to be laughed at, or if the world had not become used to the taste of his vinegar.

Nor is much to be gained by convicting the English Ministry and its supporters of inconsistency in the different grounds assigned, at different times, for the concession of belligerent rights. The crew of a ship that reefed her sails under the threat of a tremendous tempest, and ran for the nearest port, would not all agree as to the particular sign that most moved them; nay, in relating the affair, they would naturally draw on the effects of the storm for proofs of the wisdom of avoiding it. That the concession sprang from some sort of conviction that the insurrection, if not speedily successful, would have to be crushed out by a vast war, seems to be too clear to need argument. It matters little whether this or that sign was really the one that had most weight in producing the conviction. That the English Government overrated the inconveniences that might come upon English commerce may be granted. And yet, in their general estimate of the signs of the times, as to the breadth and violence of the conflict, though not as to the will and might of our people, the English Ministers were, to say the least, as nearly right as we ourselves. And looking, as they were bound first to do, to home interests, they were unwilling to run what did not seem to them to be so very slight a risk. Mr. Bemis, in one of his keenest and most telling hits, speaking of Mr. Davis's offer to grant letters of marque, ridicules the idea of guarding againt unrecognized privateers by recognizing the privateers; and asks whether Captain Kidd might not as well have claimed the honors of war by granting commissions to other freebooters. An Englishman might possibly reply that the Confederates seemed as likely to find cruisers as the old Government to find ships enough to shut them up, that it would be more troublesome to call them pirates than privateers, and that, after all, a fire set in the headquarters of property is not to be likened to a fire in an out-of-the-way barn.

Waiving, then, these less important matters, it may safely be assumed that no one will deny a foreign nation the right, when war is actually flagrant, to take a neutral attitude between an established and an insurgent government. Mr. Clay is reported to have said in debate, in 1817, whenever a war exists, whether between two independent states or between two parts of a common empire, he knew of but two relations in which other powers could stand towards the belligerents: the one was that of neutrality, the other that of a belligerent. Did war exist when the neutrality proclamation was issued? Something like it certainly. After long preparation in the framing of a government and the organizing of an army, the Confederate authorities at Montgomery, acting not as a local but as a central power, the North looking on all the while in amazement or apathy, ordered the blow to be struck at Sumter. This was followed up in quick succession by the President's call for militia-men, and by his proclamation of a blockade. Then came Mr. Davis's invitation to take out letters of marque. The four acts hung well together. And all of them were known in England before the Queen's proclamation. Of the first two the English Ministers had full information before they decided on neutrality; and of the other two a considerable inkling. But the first two might be regarded as the opening of a war, the brewing of which had been slow but perfectly obvious. The proclamation of neutrality, issued after the four acts were fully understood, might well speak of "hostilities." The President, to be sure, was bound to describe the movement at first as an insurrection; only in that way could he legally call out the militia. Foreign nations, however, were not obliged to limit themselves to that municipal view. The blockade, it has been argued, was prospective and in intent, and, till it went into actual force, could give no color to a declaration of neutrality. Prospective in what way, and for how long? Evidently, only until the necessary arrangements could be made to carry it into effect. When Mr. Seward wrote that "the proclamation was a mere notice of an intention to carry the blockade into effect, and that the existence of the blockade would be made known in proper form by the blockading vessels" (Bemis, p. 24), his object probably was to inform foreign powers how and when the liability of their subjects would begin. The President was at full liberty to put the blockade into operation the next day. No intelligent foreigner could doubt that it would take effect as soon as possible. The President's proclamation was evidence of the actual continuance and of the expected continuance of hostilities; indeed, of downright war, if foreign powers chose to take that view. For the language of the proclamation was very strong. He "deemed it advisable to set on foot a blockade . . . . . in pursuance of the laws of the United States and of the law of nations," and declared that for this purpose a competent force would be posted to prevent entrance and exit of vessels. The English Government accepted the blockade in the ordinary sense, submitted to the established penalties, and adhered, in spite of cavil and exception at home, to a frank and liberal interpretation of our right. What ground there can be for regarding the concession of belligerent rights by England and France as a "virtual announcement" of the fact that they "cared more for procuring cotton than for the integrity of the American Union," involving as that concession did their submission to the blockade, it is not easy to perceive. It may be well to quote a passage from the opinion of the Court in the often-cited prize cases in 2 Black's Reports: "When the party (p. 266) in rebellion occupy and hold in a hostile manner a certain portion of territory; have declared their independence; have cast off their allegiance; have organized armies; have commenced hostilities against their former sovereign—the world acknowledges them as belligerents, and the contest a war." Mr. R. H. Dana, speaking of course as counsel, but not lightly, said (2d, p. 261): "The proclamations make the blockades belligerent acts and not municipal surveillance. They are declared to be 'in pursuance of the law of nations,' and guaranteed to be made effective and actual, and provision is made for warning." President Lincoln himself in his supplementary proclamation says, in reference to the former one, that "a blockade was ordered to be established;" and President Johnson, in rescinding the blockade, expressly declares that "the blockade thus rescinded was an international measure for the purpose of protecting the sovereign rights of the United States." "International" seems here to mean something more than exclusively municipal. Nor does it appear to point to what has been called the doctrine of "pacific blockade," which, indeed, is of weight in the discussion only as an argumentum ad hominem to silence England and France, who had sometimes acted on that doctrine, without, perhaps, being aware of the name of the thing they were doing.

In these remarks on the question so forcibly handled by Mr. Bemis and the other writers referred to, no account has been taken of the moral aspects of the case. For, however odious the institution that furnished the fuel to the rebellion, the object of the Government of the United States, at the time of the Queen's proclamation, was professedly not to demolish that institution, but to recover the national status. Time and again had our Government declared that the question of slavery in the States was local and not national. To an Englishman—and he is on trial—it might matter little whether slavery was protected by an old or a new power. And some may agree with Mr. Stanley, who does not "see that the justice or injustice, the legality or illegality, of a war can affect the rights and duties of neutrals." As to the "incalculable lift" given to the Confederate cause by the concession of belligerent rights, it was probably quite offset by the incalculable disappointment occasioned by the stiff denial of all further recognition. Had the concession been postponed—and it would seem that postponement was the utmost that was possible—the heresy that cotton was king would still for the time have kept up the hopes of the Confederates, and blockade-running been more or less active. The dissatisfaction of the South with England, as everybody knows, grew to be as keen as that of the North. The cry against half-faced fellowship was as bitter at one end of the line as at the other. Each party found that it had a cold shoulder to itself. But to be mocked with a fraction of recognition was an "unseemly fall," that left the subject of it in a worse plight than if he had never received the lift.

But for the recent renewal of the controversy on this question, it would be proper to apologize for so many words on a subject so threadbare that it threatens to fall to tatters at the touch. The topic is trite, and it is difficult not to treat it tritely. One's mercury scarcely works up, in dealing with it, to "temperate." A four-years-old blunder, if blunder it was, is very old in times like these; and there are more real and living questions, relating to England's use of her neutral rights, to give occasion to the crossing of diplomatic and legal pens. The stale anathemas, true or false, of the temper of the English ministers and of the English aristocracy need not be revived here. The story is too old, and the lash has lost, or ought to have lost, the sharpness of its crack. Mr. Bemis might, perhaps, have foregone the comparison of England (p. 45) to a "blustering bystander," who asks for fair play between the owner of a hat and the ruffian who has knocked off the hat; especially as England fancied that she too had interests at stake. And it might be asked, whether in this particular business she did bluster at all? Something of the same excess of eagerness appears in the repulsive language with which he stigmatizes a proposition in the letter of Historicus as "an attempt to force a lie down the American throat, and then to palm off upon the British people the notion that the American throat has swallowed it" (p. 45). This is the less happy, as Historicus does not appear to make the assertion with which he is charged. He is not denying a fact; he simply expresses astonishment at its existence. Another of the writer's pages would have been quite as fair without the poor epithet of "slave-clutching." These, however, are matters of taste, and every man must follow his own canons. It would be ungrateful to take leave of Mr. Bemis's pamphlet without an acknowledgment of indebtedness to him for his careful array of facts and dates, and for the honorable way in which he has appended the entire letter of Historicus to his own essay.

ANOTHER ILLUSTRATION FROM JAMAICA.

We spoke a fortnight ago of the effect of class legislation on the condition of the colored population in Jamaica in the matter of education. The system of taxation in force there furnishes illustrations of it which are still more apposite.

In Jamaica the public institutions are supported solely at the expense of the colony, and the revenue is raised partly by direct and partly by indirect taxation, but principally by the latter, which bears a proportion to the former of about twenty-five to one; in other words, for every hundred dollars of indirect taxes only four dollars are raised by direct taxation. By far the larger portion of the indirect taxes is derived from import duties on articles of food and clothing, these duties amounting in the aggregate to nearly two-thirds of the entire revenue of the island, or fully $900,000 per annum. The direct taxation is levied on land, dwelling houses, riding and draught horses, and breeding stock. There are also export duties upon nearly all native productions shipped to other countries. The tax on land is one penny per acre, but the law provides for the redemption of this tax by any land-holder on a seven years' purchase. It will be seen from these particulars that, in Jamaica, taxation bears very lightly on real estate. In no part of the world—at least, in no portion of the tropical regions—is the land more fertile; but perhaps in no settled country does the land contribute so little as it does there to the public treasury.

In Jamaica there are two classes of land-holders—the one the owners of large properties, consisting of several hundreds of acres each; the others the proprietors of "small settlements," as they are called, ranging from five acres to ten acres. In a few instances "small settlers" own farms of twenty, thirty, and forty acres. The large plantations in cultivation are divided into "sugar estates," "coffee properties," and grazing farms; but most of the small men raise either coffee or sugar on their settlements, and many of them are owners of brood-mares and horses. Let us see how taxation bears on these two classes of agriculturists respectively. We will suppose the case of a sugar estate making one hundred and fifty or two hundred hogsheads of sugar and one hundred or one hundred and fifty puncheons of rum a year. For carrying on its agricultural and manufacturing operations, such an estate requires sixty or eighty head of horned stock, besides mules and horses. Upon all these one shilling per head per annum taxes is paid. Then there is the land tax of a penny per acre; and the planter pays, besides, the export duty on his produce of so much for every hogshead of sugar and so much for every puncheon of rum. He must have wagons, too; but if these are used exclusively within the limits of his property he pays no tax for them, even though—as often happens—they are used on the public road intersecting his plantation. Now, how does his ten-acre neighbor fare? He, too, we will suppose, is engaged in raising sugar. Upon his land he pays the same acreage tax as the wealthy proprietor; if he export his sugar, the same export duty; or if he sell his sugar to the merchant, the export duty is so much deducted from the value of the article. He requires agricultural animals. Should he use a small plough in preparing the land for the plant, he must have a couple of horses or mules to draw the plough; but, in any case, he must have them to convey the canes from the field to the mill after they have been cut down, and to turn the mill which grinds the canes. Upon these animals he is required to pay a tax of ten shillings—or two dollars and a half—per head, being ten times what the large planter has to pay for his working stock; and if he employ asses instead of horses or mules, he must pay three shillings and sixpence a head for them; while upon his cart or dray a tax of nine shillings for each wheel is levied.

We will suppose that the large planter presses improved machinery into his service; that he has, for instance, a steam engine on his estate to assist in the manufacturing operations, or he has railway trucks, or uses pipes for conveying fluids, or pumps, or other appliances of like description. The duty on these is charged at the rate of 4 per cent.;

but on the rude hoe or bill, or the rough iron boiler—the only appliances within reach of the humble means of the poor agriculturist—your small settler must pay a duty of 12½ per cent. ad valorem. And all this difference, avowedly, because he is a small settler, because he is a poor and struggling man; for the law expressly provides that as soon as he manufactures forty barrels of sugar a year—equivalent to five hogsheads—his property is to take rank as a sugar estate, and he is to be then entitled to all the fiscal privileges and immunities appertaining to the large proprietor! We see the same inequality and injustice with respect to breeding farms. The dwelling-houses on these, as well as on the sugar estates, pay no house-tax; but a man must swear that he has at least forty head of cattle or horse on his farm before he can claim the exemption. The man who has only three or four, or any number less than forty, must pay the tax, should his house be of an annual value of not less than sixty dollars.

The object of all this, we are told, is to stimulate industry, to compel the small settler to aspire after a higher industrial and social position; but experience brings us to the same conclusion at which we should arrive à priori, that it is eminently calculated to have the very opposite effect. It is notorious that since this system of taxation has been in operation, now nearly ten years, not one man in five hundred has raised himself from the position of a "small settler" to the rank of a planter, properly so called, in Jamaica parlance.

If we turn to indirect taxation, we shall see the same gross inequality, followed by equally pernicious results. In the first place, food is heavily taxed. On every barrel of flour imported into the island there is a duty of two dollars; on every barrel of meal half a dollar; on every barrel of salted pork three dollars; on every quintal of salted cod nearly one dollar; on every barrel of pickled mackerel one dollar; on every hundred weight of rice one dollar; and so forth. It is bad enough that these articles of primary necessity to the people should be taxed at all; but the injustice of the thing becomes more apparent when we compare the duties levied on such articles with those charged on what may be fairly denominated luxuries. Take flour, for example: calculating the duty on this article on the ad valorem principle, it will be found to amount to nearly thirty per cent. on the original price of the flour; but sweet tea-biscuits of the finest quality pay only twelve and a half per cent. duty. In the same way, salted cod, largely consumed by the peasantry, pays over thirty per cent.; while potted meats and dainty preserves, which only the rich can purchase, pay twelve and a half per cent. Inferior rum, the common drink of the poorer classes, pays an excise duty of nearly four times the duty charged on the finest brandy; and the poorest Teneriffe wine is taxed at the same rate as claret of the choicest vintage, or the finest champagne and hock. If we look at dry goods, we see the same principle in operation. There is no distinction made between the superfine broadcloth of which the gentleman's coat is made, or the rich silks in which the fine lady clothes herself, and the coarse osnaburg or the humble cotton print, which constitute chiefly the peasant's dress: all alike are charged with the duty of twelve and a half per cent. ad valorem; and the bandanna kerchief in which the negress envelopes her head, turban fashion, pays precisely the same tax as the silk bonnet fresh from Paris or London with which the fashionable belle adorns hers.

But if this system of taxation is adverse to the agricultural progress and prosperity of the freed people, it is hardly less inimical to the development of native industry and enterprise in the direction of manufactures. Imported machinery, for example, pays a duty, as we have stated, of only four per cent. ad valorem, but the raw materials, such as iron, copper, and lead, etc., pay twelve and a half per cent. Ready-made clothing of all kinds is admitted at the former rate, but cloth of every description is taxed at the latter. Ready-made saddles and harness, and boots and shoes, are all charged the lesser sum, while leather is placed in the higher category; and so also are all kinds of tradesmen's and mechanics' tools. Plain printing paper is subject to the twelve and a half per cent. duty, while printed matter, such as books and magazines, are, with the exception of American reprints of English copyright works, entirely exempt from duty. The result of all this is not only to give to a few importers of manufactured goods a virtual monopoly of trade in certain articles, but to crush out manufacturing industry among the people. It is now a matter of extreme difficulty to find a competent tradesman or mechanic of any kind in Jamaica; and it is no wonder: for such are the disadvantages under which they labor in consequence of the high price of raw materials, caused by an excessive duty, that they cannot possibly compete with the sellers of imported manufactures.

POLITICAL EQUALITY.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, and that among them are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." To this Declaration are attached the names of Hancock, Adams, Wollcott, Jefferson. What these men declared to be self-evident must have a meaning, and one, too, corresponding in seriousness and importance to the character of the time in which it was uttered. So was it held then, and for many years afterwards. Its influence went beyond our own land. It revolutionized political ideas in the mightiest kingdoms of the earth. But a reaction came. It was felt among ourselves. The famous Declaration was called in question, treated as a sophism, declared to be a self-evident falsehood. We had among us an institution whose spirit was in direct antagonism. But this was not the only nor the main cause of the political change. Men get tired of truisms, though such are oftenest the most valuable of truths. Plain republicanism began to look homely. All this, however, might have been withstood. Even slavery might have been righteously surmounted, as our fathers hoped, had there not arisen among us a sham conservatism and a sham democracy. Powerful writers arose in England who became the idolized authorities of our young men. These had themselves been the offspring of a similar reaction. Coleridge, Southey, and others had come from the extreme of French revolutionism to the opposite extreme, which they were fond of styling by this name conservatism. The extensive reading of Scott's novels tended powerfully in the same direction. Then high toryism was rendered all the more intense and effective for the unthinking by its occasional liberalism, or their apparent appreciation of the power of the opposite ideas both in church and state. It cannot be doubted that Coleridge and Scott have done more to change the literary and philosophical opinion in this respect that our national pride will permit us to allow. Conservatism began to have a look of greater profundity than the old-fashioned notions of liberty and equality. These were surface ideas. Conservatism was intellectual; it was scholarly; it represented, or was supposed to represent, a higher order of thinking. It became the pet phrase; it was more respectable than radicalism. Any mind could be radical, but the very term conservatism seemed to carry with it an air of thought and learning. Our readers, of course, will understand us as speaking of the abuse and not in condemnation of this noble word.

Hence there arose among us a sort of literary dandyism, whose principal badge of distinction was nothing more than the frequent utterance of this shibboleth. There was a great deal of this among the Whigs; the Federalists before them had been much better republicans and more true to the Declaration of Independence; but, at last, even the party calling itself the Democratic began to talk "conservatively," and in the end to claim the Protean word as their peculiar property. We have known men whose exceedingly high Churchism was offset by a very low democracy; and so here: an ultra radical tendency in one direction was sought to be balanced by high claims to conservatism in another. Slavery greatly aided this monstrous obliquity in our politics, and introduced the most heterogeneous solecisms in our political language. Kansas raids upon the ballot-box took the name of "law and order;" fillibustering became conservative; the right of a slave State to declare a man property, and then to make him property in all the Territories of the nation, this also was conservatism and sound States' rights democracy; the right of a free State to make a man a citizen, and the claim that, by virtue of such citizenship and according to the express letter of the Constitution, he was a citizen everywhere, this was radicalism—yea, worse than this, it was downright fanaticism. Property, the most questionable kind of property, was placed above citizenship. The lower thing was made the special charge of conservatism; the assertion of the highest of all State rights, and of its title to respect in every other State, this was branded with the odious name. No wonder that our ideas, as well as practices, became terribly mixed up. Men began to call themselves "democratic conservative," or "conservative democratic"—phrases which would have been incomprehensible to Jefferson; and so, on the other hand, adherence to the fundamental ideas of the founders of the republic—a course which, in any other part of the world, would have been regarded as the soundest conservatism—was stigmatized as radical, until it became difficult to tell where we were, since words supposed to be the most fixed in political language seemed to have lost all meaning. What was worse than all, the famous Declaration of human right to which our fathers attached so much importance, came at last to be regarded as a mere rhetorical flourish, or a downright contradiction in terms. It was radicals and fanatics who quoted the fathers—it was the conservative, the "democratic conservative," who turned away from our national antiquity and poured contempt upon our heroic age.

"Men were not created equal; the assertion is in the face of the most obvious facts." Such kind of talk became a favorite with a certain class of flash lecturers. They had got hold of something original and profound. One man is stronger than another, they very gravely told us, one man is wiser than another. All this was said with an air of great wisdom, as though such an idea had never occurred to Jefferson or to John Adams, or any other of the clear, sober, reflecting men who sent forth that Declaration to the world.

It is truly astonishing that these reactionists should fail to see that such assertions did not touch the great truth—did not even come in sight of it. What is political equality before the law? It is that each human being unconvicted of crime, is equally a member of the State; equally sharing in its political life; equal in his claim to representation in its organic action; equally a citizen; and, as such, equally entitled to the attainment of, or to be unhindered in the attainment of, every right, privilege, or franchise that is made attainable by or to any other member. We have made the declaration as sweeping as possible, though at the same time guarded at every point, that our "conservative" may have the fairest chance to enter his protest. It will probably be after this fashion: You are then for universal suffrage, or you claim it as a natural right; you make no distinction between suffrage and citizenship; you are also for individual office-holding; each man having an equal right to be legislator, governor, judge, or president. You must also claim equality of property—the right of each man to have as many acres of the common soil as any other man—equality of social condition, equality in education—in every respect, in short, in which it is possible for one man to differ from another. Now the doctrine implies no such nonsense as this, it is all on the other side; the attempted argumentum ad absurdum only proves its own absurdity. Political equality is not the equal right of every man, or of any man, immediately to all or even to any of the political franchises or privileges of the state. In this sense none of them are by nature. They do not exist in what is called the state of nature. They are the product of political society, and must be regulated by it, receiving from it their form as well as their being. They are all subjects of probation, condition, desert. What then is the idea of that equality which this Declaration calls self-evident? It is the equal right of all to attain that which is made attainable to any. In fitter language, it is the equal right of every man that the law should lay nothing in his way to the becoming possessed of such franchises, suffrages, or political privileges of any kind that is not also laid in the way of every other man, or that there should be nothing removed from the path of any other man that is not, so far as the law is concerned, also taken out of his. Let them be prizes, conditions, rewards. There is no more difficulty in supposing them thus to exist in a republican state than in any other; they are conditions that a wise state should improve; and there is no inconsistency in regarding them, in the start, as representing its unanimity, or the consent of all to what, in the long run, is just for all.

Let them, then, be precious as they ought to be; let them be attained with difficulty, so as to secure, however imperfectly, some personal merit in their attainment. The lower the social condition from which they are reached, the higher is such evidence of merit. Make all political privileges dear, make them valuable; but let this principle ever be preserved: Nothing for or against any that is not equally for or against all. We mean, of course, nothing by law, either in its positive or its negative actions—every man left to the free and hopeful use of all the powers, bodily and mental, that God has given, with the unchecked striving for corresponding attainment. An open road to all humanity. The true idea needs only to be simply stated to make it "self-evident," as it is characterized by its renowned and most intelligent authors. Two children are born in different parts of the same national territory; they draw their first breath as members of the same political organization; but the one first opens his eyes in a Fifth Avenue palace, the other in the hut of a negro or of a sandhiller in Georgia. Nature, or Providence, or God, as we may choose to call it, has started them in very different and very unequal circumstances. But the law knows nothing of this. If it were right to make any difference, it should be in favor of the weaker. The principle, however, to be universal, must be unbending. Nothing which the law requires, nothing which the law permits, to prevent the one from attaining to any political position for which his natural powers, in their unhindered exercise, may qualify him, nothing to prevent the other from losing any such position for which the want of such natural powers, or the abuse of them, may disqualify him. This is political equality.

There is no evading the remarkable fact, that whilst such political equalization is a theoretical and, ultimately, a practical reality among nations whom we have been accustomed to regard as destitute of political freedom, its total negation in respect to a large class is a peculiar characteristic of our own institutions. England has had it, France has had it, Prussia has had it; but in the land of Fourth of July orations, the assertion of such political equality has been, and is yet, a world-insulting lie.

We cannot defend ourselves on the ground that, in other respects, there is more flexibility in our political and social life, and, therefore (with the strange exception aforesaid), the greater amount of freedom. The rigidity of aristocratic politics, it may be said, checks the descent of the high-born base, and, to that extent, keeps down the upward flow. But even this does not prevent, in the long run, the constant tendency to a political equilibrium. The disorganizing and reorganizing process goes on in families as well as among individuals. In time the lofty hills bow down, the valleys rise—ancient houses sink, and others emerge from obscurity. And thus, even here, political equality asserts itself; since there are no absolute bars (and this is the great point) which the institutions of those countries place in the way of such a progress.

With us, indeed, there is more freedom in the one aspect. Our society is very flexible and fluctuating until we come down to a plane where all is stagnant as the marsh, or as rigid as the grave. Here are no living waters. Here is no flow at all. Beneath this there is no true political life. The icebergs of aristocracy may melt; they are constantly melting; but caste can undergo no change of form until the mould into which it has been fixed by law or prejudice is utterly broken in pieces. Such caste has existed, still exists, among us in its worst form. Since the change that has taken place in Russia, we are now the only civilized nation in which it appears. There is one class among us, as fixed by the present order of our institutions, that can never rise. Unless something more is done, this is as true now as it was four years ago. The shackles have been removed from their limbs but they are yet kept in their prison-house; the iron doors have not yet been thrown open. In other words, ownership has been abolished, but slavery, political slavery, still exists.

Now, for such a caste, the very flexibility that exists in all above them becomes the cause of the greater depression and the greater hopelessness. They are worse off than they would be among the aristocracies of Europe. The greater crowding, the wider cry for rights, the deeper fluctuations of the social life, that are ever surging above their hopeless level, only make it a condition of deeper outlawry and degradation. They are mute spectators of a strife that only drives them still lower down; for there can be no stand-still here; that which cannot rise must sink. It is thus that servitude and caste demand an aristocracy to make them the more endurable. It would be better for these outcasts to have immediately above them the old plantation society than the meaner elements that our social upheavings may bring in its place. Better for the colliers of England the rule of the baron and the squire, than the contempt of that snobbish middle-class whose supposed dignity demands the depression, rather than the elevation, of those who may seem barely inferior to themselves in the social scale. And so, among ourselves, we believe that no fact is better established than that the degree of this mean negro hatred among us is in exact proportion to the low social value of those who most strongly entertain it. On this account, it would be far better for the colored man, if he is to remain a political outcast, to be the dependent of his former master (who may, in some sense, be said to give him a representation in the state) than to be the defenceless scoff and victim of the "mean white," or the mercenary Yankee, or the negro-hating, negro-burning Celt.

Better, too, for the state. If the colored man is not to vote, and to vote soon, on the same conditions that are attached to other men's voting, better for the nation that he had continued in a humanely regulated servitude. "Voting is not a natural right," it is often said, with an air of logical triumph, as though it settled this great matter of suffrage without further argument. It does not touch it. The question involved in this dogmatic assertion may be the subject of discussion by itself. But here the proposition may be admitted. There is a sense in which it is true. No man, white or black, has a natural right to vote (the state may demand conditions—a wise state should demand conditions); but every man, as a man, born a member of the state, has a natural right to become a voter by the unhindered attainment of the qualifications prescribed, and then the unhindered exercise of the franchise thus conditioned. This is inherent in the idea of political equality. It comes from the simple fact of a living membership in a living organic body. Without this it is hard to recognize the one to whom it is denied as a member of the state at all. He is either a chattel, and, as such, beneath the knowledge of the law, or he is an alien, wholly outside of its jurisdiction, though seeming territorially to lie within it. There is no middle ground to which we can give the name of citizenship, or membership, that does not involve this ultimate equality in the possible attaining by any one man of whatever is possible or attainable for any other member of an organic whole. It inheres in the very idea of our common political life. How can a man be a sharer in this without some mode of representation or participation? Deprived of it, he must be regarded as something cast loose—by itself—out of social harmony—like a foreign substance having no chemical affinities with the system in which he is unnaturally placed. Now, if there be that analogy, which all experience shows there is, between physical and political organisms, such a state of things must produce great mischief. This loose matter must be expelled, or it must be, in some way, incorporated. Human beings thus in the state, yet not of the state, present a political anomaly. In this uncombined, inorganic condition, they can be, to the body politic, only a source of irritating pain or of dangerous malignant disease. Thus the colored man, in his former servile relation, may be said to have had, politically, an organic place; he had a representation in the state; he voted, too, strange as the assertion may appear; he was a power in Congress. Now that he is cut off from all civil and social relations, he is in danger of becoming a floating pest, having less affinity, and more morbific, than the noxious entozoa that infest the animal system. He cannot be supposed to remain in this unnatural position. He will breed a greater pestilence than the old one from which we think ourselves delivered. What shall be done with him? To this question there is only one answer: Make a man of him. To drop all metaphor, we must either drive him out to the society of the beasts, or we must elevate him—permit him, rather, to elevate himself—to a true manhood, with the possible attainment of all that belongs to membership in the one common humanity.

EMANCIPATION IN CUBA.

Colonel Francis Montaos, of Havana, has proposed a plan for the extinction of slavery in Cuba and Porto Rico, which, through his personal influence and his official position, is likely to command much attention. Colonel Montaos is commandante of the prisons in the island, and is also private secretary to the Captain-General, to whom he has submitted the plan which, with his permission, we now lay before the public:

"The important matter of the extinction of slavery in this island keeps the mind of everybody in the greatest anxiety. Every one feels that the hour is come to strike that great blow which the progress of ideas and the pressure of events make already indispensable.

"It is an idea which lies in the conscience of all, yet before the realization of which those most zealously interested in it are apprehensive, in view of the difficulties that all violent transitions affecting social interests offer in their execution.

"Every project suggested until now has had in itself great inconveniences, which very likely would arrest the progress of our agriculture, producing a sensible decline of all property. But a plan has now been submitted to the Captain-General, which offers many probabilities of a happy issue, having already been accepted by as many as know of it. The two principles on which the plan rests are the obligation to fix a certain amount as the value of the slave, with no right to alter it, and the ransom or redemption to be paid out of the work of the slaves. These would be divided into three different classes, according to age, fixing an estimate of their value on the proportion of $600, $400, and $200.

"As soon as the law is promulgated, the owners would assign a salary of three or four dollars per month to each slave, leaving it to their choice to have the whole kept for them as a fund for their ransom, or else to dispose of a part of their wages, but never allow them to take more than a half. With the same end, every other sum that the slave may acquire will be received from him and placed to his credit, such as the profit of a small piece of ground worked on his own account, and with his master's consent, in hours of leisure or holidays, or the selling of poultry, etc. All such sums shall be credited on a book, which will undergo a monthly examination from the local judge, the slave keeping also a memorandum of the same.

"The children of slave mothers born after the promulgation of the law will be free after twenty years, but they can then remain on the plantation if agreeable to the planter, and under a contract. In this way they would make return for the sacrifices and cares of their childhood. So a universal emancipation would be gradually accomplished. Slaves from 21 to 40 would be free after fifteen years; those from 40 to 60 after eleven; and finally, those from 60 to 70 after five.

"If those more than sixty years old, when ransomed, should not like to leave the plantation, they could remain on it, but with no salary; however, in such a case the master would have to make the necessary allowance for food, clothes, illness, etc. Concerning the rest, an agreement would be made with the masters, so as to ascertain the wages they might require.

"Supposing 100 to be the number of negroes on a plantation, under this plan the monetary sacrifice imposed on the owners would not exceed 150 dollars. The Government indirectly indemnifies the planters, without imposing new taxes on the public wealth, by making a reasonable allowance or reduction on the exportations of sugar, i. e., so much less on each box from what is now paid, or else exempting the planters from the tithe, or three per cent. tax.

"This project, before being realized, should be submitted to the judgment of the first planters of the island, and, after that, a discussion should be held on the subject at the court, with the view of having it promulgated as a law. The main features of the plan are, that it would represent 'the redemption of slaves by their own masters, as a reward for their work and zeal,' without any trouble at all to the planters, nor a sensible loss to their interests; they being in a certain manner indirectly indemnified by the Government as aforesaid.

"The emancipation once accomplished in this way, an African immigration could be established, abolishing that of coolies, which has so much contributed to increase the number of criminals on the island."

A Cuban planter, in communicating the outline of this scheme, writes: "Thanks to Col. Montaos, we have now a feasible plan to begin with."

Col. Montaos has been a sturdy champion of the United States during the war, and recently incurred a duel with a leading editor of Havana by resenting his denunciations of the North as false and insulting. Col. M., who has already travelled extensively in this country, purposes visiting it soon again, and it is to be hoped that his enlightened zeal for emancipation will be quickened to more prompt and thorough measures. The experience of England in her West India Islands proves that immediate emancipation is practicable, economical, and safe, while a scheme of gradual emancipation, with an intermediate state of apprenticeship, is burdensome to all parties.

THE POLITICAL MOVEMENTS IN THE NEW WORLD.

From Labrador to Patagonia, the American continent is active beyond precedent in social and political changes. Some concern the form, others the essence of government. Some relate to boundaries and the freedom of great rivers. There are questions of labor, of foreign and domestic policy, of independence and confederation, of religion, and of races. In the general broil enter emperors, dictators, insurrectionists, priests, and peoples.

Beginning at the south, we witness a war between Brazil, the Bande Orientale, and the Argentine Republic, on the one hand, and Paraguay on the other. The only novelty in this quarrel is the combination of parties. The stake, which does not appear upon the surface, is the control of the Plate River, and the consequent supremacy of the Hispano- or Lusitano-Americans. There are besides internal revolutions, which the war may temporarily suspend but will not smother. Such in Brazil is the tendency toward the abolition of negro slavery, involving the overthrow of a landed aristocracy possessed of immense domains, and the cultivation of cereals to an extent sufficient to render the country self-sustaining. When grain shall have thus far encroached upon the tropical products of slave labor, Brazil will be independent of Uruguay, will have less reason to covet her territory, and will retain the colonists whom she now forces to seek sustenance and prosperity in the neighborhood of the little republic. Neither the Argentine Republic nor Paraguay is a government of the people, in a strict sense, but each is controlled by a single man, though with democratic show. The former is almost wholly subjected to one of its constituent provinces, Buenos Ayres, and there is discernible in the future a conflict for separation or complete subordination.

Next in order, or *dis*order, is Bolivia, where a self-elected President has been deposed by a popular movement; Peru, which is divided between two parties—the authorities, who are accused of misconduct in their negotiations with Spain, and a professedly patriotic body of insurgents, who have made some headway; and finally Ecuador, where an Ex-President leads a sudden attempt against a government whose offence is conservatism. Chili and the states to the north of those mentioned are at present tranquil, having had their epochs of commotion and bloodshed, but are not on that account secure from a repetition of them while the circumjacent lands are heaving as if with volcanic throes. It is impossible to predict the definitive results of all these dissensions, but the drift seems pretty clearly to be toward a higher application of the republican principle, and a broader recognition of the rights of man. Certain problems, which are more than matter for curious speculation, are being solved among the mountains and upon the plains of South America: whether, for example, the Monroe Doctrine finds its justification in a law of nature, forbidding monarchy to thrive in this hemisphere; and whether the mercurial temper of Castile is capable of the self-imposed restraints of constitutional government.

Still coming north, we hear of a rising in Panama, insignificant, perhaps, but in keeping with what we have observed elsewhere. Mexico is the empire of a year, but an empire which has not meant "peace," and is not likely to mean it—any more than his whose bayonets erected and now sustain the throne of Maximilian. Here are grave questions of Latin and Saxon, of autonomy and interference from abroad, of state religion and religious liberty. All these cannot be settled in a day, nor settled at all unless aright.

It is needless to speak of the transformations that are at work within the limits of the Union; yet it is worth while to note the great diversity of the processes and stages of reconstruction. Comprehensively, the entire South is undergoing a radical change in regard to labor and the social gradations based upon it. Individually, Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, and Virginia represent quite different phases of the passage from slavery to freedom; Kentucky still another, since it cherishes the moribund institution as long as it can, though not without very vigorous opposition from a growing minority of its own citizens. The free States are not exempt from the progressive impulse of the times, and are daily correcting their notions of democracy by the experience which every year increases in value. New Jersey is divided on the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment. Other States are considering the duty of freeing their charters from the stains of caste and color-prejudice, and Connecticut is presently "to go before the country" on precisely this issue. Then, in connection with negro suffrage, arises the broader question of universal suffrage, upon which the advocates of the freedman, the foreign immigrant, the native-born citizen, and the female sex, are to be heard, along with those who would restrict the ballot to the intelligent or educated. Not too trivial for mention are those experiments of which this State has now made so many, because the metropolis cannot be trusted to take care of itself. And if we have our Metropolitan Police, our Central Park Commissioners, and our Metropolitan Fire organization, Massachusetts now has her Constable of the Commonwealth, whose special function, with the aid of proper subordinates, is to execute the laws of the State, which have hitherto given to the municipal police their chief employment.

Last but not least in our review is Canada, of which, speaking more at length in another place, we shall say little here. Her part in the continental agitation is an effort to bind the provinces into a confederacy, and what this has of prophecy in regard to her future separation from the mother country, and what in regard to her ultimate absorption in the American Union, we leave for others to determine.

LIFTED OVER.

As tender mothers, guiding baby steps,
When places come at which the tiny feet
Would trip, lift up the little ones, in arms
Of love, and set them down beyond the harm,
So did our Father watch the precious boy,
Led o'er the stones by me, who stumbled oft Myself, but strove to help my darling on:
He saw the sweet limbs faltering, and saw
Rough ways before us, where my arms would fail;
So reached from heaven, and lifting the dear child,
Who smiled in leaving me, He put him down
Beyond all hurt, beyond my sight, and bade
Him wait for me! Shall I not then be glad,
And, thanking God, press on to overtake?

MARAH.

ANOTHER CRITICISM.

"A VERSE-WRITER in THE NATION calls the sword the 'High Bride of Justice.' We had until now supposed Justice to be properly represented by the feminine gender, whatever the sword might be; but we live and learn." —N. Y. Times, July 8.

All this reminds me of an ancient doubt,
Which, now such kindly critics are about,
I will confess: Why has it ever been Forbidden to the lordly race of men,
And counted woman's province, to present
The typic shape of Justice? Courteous meant,
Perhaps, in days of chivalry, and yet
Satire and falsehood in the figure met.
Justice, forsooth! When was a woman just?
Or when, to Justice, might a woman trust?
Methinks the poet had too keen an eye
And taste for truth to use the ancient lie;
And though, till times are mended, critics sneer,
We'll hail him in the right, Aubrey De Vere!

JUSTITIA.

JULY 8.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

I.

RICHMOND, Va., July 8.

IT was a very pleasant change from the roar and heat of a June day in New York City to the cool breeze and the plash of the waves that greeted us sailing down the harbor on our way to Richmond. The voyage from wharf to wharf occupied three days, for a day was added to its length by our picking up at sea a disabled steamer, which we towed into Hampton Roads. The three days, however, were agreeably spent. In the little things, as well as in the great, one may perceive that the country has returned from war to peace. In the treatment which he receives in one of these private steamers the traveller finds a pleasing contrast to that indifference or insolence which he was forced to put up with in the days of army transports, when contracting owners were paid the same whether their vessels were full or empty, and when every official on board, from captain to steward, resented as an unnecessary evil the presence of every passenger.

Our cabin passengers on the Creole were perhaps fifty in number. There were officers returning to their regiments; officers' wives going down with children and waiting-maids to join their husbands; half a dozen excursionists intending to see Petersburg and to spend the Fourth of July in Richmond; a party of German Jews, ill-mannered and dirty, who fraternized closely with each other, and were profuse of attentions to the German nurses and waiting-maids. "Look at those fellows now!" said a young man from Connecticut to me; "a'n't they a 'penny-ante' lookin' lot? But they'll make more money in the Southern country in this next year than you or I will." I afterwards saw one of them in the street at Portsmouth with two or three hoop-skirts under his arm, and a box of paper-collars in his hand, trudging along, as I suppose, to his shop; and another I saw and heard playing the harp on the boat between Norfolk and Richmond.

Besides these we had also some of the vanguard of that army of immigrants which is to occupy the South. My acquaintance from Connecticut was travelling with a friend of his, and they hoped to find somewhere in North Carolina an opportunity to establish themselves in business. The Southern climate would be better for him, he thought, than that of his native State. He wasn't particular what sort of business he engaged in, but he'd a little prefer to bring down a good lot of goods and sell them. There were eight or ten other men aboard going South with similar plans. None of them, so far as I could learn, had any intention of becoming farmers. They all looked forward to trading. Most of them were young men, and seemed to me imbued with all the love of change as well as all the acuteness that is said to characterize the Yankee. Of quite a different class was a German family going out to be laborers on the estate of a gentleman who owns a plantation not far from City Point. Neither the man nor the woman could speak a word of English, and I was told that they had been but a few days in this country. The woman wore a thick stuff dress and heavy shoes, and was without shawl or bonnet. She seemed home-sick, and spent a good part of her time in tears or in gazing out upon the water. The man was more cheerful. Both seemed robust and healthy, and their employer expected the substitution of their labor for that of negroes to prove a great success. Certainly, they looked as if they might be depended upon for steady, stolid industry for some years to come. What wages he proposed to pay them I could not learn.

We had on board, among the other passengers and not easily distinguishable from them, several rebels. Rebels I suppose they may fairly be called, for those with whom I have talked, while ready enough to admit themselves conquered, still declare that it is only because their country has been subjugated that they now pay obedience to the United States. With one of these Confederate soldiers I entered into conversation. He was a youth apparently not more than twenty-two years old, intelligent and of pleasing manners. He said he had been up to New York to look round a little and to get himself some clothes. Everybody South was pretty hard up for clothes, and he reckoned they would be for some time if they had to pay New York prices for them. I noticed that he wore a full suit of black broadcloth, and said to him that if a man bought that of course he had to pay high for it. "Yes," he replied, "but look at those boots. I paid a hundred and seventy-five dollars for them in Richmond a while ago, but I reckon it's just as bad to charge me sixteen dollars for boots in New York and make me pay in greenbacks." I asked him if the Northerners seemed to him friendly and well disposed. "Well, yes," he said; "they did so. Well, anyhow, the war was all a d——d foolish piece of business, he supposed. Still his State went out, and if she was to go again he'd go with her. He liked the Northerners better, now that he'd fought against them. He reckoned that a thousand Southern soldiers would whip a thousand Northern, because half the Northern army was made up of foreigners and bought men, to say nothing of the niggers. If the thousand men on each side were picked, of course that would be a different thing. All he knew about that was that he didn't want to be there." "What troops did you call the poorest in your army?" I told him that not having served, I did not know the army opinion. "Well, we always used to say in the army that your meanest troops were from Massachusetts, and ours were from South Carolina. But I reckon they only said so." The grand mistake of the Southerners, he thought, the mistake which cost them their independence, was in not having built a navy in the very first of the war. "Where would you have got seamen?" I inquired. "Seamen? we had Buchanan; you can't find better seamen than he is. The Merrimac whipped the Monitor pretty badly, and it would have been so right along if the Confederate government had turned their attention to naval matters instead of just keeping afloat a vessel here and a vessel there."

He denied strenuously that there had ever been any ill usage of Union soldiers in the rebel prisons. If there had been any such bad treatment, the President did not know of it, nor did General Lee. Of course President Davis didn't believe what he read in the Northern newspapers. No, sir, I might depend on it, Union soldiers in Libby and Belle Isle, or any other rebel prison, were just as well treated as rebel soldiers were in Federal prisons. His denial, though emphatic, was not at all indignant, as if the question was purely one of fact, and had no concern with morality. He seemed as much beyond the reach of argument as people in general, so we changed the subject, and I listened to some reminiscences of the battle of Manassas, and to a detailed account of the plot and incidents of the "Willow Copse"—"the very best play that ever was written, he believed."

This young man was quite frank and bold in his conversation, and his manners and language were gentlemanly. His opinions, I suppose, were the same, and his sentiments and feelings somewhat better, than those of his Confederate companions on board, whose appearance and language certainly were inferior to his.

A little after noon of a very hot day we arrived at the city of Norfolk. On the pier was a motley assemblage of whites and blacks, vociferous in their offers of pies, June apples, lemonade, and carriages to the hotels. The negroes and whites were seemingly on very good terms with each other, though for a week we had been reading of the murderous riots that had taken place between them. But strolling through the streets of the town, it was not difficult to see marks of past violence as well as indications of future trouble. Now and then I would meet a soldier with a black eye, or a negro with his head bound up; and the negroes, though here and there one would touch his hat as he met a well-dressed white man, seemed generally to wear a lowering and sullen aspect. Parties of sailors were frequent in the streets, and as one of these passed a drinking shop a sailor did or said something to a man lounging by the door. What the offense was I do not know; my attention was first attracted by seeing the citizen hurl a brick. The missile struck the sailor in the head and knocked him down. He rose, his head and face streaming with blood, and clamored to be let loose on his assailant. His friends, after a good deal of pulling and hauling, induced him to move on. The disturbance lasted for ten minutes, occurred in the main street of Norfolk, and attracted a large crowd, but no policeman made his appearance.

In the evening I had a long conversation with a gentleman resident in the city. The picture which he gives of its condition is not pleasing.

"Sir," said he, "there is no town in Virginia more violently secessionist than Norfolk. For all practical purposes, I mean. To be sure, we Union men cast over two hundred votes the other day at the election, and the Tabb men did not cast much over eight hundred, and some of our men voted the Tabb ticket because Mr. Tabb is a gentleman, and very well liked. But the secessionists are in the majority; then we've got between one and two hundred returned Confederate soldiers in the city; we've got the Navy Yard right handy, and that gives us a good many disorderly men; the city is full of low drinking saloons, and what these men wouldn't do sober they will do when they're drunk, and our secesh folks know it; and I tell you, sir, Norfolk isn't a very safe place for a Union man unless he's a very mild sort of a Union man. There are two men in Norfolk that are very strong Republicans. One of them is in favor of allowing the niggers to vote immediately. Well, sir, they'd better both of them leave the city at once. I wouldn't be in either of those men's shoes for half Norfolk. They'll be shot some night—some one 'll hear a cry, and that 'll be all any one 'll ever know about it."

"I suppose everybody goes armed."

"Of course. I wouldn't think of walking two blocks at night without my revolver. The Tabb government have increased the police force, and perhaps for the sake of its own reputation it may keep order in the city, or, at any rate, try to do so. But if a vote of the Union men could be taken to-morrow, I'm not afraid to say that there would be a unanimous vote to bring back the military government that has just left us. There never was a worse mistake made than giving back a civil government to a place like Norfolk, where all the power at once gets into the hands of the rebels. The loyal men right through the South ought to be protected by the Government for some time to come."

The negro, this Norfolk gentleman thought, must necessarily sink lower and lower in the social scale when working under a system of free labor. Slavery he believed to have been a curse to the white man, and to all the industrial interests of the country, but the negro freed would be a greater curse to it than he ever had been as a slave. Unless the colored people were removed to Texas, or some South American country, they would surely die out by reason of their laziness and shiftlessness.

A day or two after this conversation, looking over the Old Dominion, a newspaper published at Norfolk, my curiosity was excited by seeing at the head of a column the name of one of the two men whose lives I had been told were in danger if they remained in the city. "A card (somewhat lengthy) from Calvin Pepper," was the caption of the article. This card, it seemed to me as I read it, might fairly be taken as evidence corroborative of that given by my informant, although in it Mr. Pepper states that he intends to absent himself from the city for six weeks, and leaves the reader to imply that he means to return. He appends to the card two letters, showing that he fought bravely in beating back the New York rioters in the summer of 1863, and that he was ready and eager to fight at Washington in 1861. "The annexed certificates are published," he says, "in order that there may be no mistake in regard, at least, to my courage, and that it may not be said that I left Norfolk, or any other place, from fear."

Mr. Pepper says that both his health and business demand that he should absent himself from the city, and he prints his card to notify his debtors and his creditors of his intention to go away. He then goes on as follows:

"And now I would say to my personal friends who are so apprehensive, without just cause, it seems to me, for my personal safety, on account of my radical, so-called, and outspoken views of the right of suffrage to colored citizens, and the rumored threats that have been so industriously and from sinister motives spread abroad, that since I have been in Norfolk I have not received, to my face, from man, woman, or child, a personal insult or threat, or disrespectful treatment of any kind, and that I verily believe that liberty of speech is freer and safer to-day in the city of Norfolk than in the city of New York."

Mr. Pepper sets forth his political views at some length. "The simple, just, and effectual remedy 'for preventing another rebellion' is equal rights of suffrage to all, and with loyal men in a majority nothing more is to be hoped or desired." These views he declares that he will always advocate—

"And in the exercise of this right of a freeman I shall not be deterred by any threats of violence, or persecution, or prosecution without law, or the perversion of its form and spirit. Free speech without licentiousness, or its abuse, I will exercise while life last, and if need be in the face of death."

At City Point the steamer from New York transfers its passengers to a small river boat. The trip thence to Richmond is made in about four hours, and the traveller is taken past many points that have become the property of history. The river is very winding, the banks are green and hilly, and as one approaches the city are filled with earthworks. We passed but little land under cultivation. Here and there could be seen a field in which the wheat sheaves were piled in stacks, and there were a few fields of Indian corn, but it was low and must have been planted late. In Norfolk I saw stalks nine and ten feet high, but on the James none that was more than three feet, and the greater part of the crop was somewhat less. The water in the river was rather higher than is usual at this time of year, I was told, but however that may be, our pilot took the vessel through the Dutch Gap Canal, thus shortening the voyage by about seven miles. Our boat was a small one, and she thumped on the bottom at the entrance, but in the Richmond papers I saw it stated that a steamer of forty-three feet beam had made the passage a week before. We passed the famous Fort Darling and several ruined bridges, and every now and then saw, just showing above the russet-colored water, the ribs of some sunken vessel. At last we could discern the three spires of Richmond on a distant hill, and the square bulk of the Capitol. The wharves at Rocket's were not so busy as those of Norfolk, and there were, perhaps, not more than twenty small craft in the port.

A little way from the landing stood a "Broadway and Ninth Avenue" omnibus, which rattled us over the ill paved streets to the hotel. Two rudely painted wooden signs, projecting from the corners of two ugly brick warehouses, told us where stood "Castle Thunder" and "Libby." Of these buildings the former is used as a city prison; the latter is set apart for the use of soldiers waiting for their regiments, and for the families of negro laborers working for the United States Quartermaster. Cannon balls can be seen lying about in the streets, which are little used by any vehicles but army wagons and public.

Traversing the main street, going up the hill, on which the Capitol is situated, in the centre of what was formerly the business part of the city, is the burnt district. For a quarter of a mile one passes nothing but toppling walls, forlorn-looking chimneys, heaps of bricks, with here and there a ruined safe lying in the midst, warped and red from the effects of intense heat. Some Virginia agent of a Hudson Street firm has painted and pasted in half a dozen places the advertisement of "Hubbell's Golden Bitters," but besides this evidence of enterprise, there is very little sign of business activity.

In the shops that still stand there seem to be plentiful stocks of goods, but no customers for anything except the bare necessaries of life. One readily believes the often-repeated statement, "Our people haven't any money, sir." I went into two stores this morning to make some purchases, and perceived illustrations of this truth. In the first of the two I stood waiting to be served, while the shopman and a respectable-looking man talked about a tobacco transaction. The two men seemed to have been acquaintances. One, addressed as "Captain," urged the other to buy of him fifty pounds of hand tobacco. "I haven't got a cent, and I must get home. Pay what you think is right for it. There's only fifty pounds, and if I can't sell it I'll have to pawn my watch. Must get home, you know." The tobacco was such as would command a dollar a pound at the North, and it was offered at fifty cents. At the second store which I entered, the article I wanted was a tobacco-pouch. I noticed among the new ones a pouch of better workmanship than they, but which had evidently been in use. I asked the price of it. "Sam, what do you want for that bag of yours?" said the man to the attendant. "We'll, I don't know; it was given to me; I reckon fifty cents will be about right."

In almost all the Richmond shopkeepers there is an eagerness to sell which, to one accustomed to Northern traders, seems strange, and, when one considers the reasons for it, quite touching. As might be expected, goods are cheap. Just after the evacuation the city was filled full of merchandize of all kinds by the Northern dealers. The people could not purchase; and the result is that many articles can be bought cheaper in Richmond to-day than in Baltimore or New York. "Flour," says the Whig, "that sold in New York on Saturday for $7 and $8, sold here for $5, and meats that were selling here for 15 to 20c., there stood on their dignity at 25 to 35c." A market with so little money was easily overstocked.

The Fourth of July may be said to have been celebrated in Richmond this year. Cannon were fired at morning, noon, and night. A few Chinese crackers were fired off by the vagabond boys, white and black, at the corners of the streets in the early morning and in the evening, their pyrotechnic resources, I take it, being too scanty not to make it advisable to husband them closely. In the morning a flag was hoisted at the Spottiswood Hotel, and a short speech made from the roof of the building by General Osgood. Somewhat later in the day a small crowd, made up mainly of negroes and Union soldiers, with a sprinkling of citizens and children, congregated in the Capitol Square. A lady was introduced to the assembly and read the Declaration of Independence, but in so low a tone and amid such noise of talking and walking about as made it quite impossible for any one to hear her. The conclusion of her reading was marked by music from a military band which was in attendence. Speeches were then made by a surgeon and two chaplains, and after a benediction the company dispersed. No applause was elicited by any of the speakers. The soldiers evidently were there in the character of onlookers; the negroes were doubtful if they were expected to applaud or would be allowed to do so (they were carefully removed by the soldiers detailed as police from the crowded steps near the speakers' stand); and as for the citizens—to ask any men, Union or secessionist, to hear such speeches and applaud them, would be asking too much. All places of business were closed throughout the day, but the city wore no holiday aspect. That part of the rebel population which appeared in the streets were seemingly indifferent spectators of what went on around them. The boys and the negroes, and the Union soldiers in a graver way, alone seemed to enjoy the occasion.

THE GENERAL ELECTION IN ENGLAND.

LONDON, July 1, 1865.

Before this day week the title of M.P. will be in temporary abeyance. On Thursday next Parliament will be prorogued; on the following day the dissolution will be announced; and on Saturday the writs for the election will be posted to the different boroughs and shires of the United Kingdom. Such, at least, are the present arrangements; and there is no reason to expect they will be materially altered. The harvest is getting on with such unusual rapidity, owing to the long continued and unwonted heat of our early summer, that it has become a matter of national importance to get the elections over as soon as possible. The business of the House of Commons is entirely finished; most of the members whose seats are likely to be contested are away canvassing; and on Thursday night the House was almost being counted out while Sir Charles Wood was delivering his speech on the Indian Budget. Parliament would have been prorogued before now if the House of Lords had not stopped the way. The truth is, there is such a vast accumulation of private bill legislation, and the peers are so behindhand with their work, that the session could not have been abruptly terminated without serious injury to very influential interests. On Saturday the House of Lords held its first morning sitting. Three peers met and sat for a quarter of an hour; and during that period read and passed some five-and-twenty bills concerning railways, harbors, enclosures, and other local matters—a feat of legislative rapidity which even in your backwoods States would, I fancy, be considered remarkable. Each day during the present week similar sittings have been held; and by Thursday next it is hoped the arrears will be cleared off. I can see that before very long the subject of Parliamentary private business will occupy a good deal of attention. Every year the amount of local legislation enacted by Parliament increases with a portentous growth. The questions thus submitted to the legislature are not subjects of any general interest; the metropolitan press, naturally enough, pays no attention to them; and the passing or rejection of a local act depends increasingly on private influences. The terms lobbying, wire-pulling, log-rolling, and plate-laying are not yet recorded in our political dictionaries, but I fancy the processes which these terms represent are getting to be as much in use at Westminster as at Washington. This session we had an example of lobbying in the House of Commons which excited considerable scandal. The Great Eastern Railroad applied for a bill authorizing them to run a line into the coal districts, by which they declared they should be able to supply the metropolis with coal three shillings a ton—or some fifteen per cent.—below the ordinary selling price. The scheme was naturally opposed by the Great Northern Railroad, which has a virtual monopoly of the North-Eastern traffic. A tremendous whip was made on the occasion of the second reading of the bill in question. Almost the largest house of the session assembled on this occasion. No discussion on the merits of the bill was even listened to; and the measure was thrown out, almost without a hearing, by a large majority.

However, at the present moment, no political subject is thought of except the approaching election. It is not that the people are particularly eager about the result. I can never recall an election which stirred up so little of popular passion. Still, the event is big enough in itself to obscure all other home questions for the time. The general impression of electioneering authorities is that the issue of the poll will be to leave the relations of the Whigs and Tories very much where they are at present. Mr. Brand, the Ministerial whipper-in, is said to reckon on a majority of some forty votes. The Liberals, from local and accidental causes, will lose several of the small boroughs. But then, from causes relating to the accidental relations of the great landed gentry, they will gain several of the counties. South Northamptonshire, for instance, with a population of about 60,000, and with upwards of 5,000 electors, is in reality in the hands of a dozen families. Hitherto it has been a stronghold of Conservatism; but Lord Frederick Fitzroy, who is now contesting the constituency on Palmerstonian principles, is closely connected with the territorial aristocracy, and will, probably, be returned in consequence. The opposition which Lord Derby and his party have offered to the bill for relieving Roman Catholic members of Parliament from the oaths they have now to take, will doubtless improve the prospects of the Government candidates in Ireland. In fact, if politics were a mere game, as Charles Dickens once declared, between Lord Toodle and Lord Boodle, I should say the issue of the present election was certain enough. Of the members returned to Parliament, a majority will be pledged to vote for Lord Palmerston in preference to Lord Derby. Persons, however, who know that real principles are involved, however confusedly, in this contest—who are aware that Ministerialist, Whig, Radical, and Liberal are by no means convertible terms, are still very much at sea as to the true net product of this appeal to the country. Let me try and indicate what appear to me to be the characteristic features of the contest.

No party goes to the country with any distinct cry or definite programme. The Liberals raise the old watch-word of reform, but they know themselves that they have no intention of acting in the matter; and, what is more, they know that the electors do not believe in their professed enthusiasm. The Tories, on the other hand, call out, according to time-honored fashion, that the Constitution and the Church are in danger from Liberal innovations; but they know perfectly well that the danger is an imaginary one, and that their bugbear frightens nobody. The sincere men of either party assuredly believe in the realization of their hope and fear at some period more or less distant, but they are convinced that period is not yet arrived; and with this conviction they cannot appeal with any heart to the principles or prejudices of the electoral body. Moreover, to speak the plain truth, the cry for reform has fallen dead. With a rare exception here and there, no election will turn upon the degree to which any candidate is prepared to advocate any extension of the suffrage. I do not attribute this fact to any permanent change of opinion amongst the masses; but simply to the fact that this is a transition period, during which all great issues of home policy are in a state of suspended animation. As long as Lord Palmerston remains at the head of affairs, no active reforms are possible. The extreme personal popularity of the Premier is a fact very difficult even for an Englishman to understand, and I should think quite impossible for a foreigner. For all that it is an undeniable fact. Even his bitterest political opponents have a sneaking fondness, of which they are half ashamed, for the brave old man who bears his years so gallantly. As Bute Crawley, in "Vanity Fair," observed of Rawdon, "He is a man, and be ——— to him." Something, I think, of the same feeling pervades even those who must dislike the Premier on account of his half-hearted Liberalism. This odd personal popularity will weigh immensely with the electors, and if the Premier can meet his new Parliament, he will, I think, retain the sway that he holds over the now expiring one. But it is extremely doubtful whether this contingency will come to pass. His last attack of gout has aged the Premier visibly. The old brightness of air and gait, so strange in a man past eighty, has almost completely disappeared, and the clear, ringing voice is about the only remaining vestige of his prolonged vigor. I happened the other night to catch sight of him just as he passed out of view of the House in leaving his seat. While he was behind the footlights, to use a stage phrase, he kept up some sort of semblance of his old brisk step and movement; but the moment the spectators had lost sight of him, the attempt was laid aside, and he hobbled on, a feeble, broken old man. The annual Fish Dinner was not held by the Ministers this session, nominally on account of the state of public business; but really because the Premier was in too weak health to preside, and he was unwilling for the sake of appearances it should be held without his presence. The odds, I should say, were against Lord Palmerston's retaining office till the next meeting of Parliament; but the elections will be held during his Premiership, and will be materially influenced by the circumstance.

In the absence, therefore, of any popular cry the contest will be mainly decided by local and private considerations. The agents of the Reform and Carlton Clubs say that in their experience there never were so many contests the result of which was still doubtful on the very eve of the elections. My own impression is that the next Parliament, taken as a whole, will be even less progressive and less prepared to undertake any real work of reform than its predecessor. Elected, in reality, on the question whether Lord Palmerston shall retain office or not, it will be Palmerstonian or nothing, and will not long survive the termination of the Premier's political career. But it will, I trust, possess two characteristics which will distinguish it favorably from the present legislature. The obstructive power of the genuine Tory party will be less; and the sincere Liberal element will be increased—possibly in numbers, most assuredly in influence. On the other hand, it will contain a still larger infusion of members who aspire to the honor of M.P.ship from other than political motives. Every year, as the country grows richer and the struggle for wealth more keen, the commercial value of a seat in the House rises in price. A successful barrister, who wants to reach the higher steps of his profession, knows that the cost of entering Parliament is a capital investment. Joint-stock companies, with large interests to protect, find it well worth their while to have one of their board a representative at Westminster. Thus, if a member has a certain amount of shrewdness, and is not troubled with exaggerated delicacy, he can command any number almost of well-paid directorships and free shares in solvent companies. With good management, a seat in Parliament may now be reckoned worth a clear thousand a year, to say nothing of the prestige and social position still attaching to the distinction. If there was any deep political feeling on the part of the constituencies, the men I have sought to describe, who make a trade of politics, would have very little chance at the hustings. But at a time when political principles are momentarily at a discount, the trader element is sure to be largely represented.

It is a signal misfortune to the Tories that they could not force on the elections before the overthrow of the Confederacy. I dare say you have often seen in our papers a great deal of talk about the conservative reaction. A great amount of nonsense was talked concerning this movement but in spite of all, it did represent a positive fact. It was not that the nation, as represented—and, in that respect, fairly represented—by the constituencies, was seized with any sudden affection for Lord Derby in preference to Lord Palmerston, but that a general disheartenment—I know of no fitter term—fell upon the great Liberal majority. The governing and educated classes were, as a body, in favor of the South. The masses, to do them justice, sympathized with the cause of the free States, and they hoped against hope, and wished to believe in your success, rather than actually believed in it. No reasonable person can, I think, blame them for the weakness of their faith. The press and the body of public men, with few though honorable exceptions, preached perpetually from the text, that democratic institutions had proved a failure, and that the sympathy of Englishmen should be with the upholders of slavery against the partisans of freedom. This doctrine was preached with tolerable impartiality by Liberals as well as Tories, and could not fail in producing an effect. At each contested election the conservatives carried the day. The rough popular instinct came—inarticulately, if you like—to some conclusion of this nature: "If democracy is a failure across the Atlantic, as Liberals tell us, why should we support men who propose virtually, though not nominally, to assimilate our institutions to those of America?" Against this argument there was no appeal. With the grand success, however, of the Northern cause, there is a genuine reaction towards Liberalism. Political movements are slow in this country, and the fulness of the Northern triumph is hardly yet sufficiently appreciated by the masses to produce its complete influence. But already the back-ebb, if I may so call it, of the downfall of the slave power has hindered the conservatives from attaining office in England, and will, in all likelihood, cause a marked advance, before many years are over, in a democratic direction. It is a significant fact that not one of the members of Parliament who upheld the cause of the Union is thought to be in any danger of losing his seat. Two years ago, I think, scarcely one of them could have contested an election without running the greatest risk of defeat. Now, all that is changed; and I see that several members, who maintained a religious silence throughout the whole of the American struggle, announce that they have been persistent supporters of the free States. In the next Parliament a very considerable number of men who were distinguished for their advocacy of the North during the contest, will be counted amongst the members. Mr. Mill, Professor Fawcett, Jacob Bright, the Honorable Lyulph Stanley, Mr. Leatham, and others, will swell the small and obscure "minority," as it was once called, that had the courage to support Mr. Bright in his championship of the Federal cause.

The individual elections possess very few features of general interest. If Mr. Gladstone is returned for the University of Oxford—a fact about which there is grave doubt—it will be owing rather to his half-and-half sympathies with conservative prejudices than to his merits as a great Liberal leader. It is said he will also be proposed for South Lancashire, in order to secure him a seat in the event of his rejection by the graduates of Oxford. By the way, talking of Oxford, it is a curious fact that Professor Goldwin Smith, so well known in the States, has been mobbed and hooted by the working-men of the university town. Some few weeks ago an engagement was made between the corporation of the town and the Great Western Railway, by which the factories of the company were to be transferred to Oxford. The scheme was very popular in the town, on account of the impetus these large machine-works were expected to give to the trade of the city. Everything was settled, when the Professor, who had always been regarded as the champion of the town against the university, came forward with his usual vigor and eloquence, and stirred up such an agitation against the project, on the ground that it would destroy the local character of the university, that there is some prospect of the scheme being finally abandoned. As a matter of taste, I quite agree with Mr. Goldwin Smith in thinking it little short of profanity to disturb the classic beauty of the academy on the Isis by the introduction of factories. But it is a fact that labor is very badly paid in a town that is deserted for half the year by the employers of labor, and that the proposed works would have conferred a great boon on the resident working class. It is a question about which there is a good deal to be said on both sides; but I wish somehow that Professor Goldwin Smith had not been the man to espouse the anti-popular side. However, if the mob hissed him, the young undergraduates at commemoration forgave his Northern proclivities in consideration of his defence of the privileged seclusion of the university, and cheered his name and that of Jefferson Davis with equal enthusiasm.

The only other election contests which are much heeded out of the locality where they take place, are those of Mr. Mill for Westminster and Mr. Hughes for Lambeth. The chances of "the great English thinker," as his friends call him somewhat affectedly, are not as good as I could desire. The mass of the metropolitan electors know very little about political economy, and still less about logic; and have no very distinct idea who Mr. Mill is. His opponents, on the other hand, are perfectly well known. Mr. Smith, the Tory candidate, is the leviathan of news agents, and the greatest customer of every London newspaper. All the railroad and country sale of our town newspapers passes through his hands, and leaves a very large per centage in the process of passing. Some two or three years ago the Times made a vigorous and determined effort to sell the paper without the aid of news agents; but the firm of "Smith & Co." proved too strong for the leading journal. Captain Grosvenor, the Whig candidate, is a near relative of the Marquis of Westminster, who owns half the borough, and whose income, chiefly derived from house property in Westminster, is said to be near a million sterling a year. Either of these rivals is a formidable one, and Mr. Mill has injured his chances by not coming forward himself, and leaving his friends and admirers to canvass for him while he remained at his villa near Avignon. However, he has at last returned to England, and is to appear next week before the electors. The readers of "Tom Brown" in America will, I am sure, be glad to hear that Mr. Hughes has a very fair chance of getting into Parliament as member for Lambeth. He has no local interest; but he is so popular with the working-men of London that they are canvassing for him with extraordinary zeal.

The public is so busy with electioneering matters that the great Bethell scandal has passed by comparatively unnoticed. The great object of the Government has been to tide the matter over till after the elections, as the discredit of an investigation into the conduct of the Lord Chancellor would have told most severely against the Ministerial party at the polling booths. The story is a very ugly one, but I have not time to go into its details now, and I shall be able to give you a clearer impression of its merits, or rather demerits, after the debate on the report of the committee of enquiry, which is to take place next Monday. It is certain from the disclosures already elicited that our administration of justice has not been as blameless and free from suspicion as we were wont to imagine. But whether the Lord Chancellor himself was directly implicated in the discreditable transactions of his son and his underlings is a point not yet established.

We are just beginning to get excited about the Atlantic cable. If I was to judge by the money test of the share list alone, I should say there was no great financial confidence in the success of the undertaking. All persons, however, connected with the company are, I know, very sanguine about its prospects. The Great Eastern is now anchored off the Nore, with the cable on board, and is taking in coal. She sails for Valentia about Saturday next, and her work is expected to be completed, if successful, by the 28th. Dr. Russell goes out with her as correspondent for the Times, and will pay a short visit to New York after the cable is laid. Mr. O'Neill will accompany the expedition as artist-chronicler of the great undertaking.

ARMY CORRESPONDENCE.

ITS HISTORY.

THE most eminent masters of the art of war recognize the superiority of the power of moral influences to that of sheer physical forces as a means of successful warfare. They hold in their authoritative teachings, and demonstrate by their mighty performances, that patriotism and the consciousness of a righteous cause, with the concomitants of enthusiasm, intelligence, fortitude, perseverance, and sacrifice of the individual to the public interest, balance the weight of numerical preponderance, greater wealth, warlike experience, and other more material advantages.

In a republican polity like ours, with its full play of free thought and speech, the press performs the part of a great generator of moral force. The outbreak of the pro-slavery rebellion, and its rapid development into a vast civil war, intensified this natural function into a most powerful element of impulsion, of vital bearing upon the course of events. In the days of peace, the great body of the public was but too willing, from lethargy, indifference, or absorption in business pursuits, to accept the reasonings and conclusions of the press upon public questions. In the days of civil strife, the deeper and more general interest in national affairs, in conjunction with the perplexity of judgment arising from the rush and whirl of events, produced a still greater readiness on its part to be instructed and guided concerning the merits of public men, and the condition of public matters, by those who made thinking and judging for others a profession. The press, indeed, created, shaped, and controlled opinion during the civil war in a greater measure than ever before, and through it exercised an all but decisive influence on the conduct of public affairs.

The moral ascendancy of the press resting mainly upon the belief in the abundance and clearness of its sources of intelligence, it became necessary for it, in order to maintain its firm hold upon the public mind, pending the continuance of the internal conflict, to gratify the highly stimulated appetite of the public for a regular and plentiful supply of current news. This was done by the employment of extraordinary means of information, and the profession of "army correspondents" sprang into existence. They were to be to the abstract entities in whose service they enlisted what the feelers are to a certain class of animals. They were, by their presence upon the scenes of action, by careful observation, close investigation, and impartial recordings, to provide their employers with material for reflection and judgment upon the will, capacity, and performance of those entrusted with the direction of the loyal armies. It must be obvious that, in the pursuit of these ends, they were to become the mainsprings from which the press was to derive its influence upon the civil war. It would be difficult to point out any intellectual calling in which the responsibility was graver, the necessity of capacity and rectitude of purpose higher, the opportunity for good or evil greater, than in that of the army correspondents. With the close of the war their occupation is gone. Their ephemeral profession has already passed out of existence. The sum of their professional labors is before the public. Hence, a brief historical review of their curious career, together with a critical enquiry into the merits and demerits of their performances, cannot be considered premature.

The conductors of that portion of the Northern press able and willing to bear the expense of being represented upon the theatre of war by special reporters, in making provision for army correspondence, at first labored under the same difficulty that perplexed the conductors of public affairs in the loyal North in the early stages of the rebellion, viz., the lack of practical experience. There were no precedents, no models for imitation. There had been achievements creditable enough in themselves in the way of special correspondence during the Mexican war, and by European journals during the invasion of the Crimea, the last war in Northern Italy, and the India insurrection. But with war raging at the very doors of a fast, impatient, excitable, news-greedy public, accustomed to the most rapid spreading of intelligence, greater successes were evidently required. To insure these, the first thing to be done was to select men of good natural parts and journalistic attainments, and the next to provide for the speediest possible transmission of the intelligence collected and put into proper form by them.

In the opening act of our great national drama—the introductory campaigns of the summer of '61—these requirements were met without much difficulty. With the general impression then prevailing that the war would be of brief duration, and fought out upon the confines of the seceded States, men of good capacity and professional standing were found ready enough, willing, and even anxious to enjoy the romance of a short war, and attain distinction as chroniclers of its glories. And the comparative narrowness of the scenes of warlike operations, and their proximity to the great centres of journalistic activity, made it likewise comparatively easy to transmit the fruits of their labors to those who paid for them.

At that time already, as almost uninterruptedly during the whole of the struggle, the attention of the public was principally fixed upon the army that gathered for the first invasive movement into Virginia on the banks of the Upper Potomac, and to it the main efforts of the managing editors of the leading papers of the country were directed. The two other fields of military activity at that period, viz., Missouri and West Virginia, were of much less importance. To the former, the presence of John C. Fremont, of whom the greatest expectations were then entertained as commanding general, attracted a larger share of attention than was bestowed upon the latter, and nearly all the prominent journals of both the East and West were represented at his headquarters. The spirit of competition—greater among newspapers than any other outgrowths of human genius and industry—as in all rival enterprises, was at no later time more lively and demonstrative than at this initial period. The New York press strove hard to maintain the prestige it had so well earned in the past, of the ability to bear extraordinary outlay and command the best journalistic talent in the country, by outstripping all its contemporaries both in the quality and quantity of its war reports. But neither the daily papers of the other great Atlantic, nor those of the leading Western, cities were willing to yield the palm to their metropolitan rivals, and resign themselves to drawing upon their columns; and hence the correspondents of the several great New York dailies had to compete not only among themselves, but also with those of Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis papers. In the outset of this race for news, the former had the apparent advantage of numbers; but, notwithstanding, the "provincial" journals proved themselves formidable competitors.

The first campaigns of the war were the heydays of army correspondents. The managing editors not having had an opportunity to test the competence of their respective representatives in similar duties, and being without the light of experience themselves, did not attempt to prescribe a course of duty to them, but let them have their own way. Again, in those days of overweening confidence in speedy success, and of easy-going, loose management, the reporters found that the gathering of intelligence was a light task. What had later in the war to be sought after at the expense of great hardships and personal risks, was then almost brought to them. In the East and West the commanding generals were easily accessible, affable, ready to grant to the press any favors solicited. Secresy as to plans of campaigns, and the numbers and organization of armies, was by no means so well observed as it should have been. What could not be ascertained at headquarters, subordinate commanders, indiscreet from inexperience, or vain enough to secure the printing of their names at the risk of indiscretions, were disposed to communicate.

The duties of army correspondents in 1861 were not very onerous. In Missouri and West Virginia they had a few weeks of field-service. On the Potomac they had to devote themselves, from want of more warlike subjects, during the long period of preparation preceding the brief and inglorious first Bull Run campaign, principally to sketches of camp-life and descriptions of the appearance of the three months' soldiery on parade. And when the army finally advanced on Manassas, all but the last of the six days they then spent in the field were like time spent upon a pleasure excursion. In the many months of re-organization and preparation for war on the grandest scale, following the deep national disgrace and humiliation of the memorable twenty-fourth of June, all but absolute idleness was their welcome or unwelcome lot. The public was tired of the stale food of camp pictures, but the inactivity of the armies placed it beyond their power to furnish any other. Like the Government, the conductors of the press prepared during that long interval of rest for the days of activity to come. They had been taught some lessons by which they were not slow to profit. The qualifications of their correspondents had been more or less developed. They had become satisfied that their efficiency could be greatly promoted by adding to their professional competency the advantages of certain material auxiliaries. They had learned that an army correspondent should be as mobile as possible, and as independent of the hospitality of others as circumstances permitted. Accordingly, they furnished them with complete campaigning outfits, and made them allowances for current expenses. Previously, the correspondents were almost compelled to surrender part of their independence of judgment from the necessity of relying for means of locomotion and physical sustenance upon officers, and making return for such favors by taking often undeserved notice of those extending them.

The vastness of the proportions which the Northern armies assumed in the fall of '61, induced the most prominent journals to make a corresponding increase in the number of their correspondents. The New York papers above all multiplied their representatives with the immense host under General McClellan. The wisdom of the employment of many correspondents was then fully believed in. Subsequent experience proved, however, that harmonious co-operation among the several reporters of one journal was all but impossible, and that the desired conformity of conception and expression was unattainable under this system. One energetic, vigilant, experienced reporter in each army was in the end found far preferable by the most judicious managers.

From July, '61, until the Army of the Potomac got into motion in the early spring of '62, the reporters attached to the Eastern armies enjoyed a leisure broken only at long intervals by the Ball's Bluff, Drainsville, and other less consequential affairs, none of which compelled protracted exertions or hardships. In the West the correspondents were also kept busy only during part of the summer, fall, and winter by the fruitless movement of General Fremont into Southwestern Missouri, the coup de main of General Grant upon Belmont, and General Thomas's brilliant action at Mill Spring. The protracted inaction of the armies during this period was most trying to the patience of managing editors and proprietors, on account of the heavy expense without adequate returns which the necessity of keeping correspondents in the field, work or no work, involved. For weeks and months they were obliged to lay out hundreds and thousands of dollars, often without receiving as many lines of news worth publishing. But these inevitable losses they were to undergo more than once in the course of the war.

In the Army of the Potomac a sort of organization of reporters, corresponding to that of the army, was attempted by the New York journals. The several correspondents of each paper were attached to the different subdivisions of the army, and placed under the direction of one of their number as a chief. This plan was followed by nearly all for a long time, but adhered to until the close of the war by only one. It had its advantages and drawbacks. The latter have already been alluded to.

At last the time came for continuous, arduous efforts on the part of correspondents, first in the West by the attacks upon Forts Henry and Donelson, and the advance of the army under General Buell from Southern Kentucky into Tennessee; in the East, some weeks later, by the transfer of the Army of the Potomac from around Washington to the Peninsula. A sudden, most trying transition was then experienced by them. Feeling perfectly sure of timely forewarning as to the commencement of active operations, most of them had not subjected themselves to the rigorous discomforts of camp life in winter, but taken luxurious quarters at the hotels in various cities close to the lines of the armies. From comfortable rooms and sumptuous tables they were now hurried to the field, and plunged at once amidst hardships that tested the power of endurance even of old campaigners to the utmost. Upon steamboats crowded to suffocation, and rendered foul and filthy with overloads of soldiers; worrying in the saddle with aching limbs through the seas of mire to which the Peninsula and the banks of the Mississippi, Tennessee, and Cumberland became reduced in that extraordinarily wet season; exposed for live-long days to wet and cold; sleeping in leaky tents upon soaked ground and moist blankets; subsisting upon soldiers' rations—they had the amplest opportunity for an immediate realization of the dark side of their newly adopted profession.

Apace with the enlargement of the theatre of war in the spring, summer, and early fall of '62, the range of activity of correspondents kept continually widening. It embraced not only the main armies of the East and West, but likewise all minor operations of smaller bodies. On the Peninsula, and subsequently in Northern Virginia and Maryland, in the East; and successively in Tennessee, Northern Mississippi, and Alabama and Kentucky, in the West, they displayed the greatest industry. But they were also busy in Western Virginia, on the coasts of North and South Carolina, in Louisiana and Arkansas, as well as in Missouri and Kansas. At no later stage of the war was there so much endured; so much labor required and performed; so much ambition, energy, and enterprise shown; so many successes achieved by correspondents, as during the universal clash of arms and constant fluctuations of the tide of fortune that make up the history of that eventful year.

The epoch just described may, indeed, be called the golden age, if the expression be admissible, of army correspondents. In it their achievements reached the zenith of merit. In the following years, creditable feats of a few illustrated the press from time to time. But their average performance never again attained the degree of merit that marked it in '62. From the fall of that year a steady decline became perceptible, and continued to the end of the war. This arose from various causes. In the first place, the strain on the mind and body imposed by many months of field service was more than the constitutions of many of the correspondents could bear. They had to endure far more than any member of the army, high or low. They suffered bodily as much from exposure, fatigue, and scanty sustenance. Their nerves were as strongly tried by the excitement of battles. And when rest came to officers and men, their chief labors commenced. Then long hours, so much needed for repose, had to be devoted, with an over-taxed body and weary mind, to the task of preparing for publication the material the collection of which had already exhausted them. And this work being completed, they had to undergo new anxieties, new exertions, in putting their reports on a safe way to their destination. All this required efforts that could not be repeated almost daily for weeks—as was, for instance, the case on the Peninsula and in General Pope's and the Antietam campaign—without bringing on, sooner or later, a complete physical and intellectual prostration. And so it happened that, one after another, the correspondents who set out with the armies in the spring were compelled from sheer exhaustion to leave the field and seek recuperation in the North.

Again, besides heavy toils and hardships, other circumstances conspired to make their stay with the armies, by degrees, more and more disagreeable. The absolute toleration, including freedom of movement and facilities for information at headquarters, conceded to correspondents by the commanding generals in '61, was no longer enjoyed by them. In the Army of the Potomac, favoritism in the extension of privileges was exercised according to the political predilections of the General-in-chief and several of his lieutenants, which greatly hampered the reporters of the so-called radical journals. In the West, the restrictions placed upon the pursuit of their profession by the formal orders of Generals Halleck and Buell caused them much personal embarrassment and even indignity. To avoid this, several preferred to quit their work.

Lastly, they had been taught by experience that the ill feelings created by free comments upon the causes and bearings of events coming under their immediate notice, in the officers thus reflected upon, became a source of petty persecution from which they could not protect themselves. They found that to suppress or disguise the truth was more advantageous, both in a personal and professional way, than to tell it unreservedly, and hence those with whom the sense of duty and manhood was stronger than the love of their wages, threw up their position.

As previously stated, among the journalists first enlisted as army correspondents there was a fair proportion of men of real talent, well skilled as writers, and ambitious to excel in their new calling; of sound, independent judgment, bold expression, and practised observation. Of these, most withdrew from the field, for the reasons mentioned, before the close of '62. The vacancies left by them could not be filled with equally competent men. A tribe succeeded them who possessed neither intelligence, nor education, nor character in a degree which fitted them to represent journalism. With them a deterioration commenced in the quality of special reports for the press from the field, that continued and became more unmistakable from campaign to campaign. But of this hereafter.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

Mr. Marsh in his recent work on "Man and Nature" has made a most instructive survey of the changes, beneficial and disastrous, accomplished by the human race on the face of the material world. When we stop to reflect on the union of waters hundreds of miles apart, by artificial channels, which serve the purposes of navigation even better than the natural currents; when we see the locomotives drawing heavy transportation trains over mountain ranges like the Semmering Alps, nearly three thousand feet high; when we remember that the masses of mountain rock and the subaqueous river beds can be pierced by tunnels; and especially when we think of the ocean as threaded by an electric wire flashing messages from Europe to America, it seems as if man had been almost omnipotent in executing the primeval command, Subdue the earth, and replenish it.

On the other hand, when we take a map of the world, and trace upon it the principal routes of traffic, observing how the great commercial nations are to this day compelled to double the distant capes on the southern extremities of Africa and America in order to reach by water the gold-bearing lands of Australia and California, and the still more attractive marts of India and China, and reflecting that two narrow strips of land, one fifty and the other seventy-five miles across, are barriers which human ingenuity and enterprise have not yet overcome, it seems as if the earth had been enjoined by the Omnipotent to frustrate the powers of man. But in the end we believe it will appear that Suez and Panama, narrow isthmuses, which a little more or less of geological dynamics might have left in repose beneath the Silurian waters, have been upheaved in accordance with a great design, first to delay, then to excite and invigorate, and finally to reward with victory the enterprise of science, capital, and labor.

Within the last ten years, and especially within the last few months, public attention has been directed to the Isthmus of Suez by an enthusiastic and indefatigable Frenchman named De Lesseps, who subscribes himself with a charming brevity and simplicity "Minister Plenipotentiary." If ever man had "a mission," he has. People call him visionary, as they do Cyrus Field, as they did Charles Goodyear, as they did Robert Fulton, as they have all the great reformers and discoverers and inventors of the world, as they will every one who presses with the fervor of faith and singleness of purpose an idea which is not in accordance with established notions. He has published by himself and his supporters innumerable maps and circulars and reports and books to prove the possibility of piercing the Isthmus. He has encountered ridicule and opposition in abundance, but his ardor has not been checked. He has secured the testimony of scientific engineers; he has gained from the Viceroy of Egypt a charter or firman to go forward; he has attracted capital; he has hired the workmen and begun the work; and at length he has had the satisfaction of announcing to the commercial world that the preliminary rigole or lesser canal is complete, water communication is opened from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean, and the question of a permanent ship canal is demonstrated to be a simple matter of time and money. In short, Mr. Lesseps has compelled the whole world to give him a hearing, for the solution of the problem on which he is so intently bent will affect every portion of the globe. If he opens a channel for ships across that little isthmus, no one can foretell the consequences. As the discovery of the passage round the Cape by Vasco de Gama transferred the seat of eastern commerce from the harbors of the Mediterranean to the Atlantic seaboard, it may be that the rising kingdom of Italy, with the celerity of the nineteenth century, will hasten to reclaim the prize of which she was robbed five centuries ago.

We shall not at present undertake to answer all the numerous enquiries which intelligent persons are now asking respecting the canal. We can only allude to a few of the most interesting points.

A canal on the Isthmus of Suez is by no means a novel idea. Indeed, hardly any problem of modern engineering goes back so far into antiquity. Whether the builders of the Pyramids included in their number any enterprising Mr. Lesseps, we leave the chronologists to decide with all the other vexed questions of Egyptian archæology; but if we are to believe the authority of Aristotle and Strabo, the well-known King Sesostris proposed a canal on the Isthmus somewhat more than three thousand years ago. Even those who question this are willing, we believe, to admit that the Persian Darius, some five hundred years B.C., and Ptolemy Philadelphus, two or three centuries later, did actually construct canals which united the waters of the Nile with those of the Red Sea. An account of their work, and of that of other rulers in Egypt, has been well put together in a volume by Mr. Schleiden on the Isthmus of Suez.

Nothing more than local advantages were considered by the ancients. International benefits were not even dreamed of. Consequently, as Egypt decayed, all interest in Egyptian canals perished likewise. The discoveries of the fifteenth century opened the ocean to commerce, and Europe was satisfied with the maritime routes to India. It was not till the keen eye of Napoleon, intent on damaging England, rested on the deserted lands of Egypt, and enquired into their capabilities, that a project was formed for opening a passage from one sea to the other. In 1799 the Imperial engineers made a survey of the Isthmus, but, oddly enough, their incompetency or their haste was so great that they made a blunder which delayed for more than half a century all further progress. Strabo tells us that Archimedes asserted all the waters of the globe to be of one level. Eratosthenes disputed this opinion. Napoleon's levellers confirmed Eratosthenes, and stated with mathematical definiteness that the waters of the Red Sea stood on an average thirty and a half Parisian feet above those of the Mediterranean at Petusium. What sane man would think then of uniting these great seas? It was not till 1847 that the French surveys of 1799 were proved to be inaccurate. Repeated measurements since that time have demonstrated beyond a doubt that the level of the two seas is the same, excepting the slight differences which varying winds and tides may at times produce. On these new data, confirming the old theory of Archimedes, Mr. Lesseps has gone forward. Having the pou sto, he has tried to move the world.

An interview in 1854 with Mohammed Said, the Viceroy of Egypt, secured to Lesseps the right to form a company for piercing the Isthmus of Suez. An association was formed and a plan of operations was matured, involving a shallow temporary canal from Port Said on the Mediterranean to Suez, and having as an arm or branch a fresh water canal or aqueduct supplied with the waters of the Nile. The latter was to furnish drink for the laborers and fertility to the soil. The former was to demonstrate the practicability of uniting by water the two great seas. These ends are now accomplished. On the 1st of January last, a daily boat service was established between Port Said and Suez and between Ismailia and Zagazig. A large bark, carrying twenty-five or thirty persons, and drawn by a steam-tug, accomplished the distance of ninety miles from sea to sea in twenty-four hours. Goods and passengers, Mr. Lesseps announces, can now be transported "between the seas on a continuous line of water at least one metre and twenty inches in depth and fifteen metres in breadth." These facts were demonstrated in April last to the representatives from the Chambers of Commerce in different cities of the world. So much at least is accomplished. It certainly promises well for the still greater undertaking of a ship canal. England, it is true, looks with apprehension and distrust on these projects; not so France, Italy, and Southern Germany. A short time more is needed to determine who is right.

PURE INTEREST.

In the year 1697 a curious publication made its appearance in Paris, entitled "The Epistles of Père Daniel," and in the following year portions of it were translated into English and embodied in a pamphlet published in London. This pamphlet contains the particulars of a singular case of conflict between duty and interest.

We are informed that as long ago as the middle of the sixteenth century the rate of interest allowed by law in China was thirty per cent. per annum, and the Roman Catholic missionaries in that country being sorely perplexed between their desire for investing their savings on such profitable terms, and the dread of committing the crime of usury, endeavored to satisfy their consciences by submitting a question to the then Pope Vincent X., who thereupon ordered the Sacred Congregation de Propagandâ Fide to be convened for the purpose of considering and determining it. This was in the year 1645. The question, as put by the enterprising monks in China, was as follows:

"In the kingdom of China it is settled by law that thirty per cent. may be taken for money lent, without any regard of ceasing lucre or emerging damage to him that lends. 'Tis demanded, whether it be lawful to receive the said thirty per cent. as established by law of the kingdom, though no cessation of lucre intervene or emergent damage? The motive for doubting is the danger which occurs that he that received the principal may be absent or fly, or that he may be backward in paying, or that the creditor may be forced to go to law, or the like."

And the answer, as rendered by the Sacred Congregation, was as follows:

"The Congregation judges that for money immediately and PURELY lent, nothing is to be taken above the principal; but if anything be received by reason of a probably intervening danger, as in the case, they are not to be disquieted, so that regard be had to the quality and probability of the danger, and proportion be kept between danger and interest."

What benefit this decision proved to the members—whether they "shaved" the greenbacks of the Flowery Kingdom at a profitable discount, and begged for more on the ground that a national debt is a blessing—whether they "did" commercial bills on the "Street" of Pekin at a lower rate for "prime endorsers"—or whether they finally made their fortunes and retired to brownstone palaces on the romantic banks of the Tung-pui, history does not mention. Let it suffice us that in the answer of the Sacred Congregation are contained the elements of a profound economical truth.

Herein for the first time in ecclesiastical history do we meet with that well-defined distinction between interest and insurance which was familiar enough to the ancients, but which in mediæval and modern times has been entirely overlooked, in a too literal construction of the texts of Leviticus xxv. and Deuteronomy xxiii.; and we reproduce this remarkable answer of the Sacred Congregation less on account of its curious nature than with the object of bringing the principle upon which it is founded to the attention of modern legislators.

In Mrs. Speir's "Life in India" (London, 456, pp. 162-163) it is related that in the Hindoo code of Menu, which, if our memory is correct, Colebrook ascribed to the thirteenth or fourteenth century B.C., the subjects of insurance and interest, considered apart, are treated on with the most remarkable elaboration. But besides this, other evidence exists that the word in the Bible translated into English as "usury," signified to the ancient races of Asia what the Sacred Congregation terms "pure" interest. The code of Menu allows pure interest to be taken as follows:

"A lender of money may take in addition to his capital:

From certain classes	1½ per cent. monthly.
From a Brahman	2 per cent. monthly.
From a Kohatriya or soldier	3 per cent. monthly.
From a Vaisya or husbandman	4 per cent. monthly.
From a Sudra or mechanic	5 per cent. monthly.

The lender may accept less but can never demand more than these rates. Taking the period of time to which this singular ordinance relates (1300 or 1400 years B.C.) into consideration, and remembering that the rate of interest invariably falls with increased wealth, just as the price of labor falls with increased supplies of labor, it is seen to be impossible that these rates in those days could have included the element of insurance. So that besides the direct evidence afforded by the distinction made in this ancient code between interest and insurance, we derive an additional proof that this distinction was peculiar to the ancients, from the low rate of interest for the loan of his capital which the law compelled the Hindoo money-lender to accept.

Hume, the English historian, speaks of the word interest as "a lucky accident in language which has great effect on men's ideas." We desire to see a further step taken in the same direction, and the terms pure interest and mixed interest adopted in our codes of law in the place of interest, for we are convinced that such a plan as this will do more than anything else to modify the ill effects of our present usury statute. Were it once commonly understood that what is now termed interest is a mixture not only of interest and insurance but sometimes of wages also, it would not be long before the usury laws would be so amended that the word pure would be placed before every occurrence of the word interest.

That the term interest, as commonly employed, possesses altogether too comprehensive a meaning for the important part which it plays in our statute-books, must be evident to the most casual observer. It would therefore seem desirable that a definite meaning should be attached to it without loss of time, and, if necessary, that it should be divided and subdivided into other words.

The Government of the United States is to-day borrowing money in this city at seven-thirty per cent. interest, and yet the rate in Wall Street is but four per cent. The pawn-broker receives twenty-four per cent., while the savings-bank allows but five, at the same time that wealthy brokers pay each other one-fourth of one per cent. for a single day's loan of gold. Prime endorsed notes are quoted at six per cent., and single signatures pass at ten or twelve. And yet the law ignorantly confounds all these incongruous transactions with one another, and condemns them all under heavy penalties to be measured by one standard—that of seven per cent. per annum.

If I borrow $10,000 on call (i. e., subject to the instant demand of the lender), and pledge for the security of the sum 100 shares of stock worth in the open market to-day $13,000, it is evident that the lender runs little or no risk of the loss either of the principal or the interest, and that he performs no further labor than to draw his check for the amount. He is therefore ready to make the loan at a very low rate. The result is a transaction at 4 per cent. per annum. But when the Government comes forward for a loan to run for twenty-three years, yet making it optional with itself whether it will take it up in eight years or not, and furnishing no specific and immediately controllable and realizable security to the lender, it is evident that although no labor is required of the latter, yet that something of the "cessation of lucre" and "emergent damage" enters into the bargain, and that the same should be paid for. In other words, risk attaches itself to the transaction, and its extent is exactly measured by the difference between the rate at which the first instanced transaction was consummated and the rate at which the par bonds of the Government are now selling—we mean those without any accrued interest upon them. This difference is three-thirty per cent., the interest on the bonds being seven-thirty per cent.

Again, when an indulgent "uncle" of Chatham Street is appealed to for a further supply of the "rhino," though usually lent upon tolerably safe security both for principal and interest, yet it should not be forgotten that out of the twenty-four per cent. which we promise to pay him, twenty per cent. of it is hardly more than a fair compensation—first, for the labor which he is compelled to devote to the examination of the frequently disgusting looking collaterals which are presented for hypothecation; next, for the odium connected with the business, and which he is obliged to labor under; and lastly, for the risk (not a very great one, to be sure, but much greater than is commonly supposed) of being cheated in the value of the goods upon which the loan is demanded, as well as their being stolen, in which latter case he may be called upon to disgorge the collateral and lose the loan besides.

Thus we perceive that in every transaction of money-lending, what is usually denominated interest is really composed of three elements. These elements are—pure interest, insurance, and labor of superintendence. The value of the first is determined by the competition of loanable capital for employment; the value of the second is determined by the degree of risk which enters into the transaction; and the value of the third is determined by the amount of the personal labor required to conduct the transaction—the element of insurance, however, generally forming the chief item in the price of loans of capital.

Why then shall the law, which it is plain enough only intends to limit the rate of pure interest, be applied to limit insurance and to limit wages? Is it not clearly beyond the province of any lawgiver, at least in this country, to limit the price of labor? Is it not as clearly beyond his lawful power to limit the price of insurance risks? And do not both labor and insurance, when left to their own free action and to the natural law of competition, settle down to the lowest rate at which they can profitably be undertaken, so that no fear can possibly exist that they will be overrated and the necessitous poor made to suffer?

LITERARY NOTES.

THE publishers' announcements of forthcoming original works continue to be excessively meagre, except in one direction, which threatens to absorb all the book-making interest for some time to come. The war we have just emerged from has passed through its newspaper phases, and is already fast becoming historical. The pen has already replaced the sword in the hands of many of our most accomplished officers, and though there is a danger that the thing may be overdone, war stock is at present at a premium among literary wares. Among other enterprises of the kind, Messrs. Harpers have in press "History of the United States Cavalry," by Major Brackett; "The Story of the Great March;" "Diary of General Sherman's Campaign through Georgia," by an anonymous author; and their great "Pictorial History of the Rebellion." Mr. C. B. Richardson, who is brought in contact with the army by his "United Service Magazine," is naturally deeply engaged in the preparation of books of this class. He will publish "History of the Army of the Potomac," by William Swinton; "Sherman and his Campaigns," by Cols. Bowman and Irwin; "Grant and his Campaigns, a Military Biography," by H. Coppie. These will probably be the classic works on their respective subjects. Mr. Swinton's powers as a writer are well known, and he has enjoyed an unequalled command of official materials. Colonel Bowman's book is written with a fullness of information that places it as a history above all competitors. These are only a portion of Mr. Richardson's undertakings; other works of equal importance and still greater personal interest are in agitation that will take the public by surprise. Mr. Van Nostrand announces the completion of "The Rebellion Record" in eight volumes. This invaluable repertory of contemporary information heads a long list of publications on military subjects, that from their intrinsic merit and superior style of getting up would do credit to any publishing house in the world. The first English translations of Jomini's standard works, "Life of Napoleon" and "Review of Grand Military Operations," are conspicuous among them. They are enterprises that no English publisher has ever dared to venture on. Amidst this din of war must not be overlooked a work by Dr. J. W. Draper, whose "Intellectual Development of Europe" is highly praised by foreign critics. It is entitled "Thoughts on American Civil Polity," and will be brought out by Messrs. Harpers.

—The publication of Dr. Livingstone's new book of "African Travel and Exploration on the Zambesi River and its Tributaries" is postponed until the autumn season, ostensibly on account of the time required for the preparation of the map. Meanwhile the author has started on a fresh expedition, with ample means, furnished by both public and private liberality—the scene of which will lie to the north of his former journeys. His purpose is to unravel the mysteries connected with the great fresh-water lakes—Nyassa, Tanganizka, and Nyanza, and to set at rest the conflicting theories on their situation, position, connection, etc., broached by Captain Burton and others. The "secret of Africa" cannot long be preserved from so ardent an explorer.

—Literary men are coming forward with unusual force at the general election now imminent in England, and it is pleasant to see intellectual work gradually elevated in public estimation, and regarded as a claim to distinction. In the suburban borough of Lambeth, Mr. Thomas Hughes, the Chancery barrister and world-renowned "Tom Brown of Rugby," is the prominent candidate. The amalgamated laboring men of the district have put forth an address reminding their fellow-workmen that he has written much and nobly in their cause, as well as supported it with his purse. At Manchester, Mr. Walter Bagehot, editor of the Economist, and a chief writer in "The National Review" on literary and historical subjects, will probably be chosen. At Edinburgh, Mr. Maclaren, formerly editor of the Scotsman, will be brought forward. In Westminster, Mr. Mill's friends are busy defending him from the bigoted and unfounded attacks made on his presumed religious principles, and he may well be gratified with the faults that have caused men like Dr. Thirwall (Bishop of St. David's), Rev. F. D. Maurice, and George Grote to spring forward with the most earnest assurance of sympathy and confidence.

—The prevalent taste for small editions of books, printed in the most luxurious style, and restricted by their limited number from general circulation, so that each owner of a copy may indulge a feeling of pride in its possession, receives illustration in a "Memorial of Edward Everett" now about to be issued at Boston. It contains a memoir by Rev. Edward Everett Hale, eulogies by most of the distinguished men of Massachusetts, two fine portraits, etc. An edition of only 100 copies will be offered for sale, at five dollars each. It is to be hoped that it is only the forerunner of a life of Everett, and collection of his correspondence, etc., worthy of the subject, and for which ample material exists.

—Mr. George Wingrove Cooke, whose decease is recorded in the obituary of the week, was a type of a class of literary men in England brought into existence by the power of the periodical press. He was, originally, a barrister of fair standing, and known by some professional works, a Life of Bolingbroke, and his "History of Italy," in three volumes—a book that there is yet no substitute for in the library of English history and politics. A fluent pen and a lively style led to his connection with the Times newspaper, and from thenceforward the titles and subjects of his works show that a special correspondent or "commissioner" is expected "to put a girdle round the earth" almost as quickly as Shakespeare's Puck. His "China and Lower Bengal," "Inside Sebastopol," and "Conquest and Colonization in North Africa," mark different stages of his professional progresses, and are works of authority. He was a much more finished writer than Dr. Russell, and, by many, was preferred as a narrator at once picturesque and trustworthy. He died prematurely at 51 years of age.

—A critical notice in the last number of the "North American Review" does good service by exposing the wholesale plagiarism committed by the nominal compiler of a very pretentious new Dictionary of Quotations from English classical literature published in London, entitled "Familiar Words." The "Dictionary of Quotations" by Mr. Bartlett, of Cambridge, Mass., now published in an enlarged form by Messrs. Little & Brown, has won the commendations of all who are acquainted with it. Its capacity for appropriation seems to have struck Mr. Hain Friswell, the English editor. The two books are about the same size, and every quotation traced to its source and verified by the labor of Mr. Bartlett, with the exception of thirty-four (some of which were probably overlooked from occurring in the notes), are copied bodily into "Familiar Words," while the additions are of the most trifling description. The fact of the literal copying from one volume to another is proved by various local errors and misplacements, which betray the awkward transference, and the meanness of the action is heightened by a disingenuous notice in the preface of Mr. Bartlett's book. An act like this in the present state of intimate literary intercourse between the two countries is worse than a crime, because a blunder, while literary detectives exist to expose such shameless pillage of another's work.

—The Cavaliere de Rossi, the great living authority on Christian art at Rome, has just brought out from the pontifical press the first volume of a grand "Illustrated History and Description of the Catacombs." It promises to supply the want of an authentic guide to these deeply interesting remains, which the colossal French work of Perret failed to satisfy, from the licence given to his pencil in improving and beautifying the often rude originals of his drawings. The antiquarian research of de Rossi has produced full documentary evidence of the continual attention the catacombs received, and the care bestowed on their adornments, such as we now see them, by pious Christians and pilgrims up to about the time of the destruction of the Roman empire. The consequent confusion of the state and upheaval of social life led to their gradually falling into neglect, until after a century or two the very existence of these remarkable monuments had perished out of memory, and re-discovery in the seventeenth century revealed a perfectly fresh world of wonders to ecclesiastical archæologists whose treasures have hitherto been only explored in part. De Rossi's work is in quarto, fully illustrated with chromo-lithographs of the several paintings, etc., that do credit to the present state of Italian art.

—Few will suppose that the busy life of our late President allowed him time to become a student of "Bacon's Works," yet how curiously a general observation of the great statesman, derived from his observation of life, was realized in the practice of Abraham Lincoln, the following note from his "Essays" (p. 94, Cambridge, 1863), will show: "Some have in readinesse so many Tales and Stories, as there is nothing they would insinuate but they can wrap it into a Tale: which serveth both to keepe themselves more in Guard, and to make others carry it with more pleasure."

—A valuable addition to the small stock of English musical literature is made by the appearance of "Carl Maria von Weber: the Life of an Artist. From the German of his Son, Baron Max von Weber." The original work has been subjected to some trifling condensation by the translator, Mr. J. P. Simpson, but the main features, derived from Weber's own diaries and letters, are fully given. They afford one of the most interesting pictures ever put on record of the true artistic spirit, the sufferings and triumphs of an enthusiastic temperament conjoined with a body so frail as to make his life one long disease, that finally succumbed under the extra exertions and discouraging incidents of a visit to England, undertaken in the hope of securing a provision for his family. The translator well says that the relative position of wealth and genius remained until a recent date a blot upon the civilization of the country. The details of Weber's treatment in England, except by a few who could sympathize with him, are of painful interest, and reveal a state of feeling that certainly could not exist at the present day in the higher classes of society.

—It is said that Prince Napoleon, while under his present exclusion from political functions, owing to the tenor of his famous speech at Ajaccio, is solacing himself with literary composition, and is engaged on a "History of the Bonaparte Family." The contributions to science and letters of this remarkable race—since the year 1530, when one of its ancestors wrote the vivid account of the sack of Rome by the Constable de Bourbon, which has been translated by the Emperor—are important, and would alone serve to stamp it with individuality. The beautiful works on natural history by the Prince de Canino (Charles Lucien Bonaparte) are found in all our great libraries, and entitle him to rank high among scientific naturalists. His brother Lucien, now residing in England, is equally devoted to philological studies, and has spent immense sums in collecting and printing materials for illustrating the most obscure dialects of Europe. They amount to nearly one hundred separate publications. One of the most curious among them is "The Song of Solomon" in twenty-four English dialects (a labor certainly beyond the powers of any native antiquary), and perhaps the most valuable a translation of the Bible into the ancient Basque or Euskarian language, which is just completed. Prince Lucien is said to prefer his favorite pursuit to political distinction, and to have refused to leave his library for any position in the state his Imperial cousin could bestow. The Emperor himself is, independently of his Life of Cæsar, a voluminous author. There is no question that his researches on artillery have helped materially to bring about the improvements in that arm that promise to change the whole art of war. But strange as it may seem, it is his uncle, Napoleon I., that stands forth as perhaps the most copious writer of the century. The great collection of his letters now publishing by an Imperial commission has already reached its seventeenth volume in quarto, though running down no later than 1804. It contains 1,400 letters, so that the whole number is something immense—and to this must be added his youthful writings, the works dictated at St. Helena, etc. The readiest parallel to this industry (in a minor degree, however) may be found in the Duke of Wellington. About thirty large and closely printed volumes of his "Despatches," "General Orders," etc., have appeared, and it is understood that much matter remains behind that perhaps the present generation may not see. These thirty volumes contain probably twice as much matter as the hundred volumes of Sir Walter Scott's writings. It is certainly worthy of remark that the two busiest men in Europe should, in mere bulk of composition, exceed those who were engaged in that pursuit alone, and affords a noticeable instance of the power to make time that concentration of will and energy command.

—Among the scientific investigations that claim the largest share of attention at this moment, the research after evidence attesting an occupancy of the earth by races of men earlier in time than was formerly held to be consistent with historic analysis or the records of revelation, is undoubtedly pre-eminent. The transactions of learned societies all over Europe are occupied with accounts of new discoveries of bone caverns, lake dwellings, stone implements, and other traces of the primeval inhabitants of the northern hemisphere. So ample indeed is the testimony, when once people's eyes are opened to a sense of its value, that a digest of the various discoveries now in progress, archæological, anatomical, geological, etc., all bearing on the great question—the antiquity of man on the earth—becomes more than ever necessary. Fortunately it has been performed intelligently and trustworthily by two English books published during the present season: "Researches into the Early History of Mankind and the Development of Civilization," by E. B. Tyler (J. Murray), and "Prehistoric Times, as Illustrated by Ancient Remains and the Manners and Customs of Modern Savages," by John Lubbock, F.R.S. (Williams & Norgate). The latter gentleman has been long engaged in investigating the question by personally visiting and carefully examining all the localities famous in the history of discovery, as the bone caves of Central France, where remains of men, and even rude works of imitative art, are found in juxtaposition with the relics of the rein-deer, the mammoth, the rhinoceros, and long extinct animals; the lake habitations of Switzerland; the shell mounds of Denmark and Scotland; the gravel pits in the drift of the Valley of the Somme, where the position of the flint implements disinterred by M. Boucher de Perthes first gave rise to the enquiries now pointing to scientific certainties. Very numerous illustrations of the different classes of remains are given, and the whole evidence is lucidly summed up in the concluding chapters, where the usages and habits of savage tribes now existing are drawn upon for the analogies that throw light on the condition of the prehistoric races of the earth. The great problem of all—from whence the power to rise in the scale of civilization was derived: whether it was merely the continued and progressive application of forces, that we see in their first contest with animate and inanimate nature, struggling for the assurance of a rude animal existence, or whether the necessary energy was imparted by outward pressure—is yet a mystery. The slow and painful steps that the self-evolution of our present civilization would require make a demand upon the chronology of history that its most accepted systems are by no means equal to meet.

—When the study of old English literature was confined to a few persons and regarded rather as a learned luxury than as a branch of enquiry interesting to any person of cultivation, and essential for a proper understanding of his native language, it is not surprising that the publications connected with it should be few in number and weighty in price, and consequently entirely beyond the reach of those now most interested in such pursuits. A better day has since dawned for literary antiquaries, and among the symptoms of it may be noted the establishment of "The Early English Text Society," for the purpose of printing in a correct, but cheap and unostentatious form, original or imperfectly edited works illustrative of the growth of the language and its literature. Five or six volumes are already issued, and progress has been made in accomplishing one object of the Society, which is to render accessible all the metrical romances connected with the Cycle of King Arthur in their earliest existing form, previous to the compilation of the well known prose digest of them, the "Morte d'Arthur." Sir Gawain is already published, and Sir Lancelot du Lake in preparation. The Society also proposes to print the remaining unedited Pre-Wycliffite versions of the Scripture, particularly one from a MS. of the thirteenth century in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, which has some characteristics in common with that philological treasure, "The Ormulum," whose value and significance in English linguistics was first prominently brought out by our countryman, George P. Marsh, in his "Lectures on Early English Literature." Mr. Morris, one of the secretaries of the Society, has also in preparation a Reading Book intended to facilitate the study of early English. It will be not only the first work of the kind, but it will mark an advanced stage in the treatment of its subject, being far more critical in its strictures on the various old dialectic forms of the language than any previous work.

—The accidental discovery of the remains of Dante twelve days after the great national celebration of the anniversary of his birth seems to bear every mark of verisimilitude, and must be accepted as one of those coincidences that defy calculation, though most of us can parallel them with instances as inexplicable. Nearly two hundred years have passed since those hallowed ashes were stealthily removed from their resting place to shield them from fanatical outrage or (on this authorities differ) misjudging honors that would have deprived Ravenna of their custody. The place of the deposit continued unknown till the time above mentioned, when some workmen, engaged in repairing a building adjacent to the cathedral, met with a hollow space in the wall rudely excavated, and containing what an inscription by the depositor, F. Sarti, proved to be the bones of the great poet. The skeleton was complete, with the exception of the lower jaw and some of the finger-joints. A subsequent examination of the tomb of Dante showed that it was empty, with the exception of these missing portions—so that the identification was perfect. The erection of a monument worthy of the poet's fame now agitates artistic Italy. Its locality, style, etc., offer an immense field for discussion that promises to be amply filled.

—The new "Life of Jesus," by Dr. David Strauss, has been translated into English, but as yet no publisher has ventured to announce its appearance. Though it is of a much more popular character than his former work of the same name, so admirably translated by Miss Evans, presenting rather a historical summary of the results of criticism than an exposition of its progress, there is little enquiry for Continental speculation in England. The work of Renan, which convulsed the rest of Europe, has barely met with demand enough to clear off a single edition. The tacit censorship of the press, exercised by the general theological conservative spirit, is so strong that every publisher is anxious to avoid the possible charge of being accessory to the circulation of infidel books.

—The extraordinary rise in the value of articles of virtu, paintings, etc., in France since the establishment of the Second Empire, is well known to all who have occasion to become acquainted with the commercial side of the fine arts. Rare books have long experienced the same increased valuation, and the bibliophiles of Paris have just noticed that at the recent sale of the reserved portion of the stock of M. Techauer (who may be called the "Pickering" of the French book trade) a larger sum was realized for a single day's sale—147,000 francs—than had ever before been known Two years since, one day's sale of the library of M. Solur amounted to 116,000 francs, and one day's sale of the books of his son-in-law, M. Leopold Double, brought 113,000 francs, which were the largest amounts previously reached.

RUSSELL'S "CANADA."*

Mr. Russell's style in that part of the book before us descriptive of his own travel, is not materially different from that in which his "diary" was written, and perhaps most of those who read this volume will wish that it had been entirely devoted to such description, rather than in considerable part to a treatise on provincial politics. His accounts of railroad journeys, interviews with living men, and the impressions made on his mind by them, are always lively and interesting; his colloquial forms of expression interspersed with rather too many Latin and French quotations, his anecdotes and exclamations give a zest to his words not unlike the pleasure derived from the conversation of an active-minded traveller. The first ten chapters on Canada are full of vivid pictures of personal suffering in hotel and car, the beauty of Niagara, the falls of Montmorency, sleigh rides, local stories, and the thousand other amusing and characteristic novelties (novel at least in connection with the narrator) which lend their charm to writing of this kind. The remainder of the book, however, is given entirely to the discussion of the politics, history, military and industrial position of Canada, and here we miss the light touch and easy flow of the Times' correspondent; nor do we find in their place the broad and enlightened views of a philosophical writer; we miss the little bits of French and the negro and Irish anecdotes, and we have not much to compensate us for the loss.

Although our English friends appear to entertain an idea that all our thoughts, magnetized by Canadian attraction, turn like the needle to the north, our real ignorance of facts in connection with the British possessions in America would somewhat surprise them. This ignorance it is as well to dispel.

Canada, with an area of 357,000 square miles, numbers 2,500,000 inhabitants. The greater portion of this vast colony has little or no population; the names with which the map is covered being those of wide rivers, wooded townships, and railroads spanning the wastes between young settlements and the one or two old cities. Stretching on one side far to the north, it reaches the cold and desolate plains of Labrador; on the southwest a fertile peninsula is bounded by Huron and Ontario, Lake Erie, Georgian Bay, and the Niagara. Lower Canada, with its old French families and feudal law of descent, has never flourished, though its military history, with the sieges of Montreal and Quebec, have given it greater fame than has been acquired by the quieter but more thriving province to the west, with its commercial capital at Toronto, its long lines of railway, and immense lake coast. Every one buys relics at Montreal and Quebec; few reflect on the vastly superior importance of peninsular Canada in the future of America. Upper Canada is Protestant; Lower Canada is Catholic; Upper Canada has a temperate climate, Lower Canada is comparatively cold—one preserving in its institutions a remnant of the feudal system, is shut out from intercourse with the States to the South; while the other, freer in its institutions, surrounded on every side by the enterprise and activity of a kindred race, feels their influence. The difference in the increase of inhabitants between the two is remarkable. In 1770 two hundred people were living in Canada West; in 1791, the number had swelled to 50,000; in 1841, to 465,000; ten years later, this number was more than doubled. The population of the eastern colony, however, which contained 8,000 souls nearly a century before the time when her neighbor could only boast of two hundred, only numbered 890,000 in 1851, when 952,000 was the number claimed by Canada West. Mr. Russell gives the following table to show the relative progress in the cultivation of land of the two provinces:

Year.	UPPER CANADA. No. acres cultivated.	LOWER CANADA. No. acres cultivated.
1831	2,065,913	818,432
1844	2,802,317	2,166,101
1851	3,605,376	3,695,763

Notwithstanding the essential differences of temperature, however, the whole country is productive. The author of a pamphlet, published by authority of the Bureau of Agriculture, observes:

"The climate of Canada is in some measure exceptional, especially that of the peninsular portion. The influence of the great lakes is very strikingly felt in the elevation of winter temperatures, and in the reduction of summer heats. East and west of Canada, beyond the influence of the lakes, as in the middle of the States of New York and Iowa, the greatest extremes prevail—intense cold in winter, intense heat in summer, and to these features may be added their usual attendant, drought.

"'Perhaps the popular standard of the adaptation of climate to the purposes of agriculture is more suitable for the present occasion than a reference to monthly and annual means of temperature. Much information is conveyed in the simple narration of facts bearing upon fruit culture. From the head of Lake Ontario round by the Niagara frontier, and all along the Canadian shores of Lake Erie, the grape and peach grow with luxuriance, and ripen to perfection in the open air, without the slightest artificial aid. The island of Montreal is distinguished everywhere for the fine quality of its apples, and the island of Orleans, below Quebec, is equally celebrated for its plums. Over the whole of Canada the melon and tomato acquire large dimensions, and ripen fully in the open air, the seeds being planted in the soil toward the latter end of April, and the fruit gathered in September. Pumpkins and squashes attain gigantic dimensions; they have exceeded 300 pounds in weight in the neighborhood of Toronto. Indian corn, hops, and tobacco are common crops, and yield fair returns. Hemp and flax are indigenous plants, and can be cultivated to any extent in many parts of the province. With a proper expenditure of capital, England could be made quite independent of Russia, or any other country, for her supply of these valuable products.'"

Apropos of the growth of population, Mr. Russell falls into a curious and rather common fallacy: it is that of comparing two countries by their increase per cent. and not by the actual numbers. Quoting Mr. Sheridan Hogan, "the writer of a prize essay on Canada of no ordinary excellence," he says (p. 213): "In 1800 the population of the United States was 5,305,925. In 1850 it was 20,250,000. The increase was therefore 300 per cent. nearly. In 1811 the population of Upper Canada was 77,000, and in 1851 it was 952,000, an increase of over 1,100 per cent. in forty years." Some other statistics to the same effect are collected. But adopting this basis of calculation, what results do we arrive at? According to Mr. Russell and Mr. Hogan, if the Canadians had numbered two hundred in 1811, and in forty years their number had grown to be 2,200, they would have shown as great progress as is manifested in the difference between 77,000 and 952,000! or if, starting with a population of two, the census at the end of forty years had proved that twenty-two were living in their stead, the result would have been much more surprising than the development of the United States. The statement of the proposition lays bare its absurdity; but it is appeals to "facts" such as these which throw a cloud over the value of figures, and cause men to sneer at the worth of statistical tables.

The provincial and colonial character of the Canadians, the influence of their neighbors' and their own democratic tendencies, of England's and their own aristocratic prejudices, their sentiment of loyalty to the home Government, their mixed population, are so complicated in their effects upon the natural development of character and institutions as to make a prediction of Canada's future no easy task. That school of English politicians of which Mr. Russell is a disciple, which, acknowledging that some time Canada must become independent, is unwilling that any steps should be taken either to impede or retard her progress, is now represented by the existing British Ministry. It prefers to let her drift into independence rather than assist her to freedom and nationality. Unwilling that a precedent so fatal to the imperial sway as the concession of sovereign rights to a colony should be authorized by the imperial Government, it chooses rather to let time settle the question than with ready generosity to anticipate its subjects' needs. It will not, in short, do anything. It says, "Our industrious daughter is not aware when females reach the age of majority; for heaven's sake, let us be the last to impart that dangerous knowledge; let us wait at least till she has determined to leave her maternal threshold." "At some day," says Mr. Russell, "near or remote, Canada must become either independent in whole or in part, or a portion of a foreign State. It will be of no small moment for those then living in Great Britain whether they have alienated the affection or have won the hearts of the newly-created power." Mr. Russell wishes that all may be done at home that is possible to help the Canadians, if they will help themselves; that every means may be used to stimulate their loyalty and make the country what, in his opinion, it should be—a rich, flourishing, but dependent child of the imperial parent. The intentions of the Government are plainly shown in the recent interview between the Duke of Somerset, Earl de Grey, Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. Cardwell, M.P., on behalf of the Ministry, and a delegation sent by Governor-General Lord Monck, at a recommendation of the Committee of the Executive Council, for the purpose of conferring on subjects of importance to Canada. The conference was to embrace the consideration of five points: "1. The proposed confederation of the British North American provinces, and the means whereby it can be most speedily effected. 2. The arrangements necessary for the defense of Canada in the event of war arising with the United States, and the extent to which the same should be shared between Great Britain and Canada. 3. The steps to be taken with reference to the reciprocity treaty, and the rights conferred by it upon the United States. 4. The arrangements necessary for the settlement of the North-west Territory and Hudson's Bay Company's claims. 5. And generally, upon the existing critical state of affairs, by which Canada is most seriously affected." As to the first subject the commissioners could obtain only a vague assurance that "every proper means of influence" would be used to carry into effect without delay the proposed confederation. On the second point the Ministry promise, in case Canada undertakes the primary liability for the defensive works recommended and offers sufficient security, to apply to Parliament for a guarantee for the amount required, and that the armaments for the works should be furnished by England; but as to naval force on Lake Ontario, nothing could be done in time of peace further than the maintenance of a specified number of ships; in time of war England would do her duty. As to the reciprocity treaty, Sir Frederick Bruce has received instructions to negotiate for its renewal. On the subject of the Northwestern Territory, the Cabinet agree to apply to the imperial Parliament for a guarantee for a loan to be raised by Canada for the purpose of purchasing from the Hudson's Bay Company, on being satisfied that the indemnity offered them was reasonable. The "existing critical state of affairs" was referred to in a very gentlemanly way, and the delegation was told that England fully acknowledged the obligation of defending every portion of the empire with all the resources at her command.

It was a sorry day for England when, having planted her civilization and religion in the four quarters of the globe, she became an "empire." Thirteen colonies demanded some semblance of self-government; it was denied them, and the "empire" was shorn of its fairest part. Now another colony, just struggling into manhood, hardly knowing its own powers, wishing to be independent, yet loyal to the mother country with all the loyalty of Englishmen, is neither assisted to become free nor protected as a dependent. Canadian institutions are on the whole democratic, notwithstanding the feudal tenures of the lower province; no Canadian aristocracy sits in a Canadian House of Lords; the Canadians, while they sincerely desire to be faithful subjects of Great Britain, desire still more deeply to govern themselves in accordance with their own interests; and however much they may admire the beauties of the trans-Atlantic social system, which Mr. Russell thinks it was a great mistake not to have imported, still it is distance which lends enchantment to the view; and we must be permitted to doubt, however great the enthusiasm on the arrival of the Prince of Wales, whether the appearance among them of an Earl of Montreal or Duke of Quebec would be congenial to the feelings of the colonists. The soldiers which Britain sends to defend her possessions in America treat the Canadians with such contempt that they can hardly expect much love for themselves or their government in return. Mr. Russell tells us of a young lady who remarked to him at a party, on his noticing that the English officers held themselves aloof and did not dance, that it was their custom to stand up against the wall and criticize the natives. The feeling of the natives towards their defenders is probably in great measure that of Mayor Beaudry of Montreal, who, at a public dinner given by the inhabitants to the Governor-General, said "that Canada might esteem herself a most fortunate community in being protected by one of the most powerful nations of the world, which sent them as many soldiers as might be required without rendering them liable in purse or person; that no matter how many red-coats might be required—and the more there might be, the better pleased they would be to see them—it would not take one single sous out of their pockets." This sentiment was greeted with vociferous applause. To be sure this was in Lower Canada, but that such sordid expressions should have been received with applause in one of the most populous cities in the country, shows a vital defect in the old colonial system. Mr. Beaudry has found by this time that he was mistaken; the mother country no longer intends to provide defence for her colony without "one single sous" coming from their own pockets; they must provide, and provide largely, if they would be defended. Mr. Russell quotes a speech of the Hon. Joseph Howe, a Canadian, in which the divergence of interest between the two countries and the want of a proper system of representation is pointedly shown.

"Our columns of gold," he exclaims, "and our pyramids of timber may rise in your Crystal Palaces, but our statesmen in the great council of the empire, never. Saxony or Wirtemberg are treated with a deference never accorded to Canada, though they are peopled by foreigners. The war of 1812–15 was neither sought nor provoked by the British Americans. It grew out of the Continental wars, with which we certainly had as little to do. Whether a Bourbon or a Bonaparte sat upon the throne of France, was a matter of perfect indifference to us. We were pursuing our lawful avocations —clearing up our country, opening roads into the wilderness, bridging the streams, and organizing society as we best could, trading with our neighbors, and wishing them no harm. In the meantime British cruisers were visiting and searching American vessels on the sea. Then shots were fired, and, before we had time to recall our vessels engaged in foreign commerce, or to make the slightest preparation for defence, our coasts were infested by American cruisers and privateers, and our whole frontier was in a blaze."

One great difficulty has always been want of emigrants. The French of the lower province, with their hatred of innovation, their stubborn attachment to antique customs, and their anti-republican laws, and the loyalists who settled there at the close of our Revolutionary War, were not classes well qualified to improve a country, and Canada needed an infusion of new blood to quicken the stagnant circulation in the arteries of commercial and social life. But unfortunately the superior inducements offered to foreigners by the United States—the Colonial Office acting, as Mr. Russell says, as a sort of buffer between Parliament and the shocks of colonial agitation and demands—the importance to the Irish of getting to a free country rather than a British dependency, these causes have prevented the tide of migration from setting towards the shores of England's American possessions. The magnificent country to the northwest, the fertile valley of the Saskatchewan, is unknown, and year after year Canada creeps slowly along, and hardly understands the cause of her inadequate progress.

What then does the English Government do for Canada, and what does she do for herself? England sends out a Governor-General, she prevents emigration, she reserves the power of vetoing the acts of the Canadian Legislature, a power which she dare not exercise, she may guarantee a loan and send out some guns for the defence of her territory, she promises to do her duty in case of war. Canada, on the other hand, has her own legislature, her own taxes, duties, and franchise, she must raise troops for her own defence, has her own courts of law, is in fact in all but the name an independent state. Mr. Fox said, in 1791, "I am convinced that the only means of retaining distant colonies with advantage is to enable them to govern themselves." The experiment has been tried and succeeded; it has succeeded so well that Englishmen admit the uselessness of holding Canada should she desire to assume entire sovereignty. Will she make use of her opportunities and ensure for herself a glorious future?

We have not spoken of annexation; it would have been to no purpose—Americans do not wish to "annex" Canada forcibly, and events stronger than words are proving it to the world. Mr. Russell was imbued with the idea that it was a settled principle of our policy to make war on Canada. A great many of his ideas about this country have their origin in the columns of the Herald. Perhaps, if he had read that paper more attentively, he would have found that the space of a nation's life would be much too short for its innumerable schemes. The Herald may represent the prejudices, not the principles of the United States. That all Americans desire and believe that the State of Canada will be ultimately represented in their Congressional halls, it is not too much to say; for they believe that the community of interests with them, and the want of it with England, will some time or other force itself upon the mind of Canada; that the colonists will find that a reciprocity treaty which may be repealed is not so valuable as the reciprocity which springs from union; that all the advantages which could spring from the connection with the parent state have been used; that the time has come for independent action; but that we have any desire to make war for the purpose of adding another State to our ranks, is untrue.

Mr. Russell has given a great deal of attention to the military question, and has discovered five principal lines of attack from the south; he shows Canada's weak points, and inculcates the means of defence. This is all to no purpose; we do not propose to invade England's possessions on this continent. Our brothers' blood has been shed in a holy cause; the nation which engaged in it will not sully the reputation gained in the last four years by a war of conquest. When Mr. Russell tells us of his adventures on a Mississippi steamboat, when he describes a walk behind the falls of Niagara, in fact, when he describes anything he has actually seen, we listen to him with attention, for he is an expert; but when he turns to political and national questions, our attention flags, for he has neither experience nor that enlightened judgment which is able to use wisely the experience of others.

HORACE MANN.*

THE outward career of Horace Mann is well known to all educated Americans. For many years he was one of the most conspicuous and efficient of the public men of Massachusetts. There was scarcely a town or village in the State which did not listen to the persuasive eloquence of his voice; and there was not a State in the Union, if there was a country in Europe, where his progressive sentiments on the subject of popular education were not vigorously discussed. His services were not restricted to the commonwealth where he was born; but in the national capital, and in a prominent position at the West, he was also for a long period engaged in the promotion of great social interests.

At length, after an interval of seven years from the time of his death, his inner life has been revealed to us by one who stood near him in the most intimate of relations. His thoughts, his motives, his private letters, and, above all, his long continued private diary, are now laid open with so much freedom, and at the same time with so much delicacy and appreciation, that the veil which often covers the secret springs of a public career seems in his case completely lifted. We are permitted to know the distinguished educator at least as well as he knew himself.

The preparatory period of Mr. Mann's life is in most respects the same as that of scores and hundreds of New England lawyers. An early home in the country, where frugality and thrift predominated; a college education at Brown University, acquired with much pecuniary difficulty; a year at the famous law school of Judge Gould, in Litchfield; the varied practice of a rural attorney; and repeated elections to the lower House of the Massachusetts Assembly, prepared him, in 1833, to begin his professional practice in Boston. He was then chosen to the Massachusetts Senate, and for four years filled the office with distinction and acceptance. During all his life as a legislator he was noted for the interest which he took in political questions which have a moral bearing, and for the zeal with which he promoted various projects for social reforms. "The fifteen gallon" liquor law was one of the most famous. The establishment of the State Asylum for lunatics will always be remembered as one of the most humane and beneficent of all the enterprises with which he was identified. But this experience belonged only to the training period of his life. He was still expecting to devote himself to the profession of the law, in which he had already attained considerable success.

His real life-work began in 1837, when the Massachusets Board of Education, then organized for the first time, appointed him as Secretary. He served the State in that capacity for more than eleven years. This, in our view, was by far the most important epoch of his life. It was a period of intense toil, great self-denial, indomitable energy, and finally of great renown. Then came his election to Congress on the death of John Quincy Adams in 1848. He was elected as the representative of the anti-slavery element in his party, and during the four years and more of his Washington life he was among the foremost of those who resisted the encroachments of Southern slavery. It was a period of agitation, discouragement, and unceasing anxiety. "One thing alone," he writes, "makes it tolerable to me—the possibility of doing something to favor the right or to check the wrong." We find him next abruptly transplanted to a little village in Ohio, where the "Christians" have invited him to become the President of Antioch College. Six years of labor here formed the closing period of his life. But his college work was only begun. What he might have accomplished none can foretell; but the miserable financial basis of the college embarrassed all his efforts and defeated many of his projects.

In each of these three positions, Horace Mann was a pioneer. As such we must judge him. Nobody before had devoted himself to the *un*popular work, as it then was, of promoting popular education. The field was his own. The soil might be productive, but there were stumps to be extracted and trees to be felled before it could be ploughed and planted. So in Congress, the dawn had not appeared in the national horizon, but the night was dark and the watchmen of liberty were few and fettered. Again, at Antioch, he was the first president of an institution founded on novel and not yet vindicated principles—opposed and thwarted by foes without and within.

Whatever his success or his want of success in the halls of Congress and the walls of a college, as a promoter of public education Mr. Mann has achieved for himself lasting reputation. With an enthusiasm which sprang from a naturally glowing temperament, and from firm belief in an excellent cause, he advocated everywhere, among the educated and the ignorant, among the influential few and the assembled masses, the radical improvement and reorganization of the common schools of Massachusetts as essential to the welfare of the State. His annual reports as Secretary of the Board of Education were like broadsides in an engagement. Controversies he learned to expect and almost to enjoy. He lived to see almost all the points established which he undertook to defend, and he found that the improvements of Massachusetts were rapidly extended to the other States of New England, and finally, in a less degree, to other portions of the country.

In rightly estimating his services, however, we must not forget that the times were ripe in New England for just such a movement as he was engaged in. A great many other men besides Horace Mann, in a great many other spheres, were working for the intellectual and moral regeneration of society. The circumstances of the day greatly favored his career. The history of common schools in this country, whenever it is written, will reveal a great amount of now forgotten labor in the field where the laurels of Mann were won.

It can hardly be said that Horace Mann was a thoroughly enlightened educator. To this view we are forced by the biography before us. He had not studied with any profoundness the philosophy of education, or even the principles of the human mind. There is no evidence that he was acquainted with the history of educational institutions and the influence which they have exerted in moulding human society. He was therefore far from comprehending all that was involved in a public system of instruction. He was unequal to the task of introducing or of defending the ideas of intellectual discipline and culture which belong to the higher departments of education and are essential to the perfection of a public educational establishment. The perusal of his biography and of his reports will show that it was the outward concerns and not the inner theories with which he was occupied. He roused the attention of the public, he collected the statistics, he overcame opposition, he devised new school-houses, he contrived good systems of ventilation, he called for better school-books, he pointed out better methods of teaching and governing classes of scholars. In all this he did nobly. He has earned the gratitude of generations. But he has not done everything. Much remains to be done for the improvement of American common schools. There is, therefore, need of caution in reading and in admiring the labors of Horace Mann, lest we concede too much to their influence and estimate too highly the work he performed. He was a man for the period of 1840 rather than of 1865.

His biography points out one book which seems almost to have been the guide of his life. It is Combe's "Constitution of Man." With the well known author of this little treatise he was on terms of great intimacy. The book itself he continually refers to. To those who are familiar with its pages, it is curious to trace their influence on the life of Mann. It may be questioned whether he would not have been a wiser man if he had chosen some other guide than this distinguished phrenologist.

As a biography this volume is very attractive. It is like a mirror of the subject. Occasionally a more precise statement of facts would seem to us desirable, and perhaps a more thorough analysis of the reports and other writings of Mr. Mann would have been acceptable to the reader. But Horace Mann speaks for himself in these pages. He stands before us a self-denying, public-spirited, eloquent, and indefatigable advocate of popular education. As such we believe he will be honored and remembered long after the bronze statue has perished which now does him honor at the State House in Boston.

THE ENGLISH "BROAD CHURCH" AND AMERICA.*

THERE is one phase of English theological thought almost outside of general American knowledge, and certainly outside of American use. This is that of the "Broad Church," so called, one of the three large internal divisions or "schools" in the English Establishment—the first, "Platitudinarians," being the "Low Church" party; the second, "Latitudinarians," being the "Broad Church" party; and the last, "Attitudinarians," being the "High Church" party. Punch deserves credit for establishing such a convenient nomenclature, symbolic as it is in more ways than one. We have in America the first and the last shades of opinion, but, strangely enough, have no equivalent to the "Broad Church," nor anything that possesses the right to be classed with it. We should have known more about it, and might very possibly have had something to represent it, if American publishers had brought out more of its philosophy and theology than they have. As it is, no interest has been excited in it among us, and the impressions prevalent concerning it throughout the country have been of the vaguest and most unsatisfactory kind. Its enemies have said a good deal about it, and have been very economical of fair expressions in regard to it. Again, we have sometimes heard of an American "Broad Church," of which, among others, Dr. Bellows is a representative apostle. Some have connected these two; but nothing could be more incorrect. For no protest made by the English

"Broad Church" is more earnest or fuller than that against any who deny the doctrine of the Trinity, and this our unfledged American "Broad Church" does. It is enough, in proof of this, as well as to note many other points of difference between it and both the New and the Old Unitarians, to read the volume of "Theological Essays" by Rev. Frederick Denison Maurice, probably the truest representative of "Broad Church" sentiment in England. These essays were delivered in the chapel of Lincoln's Inn in London in 1852, and excited a great deal of comment from every quarter. Though republished here in 1854, comparatively little attention was paid to them. Following the order of confession in the Apostle's Creed, the entire book being written solely with reference to Unitarians, Mr. Maurice discusses in a singularly plain, simple, and untechnical manner the great subjects that necessarily come under review, always with the unvarying purpose "not to unsettle men in their opinions, or to bring them to mine, but to show that God has laid a foundation for them and for me upon which we may stand together." It would be impossible to find anywhere a book which so fairly states opinions differing from the writer's, and which disdains not to find instruction, benefit, and good in the most opposite and apparently conflicting sentiments of men.

It would be very wrong indeed for Americans to attempt to conceal from themselves, or gloss over for others, the fact that, for some reasons, theological controversies and discussions are neither as a general thing high enough in character to interest more than a very few of little authority or position among us, nor again, even when the case is different, at all likely to be settled on any ground more stable or trustworthy than the decisions of a council or synod. A church like the English Establishment, containing within it such variety of "tolerated sentiment," is an anomaly to an American. If it comes to pass, and it very often does, that he cannot continue to like the church he belongs to, he has a very simple remedy. He makes another. And so there are scores of divisions of churches, and scores of subdivisions again of these among us, enough to make us almost doubt the truth of the promises and prophecies concerning the unity of the Church. Possibly our plan has its advantages: and nothing first so much puzzles an American and then makes him laugh as that Colenso's arithmetical calculations and Brother Ignatius's beads and penances and prayers are all alike beneath the shade and protection of the Thirty-nine Articles. The idea of a church within whose pale diverse sentiments and opinions might be tolerated, has been foreign to our national tendencies. It is amusing, as an instance of this, to notice that attempts made to unite two churches, no matter how nearly related, have invariably terminated in the establishment of three—one being the union church, and the other two being the unwilling members of the old churches.

If we ask for a reason for all this, we shall easily find it, primarily, in the want of homogeneousness of our people. Not to refer to the sects of the various nationalities—not speaking English—who have peopled our soil, we may discover that only two great theologic influences have been of sufficient power in moulding minds and modes of thoughts to be considered—the Puritan and the Covenanter, including in this latter term the entire Scotch and North Irish influence. Other beliefs have had various powers; all have had, however, much less power than, and been ever subordinate to, these.

This is to pass away in our country, as in all countries, just as truly and thoroughly as ever have unbrotherliness and darkness gone away into untrodden wildernesses when the true light shone. There are not wanting very decided evidences of this. A great church forgets, or remembers with regret, ungracious deeds to Roger Williams, and unappreciated sectaries, and horrible witches; and putting in place of these the memory of a freedom believed in and testified of by the fathers—though it was only for themselves at first, and excluded, except in the opinions of a few, all the rest of mankind—and, indeed, how many have ever begun better than this?—witnesses to-day a better Gospel and a larger Christianity. And though the Covenanters are slower, and have got back but the dimmest idea yet of what was once meant when men believed in a king, a prophet, and a priest for the nations and the Church, still they are ridding themselves of the old world ways, and as they become more Americans, and less Scotchmen and Irishmen, as the proper homogeneousness of the American people is thus developed, they too will learn how much they have been hurting themselves in hurting and quarrelling with those who did not think exactly as they did.

And we must not make a mistake here and suppose that this progress will be one towards a mere uniformity—a mere homogeneousness with nothing beyond. But it will be, just as many discords may be made to make together the most perfect harmony, just as numberless winds and storms and the bright sun, different from them all, make together the earth to be beautifully fair as a garden of the Lord.

We did not overlook, when we spoke of Puritanism and the Covenanters' influence, the fact that we allowed nothing to represent the theological influence of the Southern States, as both of those named are properly confined to and developed in the North. But a little reflection will suggest the natural question whether anything can be so allowed. Is it not a fact that while Southern political influence has been tremendous, overshadowing all things else, to reduce which to proper place has cost a million lost and ruined lives, Southern theological influence has been absolutely nothing? Nay, to get back of theological facts merely, that religion with the whites of the South has been a void, intangible thing, most sorrowful to think of beyond anything else in history or in the darkest places of the earth to-day? Who ever reckoned its power? What did Southern doctors of divinity talk of when they came to conference and assembly? And because of what did they cleave the churches in twain, as if they had been angry iconoclasts in a temple of God? This whole matter has been little considered in political and ecclesiastical plans for the regeneration of the South. It is not that truths have been perverted only—they have been perverted and then forgotten.

Possibly no man in England has been so unwearied and diligent in practical effort for the benefit of his countrymen as Mr. Maurice. One remarkable and eminently successful project of his has been the Working-men's College in London, which, under his faithful instructions and advice, has since its establishment, twelve years ago, become a very successful institution. When the plan on which it is conducted is understood and made use of by Americans—as it ought to be, and without delay—we shall understand what a debt of gratitude English working-men owe to Mr. Maurice's faithful, unselfish, and intensely earnest labors. It is a question needing most careful treatment how to educate and enlighten the eight or nine millions of ignorant whites and blacks of the South, so that they may be made true and intelligent citizens. It cannot be done by separating learning and working. Whatever plan is adopted must unite these two, else some will be educated to death and most worked to death. After a few unimportant changes, the plan of the Working-men's College in London will be found to be one of the most remarkable adaptability to the present condition of things in the South, and, it might be added, to the uneducated foreign people in our larger cities, who are so rapidly fermenting from the rich, good wine they might be into most miserable, useless vinegar, destined, at no great distance of time, to be an ugly question in our politics. This whole matter is worth the most serious attention of the crowd of freedmen's societies and commissions for the education of the Southern people, each with its separate plan, no doubt all very good and doing noble work, and yet not so good and not doing so noble work as they might if they were united. The plan of the Working-men's College is explained in Mr. Maurice's "Learning and Working," a volume of addresses delivered in London, with the intention of making known the plans and prospects. It would be a valuable book to republish here now when we are undertaking such an immense educational work.

Mr. Maurice's writings are very numerous, and not confined to theology and exegesis, though mainly in these directions. Our list includes all those which have been republished in this country, no one of which has met the same favor and attention as in England. His work on "Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy" is, upon the entire subject, one of the best books ever written, and gives the reader a lifeful as well a deep apprehension of men and opinions. The "Doctrine of Sacrifice," a volume of sermons, contains the essence and the marrow of "Broad Church" faith. This, with the work last named, needs to be republished here.

HOSMER'S THINKING BAYONET.*

Mr. Hosmer's "Color Guard" will hold a permanent place in our literature as an interesting, truthful, and animated description of service in our army during the war of the rebellion. It is by far the best book of its kind. Its simple and genuine spirit, its manly and vigorous tone, its picturesque vivacity, its faithful representation of the principles and character of our soldiers, give to it an exceptional value and interest. It is not merely an excellent narrative, but an historic record of no slight worth. Encouraged by its merited success, the author has in the present volume given us a story of the war, in which he has embodied much of his personal experience and observation.

As a romance of love and adventure, the book will afford entertainment to the large class of mere novel readers, but its main interest springs not so much from the story of imaginary characters as from its record of actual fact and its account of real scenes. The same qualities which distinguish the "Color Guard" are found in this volume. The descriptions, if sometimes a little over-labored, are generally simple, straightforward, and truthful, while many incidental touches of character scattered through the pages show the ready sympathy of the author, and his large and generous faculty of appreciation of the varied exhibitions of human nature. Indeed, this book, like its predecessor, impresses the reader strongly with a sense of the good heart and the good principles of its author, of his purity of motive, his uprightness in action, and his devotion to duty. We owe Mr. Hosmer a debt of gratitude as a clergyman, even more than as an author, for proving by his example his understanding of the truth that patriotism is a religious duty, that love of country is one form of gratitude to God, and that a minister of Christ may have as genuine a call to serve his Master in the ranks of an army as in the pulpit of a city or a country church, and may find in the field of battle as fair an opportunity for the exercise of the highest Christian virtues as in the limits of a peaceful parish.

* "The Thinking Bayonet. By James K. Hosmer, author of the 'Color Guard.' Boston: Walker, Fuller & Co. 1865. 12mo, pp. 326.

We cannot but regret that Mr. Hosmer has given a fictitious framework to his later book, for even if he possessed the rare genius which would fit him to write a good novel, the stage which he has chosen for his characters, and the scenes into which he has introduced them, are not now well suited for romance. The realities of the war are of too deep a quality, they are too close to our hearts, too fresh in our memories, and too intimately connected with interests far transcending any which can attach to the fortunes of an individual, to form a good foundation for a work of fiction. Only the highest genius could succeed in transferring our sympathies from the actual characters and incidents of the time to the creations of fancy and the invented personages of a story. Years must pass, this generation must disappear, the mist of time must gather around the incidents of the rebellion, before the events which have so profoundly stirred our whole natures will become fit for the purposes of the novelist. The brief biographies of our young brothers in arms, who have given their lives for the country and its great cause, touch our hearts with such tender and sacred pride, joy, and sorrow, that we are insensible to the claims of the heroes of imagination. No ideal nobleness, no invented sacrifices, no romantic adventures, equal the realities we have known. The simple truth is beyond the power of idealization.

Mr. Hosmer will not find fault with us for liking him in his "Color Guard" better than we like his hero in the "Thinking Bayonet," or for thinking that there is a deeper charm of nature in his diary than in his novel. If the first had not been published, we should think more highly of the last; but even with this drawback we cordially recommend the "Thinking Bayonet," not only to those in search of amusement and light reading, but also to those who are interested—and who is not?—in the experiences of the soldiers who have won the fight in the battle for liberty and the rights of man.

CONCERNING THE COUNTRY PARSON.*

Any literary gentleman in low spirits, by turning to the 389th page of "The Recreations of a Country Parson," Second Series (Ticknor & Fields' edition), will find relief. For "the day will come," there writes that exuberant penman, "when I shall have no more to say. I cannot always be writing essays. . . . If you do not know that what I have written is certainly true, you have not lived very long." We confess that before reading this, we saw no reason, in the nature of things, why that day should ever come, or why the "Country Parson" should not go on writing his essays for ever and for ever, but then we also confess that we have not lived very long, and do not think very deeply. We, unfortunately, see no signs of the fulfilment of this prophecy in the work we have just finished, namely: the "Second Series" of "The Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson." This book consists simply of a collection of sermons by Mr. Boyd, so generally known by the amiable nom de plume of the "Country Parson." A divine as devout as Mr. Boyd, and, perhaps, a more brilliant thinker, used daily to offer thanks to God for having placed death at the end instead of the beginning of life; our gratitude to our present author would have been excited by the contrary course of putting his finis at the beginning instead of the conclusion of his work. Not but that the book is superior to the average of books published. The matter of the volume is equal in merit to the sermons we ordinarily hear. The principles set forth are not generally objectionable. The style is very fair. It is fresh, buoyant, and perfectly transparent. The only grave offence against good taste which we remember is a passage in which the writer speaks of Christ's "taking the wind out of the sails of John the Baptist." This, however, must have been a very accidental slip, for few writers offend less against the proprieties of thought and style than Mr. Boyd.

Something more is needed, however, than ordinary merit in sermons to justify their publication. So long as the essays, or sermons, of the "Country Parson" are confined to magazines, we have nothing to say. On the contrary, we think many of his essays are much above most of our magazine articles—though perhaps that is not superlative praise. But when these ephemeral productions are gathered into a book and published, the matter becomes of public interest.

When the "Country Parson" first made his bow, his bland and calmly vivacious manner, his soda sarcasm, watered so as not to offend the most delicate stomach, gained him general favor. Men were glad to find in an author what they had heard and said themselves a thousand times, expressed in a more graceful style. The parson, also, was a man of experience, and had that calm wisdom which comes from experience. He had been through most of the passions which try the souls of men. He knew concerning love, country gossip, ambition, and the pursuits and trials of men, and could treat of them as a philosopher. He turned the calm eye of wisdom upon the enthusiasm and excitements of youth. Not that he objected to that sort of thing—on the contrary, it was rather pleasant, only he knew you would soon get over it. He himself, as a calf, was not without his antics; but now, a sedate and contemplative ox, he drew philosophic food from the calves around him. This blasé tone gave an interest to his writings, especially to young men, who affect much more than others that cheap Solomon virtue of having been through everything. Still, we must admit that at first Mr. Boyd wrote some very fair essays; but, having got a name, he seems disposed to continue his publications, which grow more and more diluted, until every lover of his race must cry "Hold, enough!"—at whatever future risk.

Mr. Boyd's book shows the influence of the peculiar mental temptations to which the ministry, like every other profession, is liable. Placed upon a social pinnacle, and thus getting a habit of talking down to people, and having a very convenient place to put all troublesome opponents, a minister is apt to lack that vigor and point which opposition and criticism beget. They have, also, perfect liberty of verbosity, and as men always seize with avidity their class privileges, it is nothing against the ministry in general, or, we may add, Mr. Boyd in particular, to say that they avail themselves of theirs.

Mr. Boyd's chief characteristic, however, is his wonderful commonplaceness, if the absence of all distinction can be considered in itself a distinction. He never seems to rise above the commonplace, nor to fall below it. He takes a commonplace idea, runs it into its common elements, surveys it from a vast number of commonplace points of view, illustrates it by a commonplace story, and ends with a moral of the same rank. He shows a great deal of skill in thus never stumbling nor climbing; but, then, it is not a kind of skill the reader particularly enjoys.

The principles which the "Country Parson" sets forth are generally very commendable, but about the book there is a morbid, sickly tone. As many persons bring their sorrows and sins to their minister, he is apt to have a certain hospital atmosphere about him, through no particular fault of his own. Thus Mr. Boyd reiterates that we are all of us poor creatures—we fail in our aims—we lose the freshness of youth, and in age gain the wisdom of disappointment. Over matter like this he suffuses a tabby godliness which is not very soul-stirring, but of which his supply seems to be unlimited.

MULTIPLIED ART.

It has seemed to the best and wisest of those who in our times have given thought to the Fine Arts, that multiplied and popular art is of as much importance to the world as art of any description whatever. They have felt the imperfection of such art as it commonly exists, and have seen the difficulties in the way of its improvement; but they have also felt its capacity, and seen its power to be very useful. They have, therefore, seen clearly and felt strongly the need of great improvement in this department. Their efforts have been directed towards such improvement, and not in vain. In no respect is the recent advance of the fine arts more marked than in this improvement in its cheaper and more accessible forms.

Criticism in America has been occupied rather too exclusively with oil pictures in gilt frames arranged in huge annual exhibitions. The periodical press, from which criticism mainly issues, seems not to acknowledge the existence of any other kind of art. And yet it would seem that if multiplied and popular art is anywhere useful, it must be peculiarly so in America. It will be well, therefore, to discuss its capacity and its limitations, and to speak briefly of some of the most excellent works of multiplied art which are within reach of our people.

We have said "multiplied and popular." Multiplied art is not necessarily popular. The large engravings published at high prices, whether of so-called classic pictures or of works of modern artists, are in no sense of the word popular art. Chromo-lithography, like that in Mr. Owen Jones's "Alhambra" or "Grammar of Ornament," can hardly be called popular, being so expensive as to be out of reach of any but those to whom it is a necessary implement of trade. Plaster casts from statues, or "Parian" imitations of them, are not and cannot be popular except in a few instances. That any work of art should be truly popular, that is, for the people, it is essential that it should admit of being multiplied or reproduced almost indefinitely, and that the copies so reproduced should be procurable at a moderate price.

The few instances in which reproductions of sculpture answer these requirements, and so become popular art, we can only allude to. In nearly every case their intellectual and moral rank is so low that it falls beneath the notice of the student. Faithful reproductions of sculpture, even in the cheapest material and of the smallest size, can seldom be sold at a price so low as to bring them within the pale of popular art. There is little demand for any such reproductions, except bronzes, and they are necessarily very expensive. Plaster casts of antique statuary are seldom sold to the people for their delight, but are most generally the furniture of the studio and "tools of his trade" to the artist. Copies in Parian and plaster of such statuettes as those of Daniel Webster and of Henry Clay are seen in many private houses, but are too costly to be truly popular. The same difficulty does not, indeed, attend the very creditable groups by Mr. John Rogers. However, the homes of the people but seldom afford any accommodation for such works of art; these require too much space, too large pedestals, too unobstructed rooms. Such casts in sulphur and in plaster as those of the medallion heads of Henry Clay and of the late Archbishop Hughes are, indeed, in every respect fit to be popular; but the popular taste does not seem to demand such glyptic art as this.

By far the most general methods of multiplying art are these: Wood-cutting, lithography or drawing on stone, engraving on stone or metals, and, finally, photography. A few words are needed on the facilities and difficulties attending each of the four kinds of work above named.

Wood-cutting, by long usage, is the most attainable and most common of all the means of reproducing art. It is a comparatively inexpensive process, and can be easily taught. The drawing is made upon the wooden block by the artist himself, or always should be, and the cutter has this one duty to perform, to exactly follow the lines of the drawing, and produce a type which will print off these lines with perfect accuracy. The difficulty in the way of perfect wood-cutting is, therefore, simple; it is the difficulty in the way of perfection in any mechanical art, the unwillingness of workmen to give patience, attention, and care to attain excellence in their work. This unwillingness is not without excuse. Perfect work has not been asked of them or expected of them; they have had no sufficient inducement to give their whole strength and attention to the work they do. Careless and hasty workmanship has been carelessly accepted and paid for. If an ambitious artisan has done more delicate or more accurate work than usual, it has not been duly appreciated. Employers have not been willing to pay prices which would remunerate him. Speed rather than merit, quantity rather than quality, has been demanded of him. Moreover, perfect work has not often been made possible, for the drawings on the wood have been of too vague and unfinished a nature to admit of faithful rendering. The best workman will chafe under the requirement to follow exactly the drawing, when the drawing itself is not firm and decisive. Consider, for instance, the ambitious landscape and other prints in the pages of such journals as the Illustrated London News. The practiced wood-engraver who is required to produce one of these cuts, knows that in the drawing given him the lines of foliage, texture, and shading are dashed in by thousands, without any but a very general meaning, and he works not to the lines but to the general tint that he thinks is required. He is encouraged in this practice by the frequent use by the draughtsman on wood of a flat tint of India-ink instead of an effect produced altogether by lines. If, for instance, one takes to the wood-engraver a drawing on paper of which a wood-cut is required, the draughtsman who is employed to copy this drawing on the wood block often tones and gradates his copy to his taste with a camel's hair-pencil and a wash of gray. The cutter, expected to produce effects in imitation of those so produced, soon learns to depend upon himself, grows familiar with a stock of maxims and a great deal of tradition, and forgets to count fidelity among his workman's virtues.

Workmen so trained, long accustomed to careless drawing to be carelessly cut, are seldom ready to recognize more accurate drawing when it is laid before them, and are still more seldom ready to do it justice by more careful cutting. A printed wood-cut lies before us with the original drawing beside it, which drawing was transferred to the surface of the block by mechanical means, and is, moreover, very simple in subject, and drawn entirely with lines of an uniform thickness. A double or "S" curve of gradual and subtle curvature, on whose accuracy the value of the whole design depends, has been entirely altered from the original, and the picture, by this mistake alone, were there no others, entirely spoiled. The wood-block shows what was the process of destruction. The tool cut too far into the curve in one place: this was merely carelessnesss; but the block should have been repaired by a plug, or else thrown aside, and the work, in either case, done over again. To conceal this error the curve was altered, made more hollow than the drawing, and to conceal this again the curve has been changed in every part. In other words, a double curve having been given, the wood-cutter, both the workman and his employer, have been satisfied to produce another double curve somewhat similar.

This bad work was done in a large wood-engraving shop in New York. It was not unusually bad. In a large per-centage of the best wood-cuts made, mistakes as great are to be seen. It is not only in unartistic New York, either, that careless execution is the rule rather than the exception. Good work is done in London, and of all living men Mr. Ruskin is perhaps he who has had the largest proportion of good work done for him; hear him a moment: "Admirably cut by Miss Byfield. I use this word 'admirably' not with reference to mere delicacy of execution, which can usually be had for money, but to the perfect fidelity of fac-simile, which is in general not to be had for money, and by which Miss Byfield has saved me all trouble with respect to the numerous wood-cuts in the fourth volume; first, by her excellent renderings of various portions of Albert Dürer's wood-cuts; and, secondly, by reproducing, to their last dot or scratch, my own pen diagrams, drawn in general so roughly that few wood-engravers would have condescended to cut them with care, and yet always involving some points in which care was indispensable."

Now this perfect fidelity of fac-simile is the one thing required of the wood-engraver. It seems strange that it should be a thing to praise as unusual the faithful rendering of the drawing. Such faithfulness should be the universal custom. But, that this may be possible, the drawings upon the blocks must be made as they seldom are made. In the first place, they must be made altogether with clear and positive lines. This would seem to be too obvious a fact to need mention, but we have seen reason to believe that this positive law is not too often obeyed. There is one good and sufficient reason why it is not obeyed; why most drawings for reproduction by wood-cutting are handed over to the professional draughtsman for transference to the wood. This good reason is, insufficient power of drawing on the part of the artist. Hear what a professional wood-engraver says upon this subject. "An artist's knowledge of drawing is put to the test when he begins to make designs on wood; he cannot resort, as in painting, to the trick of color to help the defects of his outlines. To be efficient in the engraving, his principal figures must be distinctly made out; a drawing on the wood admits of no scumbling; black and white are the only means by which the subject can be represented; and if he be ignorant of the proper management of chiaro-scuro, and incorrect and feeble in his drawing, he will not be able to produce a really good design for the wood-engraver. Many persons can paint a tolerably good picture who are utterly incapable of making a passable drawing on wood."*

In the second place, drawings on the wood should be made with some reference to the difficulty of engraving them on wood. Cross-hatching, or the process of producing shade by means of crossing lines, is very difficult and troublesome to cut, and should, as far as possible, be avoided. A moment's thought of the process of wood-cutting will show to any one the reason for this. In wood-cutting the white spaces are cut out, and the black lines are left, as if they were type. It is easier, of course, to cut out grooves between ridges than to gouge out little rhomboidal scraps so exactly as to leave the crossing lines perfectly continuous, and parallel, and true in direction. It is not meant that cross-hatching should never be employed, but it should be employed much more rarely than in line engraving; the drawing should be made with some reference to the future cutting of the block, and unnecessary labor avoided. And, thirdly, fineness of line is not to be sought as if it were a good in itself. A fine line in a wood-cut is, of course, the sharp edge of a little ridge of the box-wood. A few fine lines in a wood-cut, otherwise broad-lined, are effective, useful, and free from objection. But a cut made, as many cuts are, altogether of fine lines, is not fit to print many copies, from the speedy yielding of the edges under the press. Moreover, where the appearance of fineness is sought as a principal good, the temptation to use broken lines, dotted lines, sketchy and fragmentary lines, will hardly be resisted. Some of the most spirited and valuable drawings of modern times have been seriously marred, as we receive them in the form of prints from the wood-block, by an attempt to get great delicacy and fineness of line, resulting in a blurred, vague, uncertain picture.

During the past twenty years great progress has been made in the resources of the art and in the technical skill of the cutters. The most elaborate cross-hatchings and textures produced by complexities of lines and dots have been successfully executed. Imitations almost perfect of the texture of line engraving have been made. It is probable that the workmen who cut Albert Dürer's most elaborate wood-blocks would have refused to attempt such work as has, within a few years, been executed in France. But it does not follow that wood-engraving is better now than it was in the early part of the sixteenth century. On the contrary, some of the most artistic and valuable wood engravings of modern times have been made altogether in Dürer's manner. The disposition to require of the workmen minute and laborious workmanship rather than exactness of fac-simile, and to give to the workmen tasks which they will find it difficult to execute, is radically wrong, The aim of every designer should be to make the duty of the cutter as simple and natural as may be; and it is one merit in a design that it is capable of being easily prepared for engraving.

Wood-cutting is of especial importance in these days of cheap printing, because of its adaptability to be used in book-work. A wood-cut is in every respect like a type, and the impression is taken from it in the same way. Therefore a wood-block can be secured in the form with the letter-types for a page of a book or journal, and the impression taken at the same moment from the picture and the letters. Where a great many copies are to be printed, it is customary to take an electrotype copy of the whole page, from which electrotype copy the impression is taken, the wood-block itself and the types themselves not receiving ink or yielding an impression after the proofs taken from them at first before the electrotype is made.

Lithography has earned a bad name by the wretched work it has done, and the base uses to which it has lent itself. If a book were announced as illustrated with lithographs, the idea would be suggested to every one of the title-pages of popular music, and the coarse "views" of towns or buildings mounted like maps with muslin backing and rollers. And yet lithography has this great advantage over almost all other ways of multiplying art, that it admits of being easily executed by the artist or designer himself, from whose actual handiwork the impression will be taken. Moreover, if the designer make the drawing on paper and cause it to be copied on the surface of the stone, he can judge easily if the copy be correct, and almost as easily cause it to be corrected.

A drawing is made with a peculiar kind of crayon on the surface of a peculiar kind of stone. There is nothing in the process involving any unusual difficulty. It is not quite as pleasant a way of drawing as with black-lead pencil on drawing paper, but there is nothing worse about it than that. To this stone with the drawing on it printing ink is applied, which adheres to the crayon but is easily removed from the naked surface of the stone. The impression is then made upon paper in the usual way.

To illustrate the ease with which the operation is performed, and the adaptability of it to familiar uses, this fact may be mentioned. Architects employ it to multiply copies of perspective drawings of designs not yet carried out, as well as "views" of buildings erected. A perspective drawing is a thing made by the application of scientific principles, or rather by the use of rules deduced from such scientific principles. It can be made on a smooth stone as well as on a strained sheet of drawing paper, and with lithographic crayon with almost as much ease as with lead pencils.

The best use to which the process has been put has been the reproduction on a large scale of drawings from buildings and parts of buildings. Of many such we shall have future occasion to speak.

Engraving on stone is a very different process from ordinary lithography or crayon drawing on stone, but is executed with the steel point almost exactly as on a copper plate.

Engraving proper is exactly the reverse of wood-cutting, being the process of producing a picture on a surface of metal or stone by means of lines cut into it. The printing off from this plate is done by covering it with ink, which is afterwards removed from the surface of the plate, but remains in the cuts of the tool, and can be transferred to paper. An engraved surface is, however, often the thing desired, and no copy is taken from it. Engraved silver, for instance, is a favorite object for collectors. But these works of art have nothing to do with our present subject, which is the multiplication of art.

Engraving is the most expensive and troublesome form of reproducing a drawing or picture. It is almost exclusively abandoned, in modern times, to the professed engraver, who executes a copy of the outlines and light and shade of the picture, statue, or drawing of which a representation is required. The only exception is in the case of etching,* which is the best means at an artist's disposal for the publication on a small scale of his thoughts or studies executed by his own hand, and should be thoroughly familiar to all painters and draughtsmen. Chapter V. of "The Cestus of Aglaia," in the "Art Journal" for May, contains a truthful and timely hint of the dangers and temptations which await the etcher, and the great likelihood there is that he will fall into slight and slovenly ways of work. Etchings of principal and independent subjects are indeed terribly apt to be worthless. But the use of them for book illustration we can never forego, and the example of the eminent author of the essay above named is enough to show how useful and valuable in this way it may be made.

That line engraving is the best way of rendering the exact effect of delicate drawing in black and white, and that it gives the only known means of reproducing the forms and the system of light and shade in a painting, is not doubtful. Whenever any very careful and very delicate work is necessary in published art, line engraving is called for. Its heavy cost, and the unusual combination of qualities necessary to make a really thorough and excellent engraver, must always make this process less popular in its applications than other processes of which we have spoken.

*In technical language etching is, of course, not engraving any more than wood-cutting is or lithography. Logically, however, it is to be classed with the other processes which form the picture by incised and not relieved lines.

This Company will continue, as heretofore, to insure respectable parties against DISASTER BY FIRE
At fair and remunerating rates; extending, according to the terms on its Policies, the advantage of the
PARTICIPATION PLAN OF THE COMPANY, pursued by it for several years past, with such great success and popularity, and profit to its customers: whereby
(75) SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT. (75)
of the Profits, instead of being withdrawn from the Company in Dividends to Stockholders, is invested as a "SCRIP FUND," and held for greater protection of its Policyholders; and Scrip, bearing interest, is issued to Customers therefor: thus, IN THIS COMPANY, those who furnish the business, AND PAY THE PREMIUMS, derive the largest share of advantages; and when the accumulations of the SCRIP FUND shall exceed FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,
the excess will be applied to PAY OFF the Scrip IN CASH in the order of its issue.

☞ The liberal and prompt adjustment of Claims for Loss, WHEN FAIR AND SQUARE, is a specialty with this Company.

NOTE.—This Company does not insure on the hazards of RIVER, LAKE, or INLAND NAVIGATION; confining itself strictly to a legitimate FIRE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY A.M.

THE chief events of the week are increased receipts of the great staple of cotton, about fifteen thousand bales; increased exports of cotton, breadstuffs, and provisions, over four millions of dollars in value; continued favorable market news from Europe, where the prices of grain are stiffening, and the promises of the Continental crop are unfavorable for that side, but negatively good for the markets of this; and large gold payments into the Custom House for duties upon foreign merchandise for the summer and fall trade, which is expected to be large and generally remunerative.

The harvest advices from nearly all sections of the country continue cheering. Wheat and other small grain is yielding so abundantly as to cause the old stocks, held over from last season, to come into market freely. The Indian corn crop is looking well, though still subject, of course, to the contingency of an early frost later in the season. Of the supplies of old cotton in the States recently in insurrection, the estimates are as various and conflicting and as widely different as they well could be between a maximum of 3,500,000 bales and a minimum of 1,200,000 bales. The best information at the Treasury Office in Washington is said to indicate at least 1,000,000 bales west of the Mississippi, and nearly as much more east. But the latter is very much questioned in private letters from Georgia and Alabama. The growing crop is estimated at from 700,000 to 1,200,000 bales. After the fall of Richmond and surrender of Lee were known in Mississippi, Texas, etc., say about the 20th or 25th of April, a large breadth of land which had been planted with corn is said to have been ploughed over and cotton seed substituted.

The confidence felt in a reasonably cheap money market remains unimpaired. The signs are yet few of a return to the long credit system among merchants which prevailed before the rebellion, and which then devolved so many heavy losses in the South upon the New York wholesale houses. The system has since been in disuse in the North and West, and the disposition is general to deal for cash or on very brief credits with the Southern markets as they are generally restored to trade intercourse with New York and the other Atlantic cities. It is certainly desirable that it should be so, and above all that the large advances once so common on Southern crops not yet planted, and Southern plantations scarcely opened, should never come into practice again. The market has been free during the week of any adverse political news. This would not perhaps be so if it were in the midst of a long session of Congress. We shall begin after a few months to look to the reassembling of that body with some concern, financially; not however with reference to the public debt, to the support of which all parties profess their readiness to lend a strong and willing hand.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The long 6 per cents, gold-bearing, of 1881 have again advanced from 106¾ to 108 per cent., ex July dividend. The total issue is $282,570,650, nearly the whole of which is held in this country. This loan cannot be paid off, except by purchase at the market price, until after the year 1881. It begins to be more highly appreciated over all other of the gold-bearing stocks on this account.

The original 6 per cents, 5-20s, of 1882, redeemable after the year 1867, should the Government be able to command the loan of gold to do so, at a less rate, have advanced this week from 105⅜ to 106⅛ per cent. The issue is $514,780,500.

The second issue of 5-20s, 1884, redeemable after 1869, have remained steady at 105 to 105¼ per cent. The issue is $90,789,000.

The 10-40s, 5 per cent., of 1894, redeemable after 1874, are dull at 97⅜ to 98 per cent., including the accumulated gold interest since 1st March. The issue is $172,770,100. The old 5 per cents of 1871 and 1874, $27,022,000 in amount, rule at 96½ to 98 per cent., carrying the gold interest since 1st July. A few sales of the old 6 per cents, due December 31, 1867, and June 30, 1868, are selling at 112½ to 115 per cent., including interest since 1st July. They amount to $18,323,592, and will be paid off in gold at maturity.

The 7.30 per cents, currency bonds with coupons attached, the interest being exactly two cents a day on each $100 or $7 30 for 365 days, are selling at 99⅞ to 100, and interest to be added to the price for the first and second series of $300,000,000 each. The third series of $230,000,000 are being subscribed for at the rate of from $4,500,000 to $6,000,000 per day through the Government agent, Mr. Jay Cooke, at par and interest, less ⅜ to ½ per cent. allowed to large dealers and subscribers. There is now rather less than one hundred millions to be absorbed.

Treasury certificates of indebtedness, 12 months' date, carrying 6 per cent. in currency, are in demand at 99¾ for the issue of 1864, and 98⅜ for the recent issue, interest to be added to the price. The compound interest greenbacks of the 1864 dates are bought by the brokers at a premium of 1 to 3 per cent., according to the time they have run. But holders who are not compelled to part with those notes will discover by reference to the compound table of interest on their back that they are worth more. The amount of the 1864 issue is $111,497,370. Some recent issues have been made in substitution of old interest-bearing greenbacks redeemed and cancelled. They amount to about $80,000,000.

NOTE SECURITIES.

There has not been much done this week. The New York Bounty Loan, 7 per cent., is 98½, and interest from 1st of July. The Missouri 6 per cents. are dull at 73; Tennessees 72 per cent.

RAILROAD SECURITIES.

There is some improvement in the mortgages of the Toledo and Wabash Road, recently consolidated with several other Western corporations, making a continuous line from Toledo, on Lake Erie, to the Illinois River at Quincy.

The railway shares, after various fluctuations through the week, are rather less firm than on our last report on New York lines and most of the Westerns, but higher on Philadelphia and Reading, owing to the increasing coal tonnage; Erie varies from last Saturday, 81⅛ to 80⅝, after selling as low as 77½ per cent.; New York Central, 96½ to 95 per cent.; Reading, 98¾ to 100⅝; Hudson, 110¾ to 109½; Michigan Central, 108½ to 109; Michigan Southern, 63½ up to 67½ and down to 64½; Illinois Central, 137½ to 139; Pittsburg, 70¼ to 68½; Fort Wayne, 97½ to 100½ and back to 98; Rock Island, 107½ to 107; Northwest, 28 (same as last Saturday); Northwest Preferred, 62¼ to 66 and back to 62½.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

Pacific Mail shares have gone up to 295 per cent.; Atlantic Mail to 158¼; Cumberland Coal, 43½ to 42; Canton, 41 to 39½; Mariposa, 13½ to 13. A speculation has been raised in the old Brunswick (Georgia) Land Company, and the shares have advanced from $6 to $11 on the prospect of the quiet repossession of the property.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

The speculation in gold during the week has worked in favor of the party operating for a rise. They have had no support from an export demand, as bills on London continue to rule 108¾ to 109 per cent. for gold, which is about 1 per cent. below a profitable shipping point for American coin. The California steamer delivered this week $793,175, part in gold bars, which were taken up for shipment. The demand to pay customs has been unusually heavy, and contributed to the immediate scarcity of gold on the Street. The price has gone up from 139 and 140 to 142 and 143 per cent.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

The Week.

THE International Commercial Convention, held at Detroit from the 11th to the 14th inclusive, is thought to be the first of an annual series of such gatherings, and if so, has an importance beyond its immediate proceedings. It assembled at the invitation of the Detroit Board of Trade, and though in a measure spontaneous, was not free from suspicions of political and moneyed intrigue, and certainly exhibited no vagueness in the subjects of its discussion. Canada was largely represented, but declined to vote. The first apportionment of voices—one to every Board represented—was so manifestly unequal that it was at once resisted, and Chicago threatened secession unless some other rule were contrived. The matter was settled by allowing each State the number of votes that it would have in the Electoral College. The Committee on Transit reported in favor of a ship canal around Niagara Falls, to be built with the aid of Government. This was stoutly opposed by the entire New York influence, especially by those delegates whose cities have an interest in the Erie Canal and the Erie Railroad. The Western vote outweighed this local opposition, and the report was adopted. The narrowness of vision which could not see that what makes for the general welfare redounds to the prosperity of the individual, is akin to the popular objections to the introduction of labor-saving machinery, and the Convention did well to rebuke it. The Committee on Agriculture reported resolutions in favor of protection through its chairman, an avowed free-trader on principle, but who deemed that the exigencies of the country demanded special fostering of American productions. The Convention agreed with him almost unanimously. The Committee on Reciprocity was naturally regarded as having a manifest axe to grind, and its report excited a very earnest debate. It endorsed the action of Congress in putting an end to the old treaty, but recommended a new and a juster one for the sake of both parties. Its most distinguished opponent was the Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, who urged that the question be submitted trustfully to the wisdom of the Government. The Hon. Joseph Howe, of Halifax, defended the report in behalf of the Provinces, and the vote showed a general adhesion to his views. In a separate meeting, we are told, of the American delegates, from which the Canadians were by no means excluded, Consul-General Potter argued against another treaty on the ground that it would interfere with the realization of genuine reciprocity in the shape of annexation. The Canadian newspapers scout the idea of such an occurrence as he looks forward to and calculates upon. The Convention terminated, according to the fashion, in a river excursion.

THE New Jersey Republican State Convention met at Trenton on the 20th and nominated Marcus L. Ward for Governor. Their resolutions paid tribute to the memory of Mr. Lincoln and the worth of his successor; arraigned the political party hitherto controlling the State, especially for its disgraceful rejection of the Constitutional Amendment; pledged themselves to the unanimous support of this measure; and affirmed that the self-evident truths of the Declaration of Independence are no longer "glittering generalities," but have been vindicated as immutable. Captain George Halstead called up a resolution in relation to the rights of colored men. This caused "excitement," and the resolution was first postponed till after the nomination, and then—till after the election. Gen. Kilpatrick came near upsetting the plans of the various partisans, and all but secured the acclamation of the Convention. He spoke in favor of the ticket immediately after it had been decided upon.

THE Ninth Allgemeine Saengerfest, which took place in this city last week, included the reception and entertainment of some fifty societies from abroad, reckoning fifteen hundred members. They came from as far South as Richmond, as far North as Montreal, and all the way from Buffalo and Harrisburg to Providence. This throng of German singers was received by thirty-four societies of this metropolis, numbering about twelve hundred members. The excursionists from the South were escorted on Saturday evening, the 15th, to the Park, immediately on their arrival, under the friendly auspices of their future hosts. They sang on the steps of the City Hall their song of welcome, and with great good order the multitude marched and finally melted away. On the Sunday evening following there was a concert in the Academy, in which less than a thousand singers participated. The weather was bad, and the audience rather thin. Lizst's Preludes were well rendered by an orchestra of a hundred performers, and the Walpurgis Nacht of Mendelssohn by the choristers. On Monday evening there was a second concert at the same place, the programme including selections, among others, from Mendelssohn and Wagner. On Tuesday morning there was a business meeting, at which the next festival was appointed to be held in Philadelphia. In the evening occurred the prize concert at the Academy. On Wednesday there was a monster picnic at Jones' Wood, and there the prizes were awarded for the performance of the night previous. Philadelphia bore off double honors—the first prize, a flag; the second, a silver cup. This ended the official doings of the Saengerfest, mingled with which was the most extensive hospitality, and numerous private attentions from citizens to strangers. The public peace suffered nothing by the temporary influx of visitors, the art of music was honored and elevated, and friendships were formed or renewed with unquestionable advantage to the German population of the States.

Two reports of the Committee on the Conduct of the War overlap the cessation of hostilities. That upon heavy ordnance describes the peculiarities and mode of manufacture of four guns, Rodman, Dahlgren, Parrott, and Ames. The first two, generally smooth bores, are purely of cast-iron, and are now both made on the principle of the former, being cooled from within by means of a hollow core about which the casting is made. The cylinder of the Parrott gun is cast in like manner, but the breech is strengthened by shrinking a wrought-iron jacket upon it. The Rodman gun is preferred in the army, the Dahlgren in the navy; while the Parrott, as a rifled gun of large calibre, supersedes all others in both branches of the service. The Committee consider the cast-iron guns as good as those of any nation, and have no fault to find with the Parrott except its liability to burst, with the most disastrous and demoralizing effects on shipboard. The inventor professes to have discovered the cause of the shells exploding before they leave the gun, which seems to be the reason of its bursting. This is the powerful concussion upon the butt of the shell at the moment of discharge, from which a friction results between the powder and the rough interior of the shell that contains it; to obviate which Mr. Parrott applies, with perfect success, as he says, a coating of melted rosin, tallow, and brown soap. The Committee, however, not altogether convinced of the security of this preventive, recommend very strongly the adoption of the Ames wrought-iron gun, whose endurance has been wonderfully tested by a capable Board. The difference in cost is considerable. Thus, a 100-pounder Parrott is worth $1,300, a 100-pounder Ames, $15,000; 200-pounder Parrott, $2,000, Ames, $28,000. The report on the failure of the first expedition against Fort Fisher pronounces Gen. Butler justified in his conclusion not to assault that stronghold under the circumstances. Although General Grant had designed to place Gen. Weitzel in command, he knew of Gen. Butler's intention to accompany the expedition in time to have prevented it. Gen. Weitzel agrees with his superior on all points save that of declining to intrench his troops upon the cape, according to the express instructions of the Lieutenant-General. Not that he deemed this course either wise or advisable at that season of the year, but the duty of obedience was clear, and the blame, if any, would have rested with Gen. Grant. Gen. Butler's defence is, that he was ordered to remain if he should have effected a landing, which he maintains he had not done in all strictness, since only a part of his forces were landed, with scanty ammunition and precarious supplies. But his reasons for withdrawal from the undertaking are more satisfactory in a humanitarian than in a military point of view.

The Hon. B F. Perry, of South Carolina, had the misfortune to make a speech in the court house at Greenville, on the 3d, before he knew of his appointment as Provisional Governor. The speech might have gone undelivered and the appointment unmade if the President and he could have compared intentions in advance. He portrayed the dismal consequences of secession, to which he reminded his hearers he had been opposed from the outset, yet spoke as if belonging himself to the mortified and beaten host, and full of keen regret at the failure of the rebellion. One sentence concerning the freedmen was sound and humane: "They have had no agency in bringing about the change which has taken place, and we should feel no ill will toward them on that account." Nevertheless, Mr. Perry has "no doubt that in nine cases out of ten freedom will prove a curse instead of a blessing to the negro." For the rest, this Governor-in-spite-of-himself prepares the people for a return to allegiance by setting an example in this wise: "There is not now in the Southern States one who feels more bitterly the humiliation and degradation of going back into the Union than I do." Repentance is encouraged by asserting that to call the late war a rebellion "is simply a misapplication of terms." Not only in the council and in the field were the greatest and best men of the Southern States "most conscientiously leading this war," but especially "in all history there is not a more perfect model of a pure and great man (save Washington) than Gen. Lee." To hang this spotless hero as a traitor would be national infamy, and quite shocking to the sensibilities of the civilized world, indeed. Still further, Mr. Perry would persuade the people whom he is coaxing back into love of the Union, "a very large proportion of them have won immortal honors" in the recent strife, and appropriated "many a bright page in history" for original illustrations. He is above the cant of urging forgiveness for Northern injuries, charity for all and malice toward none; he has a better platform of fraternization and reconstruction. "I cannot and would not ask my fellow-citizens to forget the past in this war so far as the North is concerned. There have been deeds of atrocity committed by the United States armies which never can be forgotten in the Southern States." Undisturbed by the thought of a possibly equal tenacity of recollection on the part of the North, Mr. Perry explains his grounds of confidence in the new Executive, who was just then plotting to thrust greatness upon him. He prefers President Johnson to his predecessor, and pronounces him "in every way more acceptable to the South;" first, because he is a Southern man, next a Democrat, and lastly a former slaveholder, "well acquainted with the institution," and knowing "what is proper to be done in the grand change which is taking place." Besides, he voted for Breckinridge in 1860. Since this talk with his neighbors in open court, the Governor has reached Washington, and report says has assured the President that South Carolina will be represented by her Congressmen in the month of December next.

The returns from the election for the county of Henrico, in which Richmond is situated, are to the effect that the clerks of the circuit and county courts were chosen without opposition. The late Sheriff, P. H. Hoffman, was re-elected. He is said to have joined the rebellion at the last. The office of Commonwealth Attorney was contested by two candidates, Young and Courtney, distinguished only by their activity in furthering the Confederate cause. The latter, who took the field as a captain of artillery, carried the field on this occasion; but as he is thought to have had juster grounds for being preferred than his more conspicuous disloyalty, let him and his constituents have the benefit of the doubt.

Confiscation has begun in Virginia, under the auspices of Judge Underwood, whose headquarters are at Richmond. The lessees of the Spottswood House have been notified of the seizure of that property to the benefit of the United States, which now lays claim to the rent. Similar notices have been served on the occupants of other buildings in the city, amid the perturbation of those who are so poor as to be worth more than twenty thousand dollars. The Tredegar Works of course are forfeited. Thus the South contributes her reluctant instalment towards the payment of the national debt. In North Carolina the Tax Commissioners have already opened offices in Newbern, Beaufort, and Raleigh, under the law of 1861, which provided for levying twenty millions upon the several States. Their receipts have been quite satisfactory, but many abandoned estates will have to be sold to obtain the taxes due from them. The civil organization of the State has been extended to four-fifths of its counties.

The resignation of the Lord Chancellor of England and the dissolution of Parliament are the two chief items of foreign intelligence. Lord Westbury, in a speech of no little dignity, explained that he should have resigned his office much earlier, on the ground that the Keeper of the Great Seal ought not to be an accused person, had he not been persuaded by the other members of the Cabinet to await a parliamentary examination of the charges against him. He referred to the reforms which he had been instrumental in effecting, and anticipated a more favorable verdict from a later generation. He is generally acquitted of dishonest intentions or practices. Lord Cranworth succeeds him. The Parliament which has just come to an end after its eighth session is the sixth of Queen Victoria, and the longest since the first of George IV. It is characterized by having been without character—a neutral body, to be remembered neither for its merits nor its defects. The period of its existence has been rife with wars in both hemispheres, but it has kept Great Britain free from entanglement.

In common with the whole body of the press, we were deceived by the positive statement of a Philadelphia paper in regard to the will of the late Admiral Du Pont. It is now denied that he made any legacy of his prize-money for a national asylum. An exposure of the author of the falsehood would be a wholesome service.

A very forcible plea for delay in reconstruction, addressed to the President, is circulating in Boston. The danger to the public security and to the welfare of the colored race is ably set forth in distinct and unanswerable statements, based upon a dispassionate survey of the elements which are destined to compose the new society of the South. Disfranchisement of the blacks, by increasing the political power of their white fellow-citizens, is shown to be a proportional disfranchisement of the entire population of the North; and, under a new apportionment for representatives in Congress, the three-fifths clause being abrogated, a hundred voters in South Carolina would equal two hundred and forty in Iowa. The class to whom the ballot is refused are enthusiastically loyal, and would cheerfully share the burthen of the national debt, which they know to be the price of their freedom. The class who are summoned to the polls will have every disposition to shirk the same burthen, incurred, they can never forget, for their defeat. The expediency of justice towards the colored race is clear, while no one can demonstrate the wisdom of casting those who aided us to victory helpless and powerless into the hands of the late enemies of the Union. If the colored vote should be controlled by the white, it would also be divided with it. Capital at the North often influences the suffrages of its hired laborers, but no one thinks of disfranchising them. But, as it is, the whites will be no stronger with the entire colored vote than now, and it is certain that they will not get it all. Their very opposition to negro enfranchisement is a proof of this. We emancipated the slave for our own safety, rightfully, but not so for his peril and, perhaps, destruction. We perpetuate the spirit of slavery and deny him the protection of self-defence. The penalty of the nation will be as great as its wrong. The same necessity, the same justice, and the same expediency which united in the abolition of slavery, warrant and enforce the removal of disfranchisement. The President has only to take another step in his legitimate interference with the subjugated States. This done, his provisional governments should be maintained till time shall have operated desirable changes in the people, black and white, over whom they are set.

In response to the numerous daily applications for the first number of The Nation, we are obliged to announce that the whole of our large edition of the first two numbers is entirely exhausted. We had underestimated the probable demand for them. Subscriptions must hereafter commence with the current issue of the date at which they are received.

Mr. John Van Buren, in his letter to the Tammany Society, says that President Johnson "was no party to the meddling with State institutions and property that provoked, though it did not excuse, the rebellion." This slur on the Northern men who required, not the abolition of slavery, but that slavery should not be extended into free territory, comes with something more than a bad grace from a gentleman who figured prominently as an anti-slavery "agitator" half a dozen years before the repeal of the Missouri Compromise forced upon the country the formation of the Republican party. Mr. Van Buren was one of the ablest and most effective of the anti-slavery "agitators" of 1848, his father being then the Free Soil candidate for the Presidency, a position which he had assumed in order to prevent the election of Gen. Cass. How can a man of Mr. Van Buren's sense and knowledge repeat the charge, alike false and stale, that the rebellion was provoked by "meddling with State institutions and property?" He knows that there is not the slightest truth in this charge, and that the rebellion had as little provocation as excuse in such "meddling." If the charge were true, we know of no man who would be more guilty under it than himself, and that under circumstances very different from those which began to exhibit themselves in 1854. The encroachments of slaveholders in 1848 were trifling in comparison with what they were six years later; and yet Mr. Van Buren assailed the slaveholders fiercely in '48, while in '54 and afterwards he was their obsequious servant.

The acquittal of Miss Harris is being commented on a good deal as an illustration of the unreasonable deference with which women are treated in America. We believe, on the contrary, that it is simply another illustration of the barbarous state of public opinion with regard to a certain class of offences. There is nothing more astonishing or alarming about the acquittal of Miss Harris than about that of Sickles, or of a dozen others who have come before Washington courts charged with taking the law into their own hands. If Miss Harris's brother had done what she did, we should probably have witnessed the same performance in court, the same tomfoolery on the part of the bar, and placid impotence on the part of the bench, and savage exultation on the part of the audience. The public in Washington, or at least that portion of it which attends criminal trials and sits as jurors, is clearly in a lower stage of civilization than the law presumes it to be—a phenomenon often witnessed too in other places. The evil resulting from this state of things is, however, generally corrected by the traditional respect of lawyers and judges for the code they administer and for the traditions of their profession, checks which do not seem to exist in Washington. The enthusiastic counsellor who kissed the prisoner could hardly have taken a better way of exhibiting the contempt of a savage nature for musty precedents. The fuss about Miss Harris was created not so much by the fact that she was an injured woman, but that she had committed one of those murders which have in that part of the country always given the perpetrators a sort of claim upon popular affection.

Time was when, according to the insolent chief of the Confederacy, his Northern antagonists were only so many "hyenas." The Richmond Bulletin now speaks of "the lions who brought the South to bay." But this improvement is adopted to obtain a climax for certain "base and sneaking jackals," who are following "in flocks to do their congenial work." These are the correspondents of the Northern press. "They came," adds the Bulletin naïvely, "as soon as they could come in safety." They have no sympathy for misfortune. They refuse to see any merit in the people of the section to which they swarm. They "hunt for the dead to dishonor them, and for the wounded to tear and lacerate them." Their writings disgust and sicken "the Southern editor, whose business it is to look over his exchanges." We pity this unfortunate, but see no remedy—except in quitting his business.

An unfortunate "journalist," named J. M. Collins, came before the Bankruptcy Court in London the other day, and stated in reply to the enquiry, What expectations he had of paying his debts when he contracted them? that the "Southern Independence Association" had employed him as secretary at a salary of £300 a year, of which he never received a farthing. "Expectations of a more definite character" were held out to him. Revelations of this sort give one an idea of the nature of the process by which "the animal sympathy," as we have heard it called, of Englishmen with the South was roused.

The London Index has gone down to the grave of the Confederacy. Its latest pointings were as perverse as ever, but its skinny finger alarmed nobody. It might have been expected to await the fate of Jefferson Davis before suspending itself, but its means were probably not equal to its devotion. Yet what capital it might have made out of the punishment of the ex-President!

Gen. Howard directs his assistant commissioners to make monthly reports of the number of freedmen and refugees under their charge, in colonies, camps, depots, and hospitals, and full statistics of the support they receive, if any, in the way of clothing and rations, also reports of the land in their possession, and whether it was confiscated or abandoned, with descriptions of each separate piece or tract and the former owner's name. A monthly account will be rendered of the changes which may befal this property, either by acquisition or surrender. The number of schools, scholars, and teachers is another subject for reports; and, lastly, a roster of all officers and civilians employed as sub-assistant commissioners, staff officers, or agents. Mr. T. W. Conway, the assistant commissioner for Louisiana, has received from the Treasury Department eighty plantations liable to confiscation, embracing some of the finest sugar estates. He is said to have been instructed to divide them into forty-acre lots for freedmen and poor whites. Still others await a similar fate in districts newly occupied.

The Earl of Winchilsea and Nottingham was lately guilty of smoking in a railway carriage of the South Western Railway, and was summoned for the offence, on the application of a station-master, before a magistrate. The outraged nobleman demands of the chairman of the company the dismissal of this faithful official for a "piece of impudence which involves a breach of the privileges of the House of Lords." This is a novel extension of the rights of the peerage.

Mr. Seward's reply to Earl Russell's withdrawal of belligerent rights from the Southern cruisers has appeared, and is sharp, though one would hardly say unnecessarily so. His renewed adhesion to the doctrine that the concession of these rights to the South by European powers was at any time "either necessary or just, or sanctioned by the law of nations," is, considering everything, singular; but his protest against the joint action of France and England in this matter, and against Earl Russell's extraordinary determination to give the rebel cruisers the benefit of the twenty-four hours rule, after, according to his own admission, they had ceased to have either a flag or a government, might have been even stronger. A Confederate cruiser entering a British port, after the overthrow of the rebel government, was to all intents and purposes a pirate, and to allow him to run out again, and refuse to allow a United States cruiser to follow him immediately, would be neither more nor less than giving him another chance to commit depredations on the high seas, for which all shadow of justification or excuse had disappeared. Lord Russell has in his time blundered into several odd positions, owing to his clumsy way of striving after a show of fairness, but in this instance he outdid himself.

Commencement Week at Harvard College possessed unusual interest this year. At the exercises of the graduating class on the 19th, five major-generals were present, besides brigadiers; and Maj.-Gen. Meade was made an LL.D. at the close. On Friday, the 21st, there was a commemoration of the heroes whom the College had sent out to battle and to death. Of the former there were 495, of the latter 96, embracing classes from 1823 to 1865 inclusive. A large proportion of the survivors were in attendance. The alumni, at their meeting, were divided upon the expediency of combining their proposed new hall with a memorial to the Harvard dead. The feeling that there ought to be a separate monument of some sort was strong enough to cause the whole matter to be referred to a committee of fifty. Another committee was appointed to prepare a biography of the departed. The necrology for the academic year just elapsed includes fifty-four names, of which seventeen fell in the Union, and one in the rebel, cause. The most distinguished names on the list are Edward Everett and George P. Bond, the astronomer.

"Our Washington Correspondent" has this week enjoyed the satisfaction of cooking up a story of Mr. Stanton's having refused to allow Mrs. Surratt the attendance of a clergyman in her last hours, and, as is often the case, this delectable morsel has furnished a text for fierce denunciations to the opposition press. Of course there is not a word of truth in it. A collection of the Washington fabrications which during the last four years have set editorial pens in motion, and then been exposed, would furnish a valuable contribution to the history of the war.

A French newspaper, La Gironde, having received two "warnings" within four days, the Journal des Débats is induced to remark that "the least timorous journalist will find this food for full and serious reflection."

An offence for which we believe no parallel is to be found in the Causes Célébres has just been committed in Sweden. A pastor named Lindbach confesses to having poisoned three persons in administering the communion to them, and the only reason he assigns for his act is to rid the parish of the burden of supporting them. They were paupers.

An odd illustration of the contempt of different "schools" of art for each other was revealed the other day in Paris. A gentleman bought a picture at one of the well known sales in the Rue Drouot, thought the canvass looked very old, and set a "restorer" to work on it, who speedily revealed beneath the outside painting a fine Belisarius, in the David style. The spirits of wine, however, damaged the Belisarius a little, and led them to pursue their researches further, and more scratching revealed a magnificent Leda and the Swan, which is pronounced to be Boucher's.

John Stuart Mill has made his first appearance before the electors of Westminster. He made a sensible, and, in some places, a weighty speech, and was well received. He corrected Gladstone's definition of Liberalism "as trust in the people limited only by prudence, and Toryism, a distrust of the people limited only by fear," by saying that a "Liberal was one who looked forward for his principles of government, the Tory one who looked backward for his." We are glad he has been elected, as also Thomas Hughes.

It is gratifying to learn that Messrs. Olmsted and Vaux have been reappointed landscape architects to the Central Park, a spot which bears perpetual testimony to their high professional ability. They are to advise and report upon their architectural studies prior to their adoption.

The advocates of temperance legislation in Massachusetts, failing to obtain the execution of the Maine Law in Boston, and equally failing to establish a Metropolitan Police, resorted more hopefully to a constable of the Commonwealth, who has just advised by circular the retail liquor-dealers of the capital that their sales are illegal, and that they will escape prosecution only by immediate discontinuance. The notice has resulted in numerous promises of compliance.

An advocate in Pesth (Hungary) has devised a plan of pushing his business which, strange to say, has never occurred to any of our enterprising lawyers here. He got tired of waiting for clients in his office, so he visits the different quarters of the city in a four-wheeled covered wagon, like those of the itinerant photographers.

Electric cables are still a prominent topic. That which was laid so heroically in the slime of the Persian Gulf, and completed the telegraphic communication between Europe and India, has given out. Mr. T. P. Schaffner stakes his reputation that a similar mishap will overtake the Atlantic cable before it has been long in use. As the day draws near for the consummation of the second laying, it is remembered that the cable between Newfoundland and the main land has been out of order since June last. A proper vessel being needed in order to repair it, Mr. Leonard W. Jerome, of this city, tendered his steam-yacht for that purpose, and his offer has been accepted. A cable in the northward creeping Russian telegraph has been successfully submerged in Frazer River, and another is on its way to Behring's Straits.

To settle the conflicting claims to the sovereignty of Schleswig-Holstein, the Crown of Prussia appointed a committee of Syndics. They report, after diligent research, that no right exists in the Prince of Augustenburg or in the Grand-Duke of Oldenburg: as was to be expected. But—what was not to be expected—they equally deny the right of the House of Brandeburg itself, from which the enquiry set out. They adjudicate the legitimate title to Austria and Prussia conjoined, deriving it from the Treaty of Vienna, and from the cession of the territory to them by the King of Denmark. The treaty was extorted from Denmark by force of arms, and "before this," says the Paris Constitutionnel, "it is clear that the right to the duchies was duly vested in King Christian. It results, by the committee's own showing, that the recent war which had for its object the spoliation of the Danes, was abusive, unjust, and unjustifiable."

Efforts are being made in France to issue a loan on a great scale, to execute additional public works. The expenditure incurred for this purpose already is enormous, particularly in Paris, where it is now all but impossible for persons of moderate means to live within the municipal boundary—a state of things which we are rapidly approaching in New York. The advocates of the loan talk of "finishing France" in an artistic sense, which has called forth an admirable mot from M. Buffet in the Corps Legislatif. "Finish France! Let me tell you that this is a work which was begun ages ago; in which every generation since has taken part; but which no generation will ever accomplish."

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

REPUBLICS AND EQUALITY.

SOME supporters of liberal principles, in their anxiety to secure justice for colored people, rely upon an argument that will not bear examination. They argue that colored men should become voters in the conquered States, under that constitutional provision which guarantees to every State "a republican form of government." If there were no better argument than this in support of an act of justice, the colored race might bid farewell to all hope of becoming politically the equals of the whites. There is nothing in a republican polity that necessarily excludes slavery. That form of wrong and oppression has existed in almost every republic, and perhaps in some form it has existed in all republics. Athens was a republic, and approached much nearer to the democratic standard than any other great republic that ever has existed; and slavery was prominent among Athenian institutions. The Roman republic has a great name, as for centuries it had a great place; and slavery was known in it on a scale that would have startled even Carolinians, could they see it—for a Roman dealer in men would have kidnapped and sold a Carolina gentleman as readily as he would have stolen an African woman for the market of the Balearic Islands. Florence was a republic, and we know that slavery existed there. Venice was a republic, and existed as such down to a date within living memory; and the Venetians held slaves, bought slaves, sold slaves, and made not a little money by their disregard of human rights. Holland was a republic, and her republican career is held to constitute one of the most splendid portions of human history; and not only was Holland a slaveholding country, but she was darkly distinguished for the lead that she took in the slave trade—and to her belongs the dishonor of having introduced slavery into the old territory of the United States. England had a republican polity in the latter days of the Long Parliament, and under Cromwell's rule; and slavery then existed in her colonies, and she sold prisoners of war into bondage. Our country certainly was a republic during almost eighty-five years before the beginning of the secession war; and slavery was one of its most conspicuous institutions; and the African slave trade was not made to cease here until more than thirty years after the Declaration of Independence. Instances of the kind might be multiplied very easily, but it is not necessary to cite them, it being evident that if the existence of slavery in a country proves it not to be a republic, there has never been such a thing as a republic of any note on the face of the earth. The crime of slaveholding has been as common with the most cultivated of republicans as ever it was with the coarsest of the corsairs of Barbary. It is as incorrect to assume that a republican polity necessarily excludes slavery as it would be to assume that a monarchical polity necessarily includes slavery, an assumption that would be negatived at once by reference to France and England, which are monarchically governed, though the English polity differs in almost all respects from that of France. The action of the Czar of Russia shows that it is possible for even a despot to be a more effective enemy of slavery than most eminent republicans have been.

The men who made the Constitution of the United States, and the people who ratified that Constitution, knew what they were about, and they provided that every State should have a republican government in the same instrument in which they recognized the existence of slavery. Were they not republicans? If they were not republicans, what were they? And if they were republicans, what has happened to make a change in the meaning of words? We have no right, because we have conquered the slaveholders, to give a new meaning to an old word, which is the property of others as well as of ourselves, which we hold in common with many other peoples. Suppose that Cuba should become a nation, and should adopt a republican form of government, retaining slavery among her institutions; should we refuse to recognize her because she had insisted upon keeping her colored population in bondage? We might do so on moral grounds, and our action would be defensible; but we could not do so with reason on the ground that her course was contrary to republicanism. She would pointedly cite our own history against us, and other countries would say she was right.

The cause of human rights stands in no need of historical perversion, and did it need it, such perversion would be inadmissible. We are bound to complete the great work of abolishing slavery, and to elevate the colored people to the condition of equality before the law, by higher considerations than are derivable from any interpretations that can be made of this or that clause of the Federal Constitution. We are bound to proceed in the course which we were forced to adopt, by a sense of justice, and we should be so bound were our polity strictly monarchical, instead of being, as it is, strictly republican. Slavery being utterly wrong, and without any redeeming characteristic, it follows that all that proceeds from it is wrong, and should be removed. We have, through success in war, and in that way alone, obtained the power to abolish slavery; and through the further exercise of that power we should proceed to the completion of work which cannot be passed over without peril to the republic. Colored people were excluded from the enjoyment of political rights because they were slaves, or because they belonged to a race that furnished slaves. We should make root-and-branch work with the prejudices that flowed from slavery, as we have agreed to do with slavery itself. The dawn of a better day, apparently, has begun. To stop now is as wise as it would be to say that dawn should not be followed by sunrise. The action required of us is morally dictated, it is something above mere politics. There is an abundance of political reasons why we should be just to the colored race; but even if we could suppose them not to exist—were it possible to separate sound policy from good morals—we should be bound to elevate the freedmen to equality with ourselves. Humanity dictates that freedmen should become free men, that between them and the rest of the population of the country there should be no political distinction allowed to exist. We are pledged to their elevation by solemn compact. The emancipation proclamation did thus pledge us. It is impossible honorably to escape from this. When President Lincoln pledged himself, as the nation's head, to abolish slavery as an act of war, did not that pledge carry with it the additional pledge to place those who should be unchained in the state of human beings? Thus do we interpret the proclamation, because we hold that it never could have been intended that four millions of human beings should be left without any regular or recognized place in a country where men who are denied the enjoyment of political rights are denied everything that belongs to manhood. The national faith is plighted to the continuance of a policy that was adopted at a dark hour of the war, and which cannot now, in the time of triumph, be departed from, or interrupted, without bringing dishonor upon us as a people. We cannot honestly repudiate our promise to a people who furnished us 150,000 fighting men, and who are entitled to share in that which has been, in part at least, preserved by their valor and their labors. As honestly could we repudiate our promise to pay our creditors. The republican argument is worthless, for republicans have often supported slavery, and sometimes they have disregarded their plighted faith; but the argument that is based on justice, humanity, religion, and common sense and sound policy, is irresistible—and that listened to, and acted upon, would soon decide the greatest and gravest question that now troubles the American people.

There is very little use, in our opinion, in trying to get out of our present difficulties by legal quibbling such as disfigured much of the Republican agitation before the war, attempts to put upon particular words or phrases of the Constitution, such as "persons held to service," a sense not only non-natural but refuted by abundant historical testimony. All this was part of that excessive worship of the letter of the organic law which at last ended in making the most tremendous moral and political evil seem in the eyes of a large portion of the nation a very small matter compared to even the most trifling apparent violation of constitutional provisions. We do not mean to say that this reverence for the letter did not do good service and has not rendered essential aid in enabling the nation to bear the tremendous strain which has just been imposed on its organization. But our course, ever since Mr. Lincoln issued his emancipation proclamation, has been based on a very different principle from that on which the Republican agitation was conducted. He decided that the Government was warranted by the spirit of the Constitution—whatever the letter might say—to do whatever was necessary to save the national life, and the country has abundantly confirmed his decision. We have just reached by a slow and painful, but very sure, process the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary to the safety of the Union that not only should the form of government in all the States be "republican," in the sense in which that term was understood at the time of the Revolution, but the form of social organization must be democratic. Now President Johnson has just as much right, under the construction of his constitutional powers which has recently prevailed, to take such precautions as may seem to him necessary to secure this result as to secure the abolition of slavery. We cannot find in the Constitution any express warrant for destroying the institution of slavery any more than for his making all men equal before the law. But if the one power may be deduced, as it has been, from the necessity of the case, certainly so may the other.

We ask him now to take care that the new society at the South shall not be reorganized in such fashion that a man may be excluded from civil rights for the ridiculous reason that his skin is of a particular hue, not because any provision of the Constitution can be twisted into a prohibition of such a qualification, but because he has the power to prevent it, because the national safety requires that he should exercise this power, and because his failure to exercise it will tend to the establishment of class government at the South, which, as the experience of all ages and nations has proved, is the form of all others most hostile to real liberty and real progress, most subversive of human rights, and most productive of agitation, violence, and internal dissension. And we in America find an additional reason for asking it in decent regard for our own reputation. As long as any such distinction is covered or sanctioned by the national laws, we make ourselves a laughing-stock every time we undertake to preach democratic principles to the rest of mankind.

THE SLAVE IN THE CHARIOT.

When the victorious Roman general rode in triumph to the Capitol, as he stood in his ivory car, crowned with laurel, and decked in purple and gold, listening to the Io Triumphes of his proud soldiery and exultant fellow-citizens, an Æthiop was behind him in the chariot. Not for the purposes of an ordinary domestic attendant, not as a mere appendage of luxury. Contemporary commentators agreed that the slave's presence suggested an admonition to the imperator's pride, though it was a Christian father who first gave definite expression to the warning, and put into the servant's mouth the words, "Remember that thou art mortal!"

And we are holding our triumph; the triumph not of an individual but of a whole nation; the greatest triumph that the world ever saw. We have (reverently be it spoken) led captivity captive; we drag in our victorious train a host of treasons and shams and abuses, cast down from their pride of place. Do not we too need a slave in our chariot?

The danger that our victory may intoxicate us lies not so much in its completeness—though that alone would be sufficient cause of much exultation—as in the fact of its being carried out amid almost universal incredulity and very general derision. It would be difficult, indeed, to produce a case where so full a success was so little expected by those outside of the struggle. We have no trustworthy means of getting at the world's public opinion in mediæval, still less in ancient times, nor would it matter much if we could, for mutual ignorance and want of communication made international opinions then of small value. In modern times we find no parallel. The nearest approach to so general a mistake is that made about Napoleon, when he had apparently swallowed the whole European continent, and men expected every day that he would dispose of the island which alone resisted him. But the anticipations of his final victory were less due to sympathy than to fear. Not so the comparatively calm judgment of the Old World against us. While our foes derided our attempts to subjugate "the nation which Davis had created," our friends admitted that the war must sooner or later become one "for boundary;" that we might check the progress of slavery, but could not reconquer all the revolted States. Even at home the bulk of our wealth and learning was not very hopeful, for in truth, as a mere matter of reason, the chances seemed against us. Meanwhile the mass of the people, with a grand instinct of self-preservation, went on, blundering as they went, but still advancing. Homer compares one of his heroes on the battle-field to an ass, and the wise men of Europe regarded the persistence of the American people as an exhibition of donkeyism on the largest scale. Suddenly the forces of treason crumble away, in a night as it were, and the republic stands triumphant at every point. The sayings of the schools are convicted of miserable inadequacy. "Democracies are the most patriotic; aristocracies the wisest; autocracies the strongest"—so ran the formula. But our democracy has shown itself by success to be wiser than the aristocrats abroad, who swore it could never succeed, and the aristocrats at home, who thought to conquer it; it has shown strength at least equal to that of any absolute monarch. The one great anti-democratic influence in the country is overthrown by a purely popular movement. Slavery and treason have fallen together, because the people resolved to put really in practice the theory of their Government. A similar success on the part of an individual would be apt to inspire him with inordinate confidence. If, for instance, he had persevered in a lawsuit not only contrary to the wishes and advice of his neighbors, but with small encouragement from his own counsel, he would naturally feel conceited, especially if it was won through some peculiar plan of his own. And is a whole nation more impervious to the seductions of victory? Are we not tempted to go forth in the belief that our star can never again be dimmed, that democracy is impeccable, infallible, invincible?

Of one thing we may be certain, that there will be no want of flatterers to tell us as much. Sensation editors, who have grown rich on every wickedness and weakness of public or private development; place-hunting politicians, who turned at the eleventh hour and would now hunt the master as eagerly as they once hunted down the slave—these and others will cry out—will? they have already begun to cry out—that we are to terrify and instruct the world, that we have inaugurated new rules of government, of finance, perhaps of human nature. Now then is the time for the slave in the chariot to speak.

It is but four years since an imposing and overwhelming majority of the American people placed in the Presidential chair a puppet, a man of straw, behind whom the chief traitor, occupying exactly the place that gave him best opportunity to work out his plans, filled the garrison with his cohorts, undermined the citadel, and laid the train. And all this was done for the sake of the Union! When all the Northern States but two voted for Franklin Pierce, they did so in the full conviction that to vote for the man who made Jefferson Davis his Secretary of War was the only way by which the Union could be preserved. Might not the European here exclaim, that the old rule was true after all? Where was the wisdom of our democracy then? But this can never happen again. We have got rid of the sole anomaly, the only disturbing force. No such "peculiar institution" can be founded again; no "chivalry" of such a caste can ever spring up among us. The objection is plausible. We have so long been met and hampered at every turn by slavery, have so long been accustomed to regard the negro question as the one melancholy obstacle in the way of a political millenium, that with it all other ills seem to vanish. But let us consider more closely whether some elements of peril are not still left.

For instance, there is the Church of Rome, which, having small taste for religious controversy, we prefer to regard merely as a political body. Is there nothing in its tenets, as recently promulgated with authority by its acknowledged head, which if practically carried out would assail our civil liberties? Have not its aggressions once already provoked a movement which, thinly disguised as a crusade against foreigners, threatened to set the country on fire, and only yielded then to that great dragon of slavery which swallowed up all the smaller serpents?

Are we in no possible peril from the portentous, irresponsible power of moneyed corporations, which in its secret workings has been known to buy up whole legislatures and corrupt the political honesty of whole States? Is there no danger that the spirit which dictates the temperance legislation may lead to less defensible interferences with individual liberty by the majority?

Is there no danger that, with our notorious tendency to extremes, we may, in our well-founded dread of "State Sovereignty," rush into the opposite error of over-centralization, and place too much power at Washington, where before there was apt to be too little? Will it be said that these are imaginary perils? So people spoke of the slave power's encroachments; and when we recollect how, less than ten years ago, leading politicians declared that slavery was but an abstract question, we would not hastily despise or ridicule the man who hinted at danger from the Mormons.

It may still be objected, however, that none of these sources of uneasiness can be placed on a level with slavery, because none of them involves the institution of an aristocratic caste. What of that? All the experience of history goes to show that an accidental plutocracy may be one of the worst of tyrannies. Indeed, the slave-holding power itself more nearly resembled a plutocracy, or what the Greek writers called an oligarchy, than an aristocracy proper.

Thus far we have opened up only one branch of our subject. Direct dangers to liberty naturally occupy our first fears, but there are other grave mischiefs and obstacles to good government which demand our forethought. Of all our popular tendencies, that which most excited the criticism of foreigners and the apprehension of our best citizens was the idea that our governmental machine was able to run of itself, and required no men of distinguished ability to conduct it. So general was this belief, and so practically had it been carried out in our politics, that when, at last, we stumbled upon a great man in Abraham Lincoln, we positively did not know him to be such, and but for the startling termination of his career might never have fully appreciated him to this day.

The war, indeed, among its valuable lessons, has shown the worse than uselessness of popular mediocrity in military affairs. Yet, blindly enough, our journalists persist in treating this great fact as if it were an exception to, not an illustration of, a rule; and though no valid reason can be assigned why special ability and training should not be as requisite in a civil as in a military officer, they arbitrarily place the two on a totally different footing.

For any one who has observed how this miserable mediocrity-worship gradually upset our public character till it earned a place in the trinity of political error along with slavery and State sovereignty, it is hard to possess his soul in patience long enough to argue calmly with those who would still make of this fatal weakness a high and holy republican virtue. It deprives the country of the services of many of its valuable citizens. It renders whole classes of educated and able men lukewarm in their patriotism, so that some terrible crisis is needed to awaken their latent devotion. It gives our enemies abroad a real argument against our institutions, which our friends abroad cannot gainsay. Lastly, it opens a door to conspiracy, and affords a constant temptation to the disaffected. Why did the first essays of treason in the old nullification times fall flat? Because, when Jackson, Clay, and Webster united in opposition to any scheme, there was no more help or hope for it. Even under Van Buren sedition walked delicately and only exhibited itself hypothetically in fancy novels. It was the nullity of the political world that chiefly encouraged Davis to work out his audacious plan. In ignorance of the great man that God was slowly and secretly raising up for us, in full knowledge of the littleness that occupied the chief seats in the land, he trusted to scatter the people as sheep without a shepherd.

After the dangers enumerated, it may seem as if to dwell on any others must be an anti-climax and a descent into the bathos. Yet there are some errors, small in comparison, but positively important in themselves, into which the blunders of foreigners and our superior wisdom on the one great question of our national existence are likely to lead us.

It is a common and natural instance of hasty and imperfect generalization to conclude that those who are in error about some important matter in dispute between us and them, must therefore be wrong in everything, so that their adoption or approval of any opinion or practice is its necessary condemnation. The reductio ad absurdum is obvious enough when we bring down the principle to the ordinary incidents of life; when we ask, for example, if it is wrong to wear a shirt because the editor of the London Times wears one, or to eat our dinners because Messrs. Laird and Lindsay eat theirs; yet there is a tendency to apply it just as irrelevantly. Thus, because all civilized nations have a certain standard of polite manners, self-respect, and personal honor, it is often implied, and more than implied, that social politeness is debasing to a freeman, and refusing to associate with dishonest, untruthful, or otherwise disreputable characters is aristocratic exclusiveness. Sometimes this dread of foreign opinion actually leads us to adopt the exploded errors of foreigners because these are now in opposition to their more enlightened views. A passive ignorance, nay, an active ignoring of the fundamental principles of political economy, is coming to be deemed the duty of true republican citizens. Not many months ago there was heralded with great flourish of brass a plan for paying off our national debt by private subscription. Some approved and some disapproved, but no one suggested the obvious "settler" that the idea was as old as the hills or the English debt, and that any standard foreign work on political economy mentioned it, with its refutation, as part of the history of the science.

And now, what is the practical conclusion from all these warnings? That we are to make ourselves miserable over the future? Heaven forbid! We ought to be proud of our success, and rejoice over it. If we did not—if pecuniary troubles, or the loss of dear friends, or that national loss of our greatest martyr, could quell our joy, it might well be feared that the spirit of the nation had been permanently broken by the dangers through which it had passed, as a man's hair is whitened or his mind enfeebled by a night of imminent peril. Therefore it is almost a Christian duty that the whole people should "rollick" to some extent. We would not be particular about a little good-humored brag. We would chaff our foreign ill-wishers to any amount. If that mythical "institution" of our boyhood, the leather medal, be not altogether a myth—if the secret of its composition be not lost along with that of the wooden nutmeg and other traditional manufactures, we would order a large supply of these coriaceous tokens and ship them to all our friends over the water. The slave did not bid the general descend from his triumphal car and go home in sackcloth and ashes. He only reminded him of his mortality. And this is what we are to remember. It is the prince of the powers of the air who tells us that we shall be like gods, knowing good and evil. We must remember that our Government, though the best, is not free from all imperfection or secure from all danger—that the voice of the people, while far above that of princes and potentates, is far below that of God. With this wholesome distrust in ourselves, we shall be more likely to fulfil the duties which yet lie before us, whether to the ignorant freedman who has walked in darkness till the daylight blinds him, to the scarcely less ignorant foreigner who falls out of the emigrant ship into the net of the demagogue, to the deluded poor white of the South, so long fed on poison by his treacherous rulers, or to the collective nations of the civilized world, who now look to us, the recognized equal of their proudest, for lessons of liberty without license and energy tempered by wisdom.

THE CRISIS IN AUSTRIA.

The fall of the Schmerling Ministry in Vienna commenced a new phase in the history of the reign of Francis Joseph. In order to explain and to point out the political importance of that event, we propose to present to our readers a connected sketch of the changes and developments that preceded it.

It was for the purpose of a speedy return to the old Austrian absolutism, overthrown by the revolutionary tempests of Feb., 1848, that the Emperor Ferdinand was persuaded to abdicate his crown in favor of the youthful son of the Archduchess Sophia, who was proclaimed monarch in a fortress, without the consent of the national assemblies of the empire and without the sanction of a solemn coronation. The new reign was not to become a reign of concession, legal restoration, and revived confidence, but of more than reconquered power and unlimited sway. The chartered rights of Hungary, so often sworn to and so often trampled under foot, were now finally and definitely to be put out of the way of the Hapsburg dynasty, and that country, as soon as subdued, to be treated as a conquered province. The long fomented hostility of rival nationalities and the armies of Russia were used to subdue it, and the gallows and the dungeon to reduce it to silence; its constitution, as old as that of England, was declared annulled; and its territories, formerly connected with Austria only by the ties of a personal dynastic union, were merged into the body of a centralized empire, endowed—for a time—with one improvised constitution.

The universal triumph of reaction soon freed the new reign of the necessity of wearing a constitutional mask. The improvised charter was broken without ceremony, and Bach and Schwarzenberg led the domestic and foreign affairs of the empire in a spirit which made the rule of Metternich appear mild and pure. Jesuitism and tyranny in the interior, effrontery and aggression abroad, were the leading features of the new policy, and, for a time, it seemed to be successful. But this was a delusion. Hungary and Italy writhed under the heels of military rulers, but did not abandon their hopes of resurrection. The armies of Austria helped to betray and subjugate Schleswig-Holstein, by dint of threatening humiliated Prussia, and, on the banks of the lower Danube, seemed to hold the balance of power between Russia and the allies in the Crimean war; but by all this the empire gained nothing, and its bankruptcy became aggravated. Austria, which represents no nationality, and is a negation of many that either have lived or aspire to life and unity—the Hungarian, the Polish, the Italian, the German, etc.—was animated by no spirit capable of preserving an empire, the spirit of allegiance to the imperial house having long ceased to be effective, and in great part been replaced by a sentiment of detestation. Napoleon III. proved it to the world and to Francis Joseph himself, by the Italian campaign of 1859. Had both antagonists persisted in fighting it out, Austria would probably have crumbled to pieces. The peace of Villafranca saved its existence, but Lombardy was lost—the false prestige was gone.

For ten years Hungary had been silent; the Italian shock was sufficient to recall it to political life and activity. The whole country was soon in a ferment. The suicide of a great patriot, Count Széchenyi, a victim of persecution, added to the fuel. The court of Vienna, humbled and penniless, besides having alienated by ingratitude the friendship of Russia, dared no more to resort to the gallows as a means of coercion. It yielded, let Bach and despotism slip, and resumed the old mask of constitutionalism, to which was added the hypocrisy of conciliation in regard to Hungary. A new constitution was concocted for the whole empire; almost each province received, besides, a separate diet. That of Hungary was convened in the spring of 1861, the autonomy of the country being in the main restored. But it soon became evident that the Hungarian Diet could not be persuaded to abandon its firm footing on the time-hallowed ground of the old national constitution in order to share in a new machinery of state, which it feared might either break down or be thrown away after some experimenting, like the sham constitutional instruments that preceded it. Every member of the Diet clung to the national charter and to the laws of 1848; but the declaration of independence, of the following year, was given up as unconstitutional. The grievances pointedly presented by the Diet were numerous, and their immediate removal was made the absolute condition of its consent to the coronation of Francis Joseph as King of Hungary, without which he was regarded as a mere usurper. The resolution itself to send an address to the Emperor, as an initiatory measure to the constitutional settlement, could be carried by the distinguished statesman and orator, Francis Deák, only after an animated and brilliant contest, and only after the death, by a mysterious suicide, of the equally distinguished leader of the radical party, Count Ladislas Teleky. The plottings, on the other hand, of the new Austrian cabinet to neutralize the opposition of Hungary, by renewing and fostering the old antagonism between the Magyar and Slavic populations of that country, became no less apparent. The dream of conciliation soon vanished.

The Hungarian Diet was finally dissolved without anything decisive having been achieved. Francis Joseph remained uncrowned. The constitutional game, however, was continued in Vienna. The Reichsrath, though without members from Hungary, Croatia, and other parts of the empire, was made to legislate for the whole of it. The new constitution was not much more strictly observed than others had been; and the general aspect of affairs was indeed lugubriously ridiculous. Ministers fell and rose without changing it. The tendency of the government became more and more avowedly one of centralization, which implied the denial of the claims of the Hungarians, the champion of this policy and the principal mover of the imperial machine in the interior being Minister Von Schmerling. This policy was supported in the Reichsrath by German members of conservative as well as liberal opinion. The opposition of the Poles and Bohemians, who formed the nucleus of a federal party, was treated with insulting disregard.

Abroad, too, the government of Francis Joseph seemed to have recovered from its fright and prostration, and slowly to return to the impudent line of action pursued by Schwarzenberg. The feigned constitutionalism itself was used as a means of weakening in Germany the influence of Prussia, which at the same time became more and more reactionary. The Schleswig-Holstein imbroglio was again made the occasion of displaying the banners of Austria on the northern confines of the Germanic Confederation; and a successful campaign north of the Eider was expected to make some people of short memory forget the shame of Magenta and Solferino. The "boundless ingratitude" of 1854–5 towards Russia was repeated in 1863–4 on occasion of the Polish insurrection; but the Poles were soon betrayed in their turn, and with equal shamelessness. Reaction being triumphant everywhere, things went on rather smoothly—to a certain point.

This fatal point was—the finances. Intrigues within and ostentation abroad are expensive; financial exhaustion is a progressive disease; and merciless taxation, including forced loans, a rather dangerous remedy. Hungary would yield its rich resources only to force, which paralyzed instead of developing them as a source of wealth to the people and government. It became, from day to day, poorer, without becoming sufficiently subdued to abandon its rights, though a desire for a change was generally manifested. Italy ceased not to be threatening; the Paris Convention of September 15, 1864, increased the fears, and with them, no doubt, the expenses, of the empire. The Prussian Minister, Bismarck, too, seemed too well to understand the exhausted condition of Austria to allow himself to be deterred by its threats from snatching a part, at least, of the Schleswig-Holstein booty, without granting a share or a compensation to his Austrian ally.

In the early part of this year the facts could hardly be disguised any more, that the financial condition of the empire could not be remedied by the Reichsrath, that Hungary was by no means to be coaxed into national suicide, and that the whole constitutional machinery was pretty much exploded. A new breath of freedom seemed at the same time to stir all over the Continent, owing in part to the closely-watched triumphal march of republican freedom on this side of the Atlantic, and in part to a natural reaction on the part of the liberals following a lengthened depression. To conciliate Hungary became a necessity for Austria which almost everybody commenced realizing. The federal or dualistic party grew bolder in its opposition as it saw its time approaching; the liberal elements of the Reichsrath, in general, made vehement attacks on the ministry, the dilapidated condition of the finances serving as the principal pretext.

We know little of what passed at the court while these last developments took place—what was the personal inclination of Francis Joseph; what the influence of his mother upon his counsels; what the advice of the favored prelates, or of the high nobility. Be all this as it may, he determined once more to make advances to the Hungarians, and, after examining the ground, last month personally appeared in Pesth, in Hungarian military costume, and with gracious assurances of affection and loyalty on his lips. His reception, official and officious descriptions say, was highly enthusiastic. Deák himself did not refuse to appear at the imperial table, to which he and some other liberals were invited among many prominent conservatives. The approach, as far as we can judge from a distance, was on both sides cautious and guarded. Every observer must have felt that one party was going to be cheated, Hungary by design, or Austria by events. Kossuth, from his place of refuge in Italy, warns Hungary. Austria has but a choice of perils. It has tried the Reichsrath for the whole empire, and failed; it may now try the dualism of a Reichsrath for the non-Hungarian provinces, and a diet at Pesth for the crown lands of Hungary, with, perhaps, a mixed commission for the control of financial and military affairs.

That it is going to try this last experiment, the late news from Europe informs us. Schmerling and his centralizing associates have been dismissed, and with them the Archduke Rainer and various other high dignitaries, these being partly replaced by conservative friends of the old Hungarian constitution. The ministerial crisis lasted for a number of days. It is now probably over. Not so the real Austrian crisis. It will require great measures, and great men to carry them through, to bridge over the chasm that separates Hungary from its so often perjured dynasty; to cement anew the heterogeneous parts of which the empire consists; to conciliate hostile nationalities, each of which tends towards a separate existence; in one word, to replace the centrifugal power that now works to rend Austria asunder by some central force of attraction, capable of producing homogeneity and preserving unity. Where should that force be found? Does Austria possess a man able to discover and apply it?

NATIONAL DUTY AND "HOLY RAGE."

We have surrendered, on another page, a larger portion of our space than we can well afford to a letter from Mr. Harney upon "Republican Propagandism," because it is a very good statement of the notions of national duty which have been long running through the heads of European radicals, and which form the basis of the indictments which they prefer every now and then against every country which professes sympathy with them which it does not display at the sword's point.

Mr. Harney's doctrine, that not only is every community bound to do whatever an individual is bound to do, but is bound in all cases to "shield the weak and smite the strong by its own right hand," is a very good example of the loose thinking which pervades so much of the European democratic declamation. It is impossible by any process deserving of the name of reasoning to reach the conclusion that the duties of a government and of an individual are in all cases the same. Government, especially a popular government, is simply a trustee, not only for the living minority but for unborn generations, so that it is not competent by any code of ethics to commit the cestui que trust to the making of sacrifices which are not of the clearest moral obligation or necessary to the preservation of the national existence. The propriety of beginning any war that is not an act of resistance to foreign aggression is one of the most awful questions that can be submitted to the human conscience, and no body of men calling themselves a government has a right to decide it in the affirmative except in cases of extraordinary clearness.

But "smiting the strong and shielding the weak" is not always a duty even of the individual. It is never a duty when your "smiting" and "shielding" would not only not help the weak but ensure your own destruction. A man is not bound to jump into the water to save a drowning friend if he cannot swim himself. A man is not bound to go out to quell a great riot single-handed. It would probably argue great heroism and great unselfishness were he to do either of these things, but no human being is bound to make utterly useless sacrifices, and still less is a nation. For either England or America, for instance, to undertake to liberate Poland or Hungary by force of arms, would be, because a foolish undertaking and certain to fail, a criminal one. They could not succeed, and the government which entered on the task would grossly abuse its trust. The confusion of Mr. Harney's own ideas on this subject is well illustrated by his talking of a man being "bound by an unnamed sentiment of mingled pity and indignation, sacred grief and holy rage," to do certain acts. Anybody who supposes that the presence of a "sentiment" in a man's bosom imposes on him an absolute obligation to follow a particular line of conduct, is hardly competent to direct the conscience of either nations or individuals.

We are far from thinking that the great Russian demonstration, made at the moment when Russia was "assimilating" Poland by a process of wholesale massacre, was marked by either good taste or good feeling, but it was not, as Mr. Harney seems to suppose, wholly inexcusable. Russia is not utterly detestable because her government is despotic. Her institutions are just as legitimate an expression of the national thought and feeling as our institutions are of ours, and just as suitable to her stage of culture, and there is no more inconsistency in a republic to which she has always shown great courtesy being on perfectly good terms with her, than there would be in Mr. Harney's spending a week with the Earl of Derby. The outburst of affection for her which took place here a year ago was, as everybody knew, in reality two-thirds a note of defiance to England, which would, under ordinary circumstances, have been palliated by the fact that this mode of administering a snub to third parties has been in use amongst civilized nations for ages. It was doubly excusable in this instance, owing to the morbid condition of the public mind, goaded as the country had been by three years of the most ribald abuse from all quarters which has, since the rise of the press and platform, ever been heaped on a Christian people.

We have noticed this matter at such length, however, not so much for the purpose of refuting what we conceive to be erroneous in Mr. Harney's opinions as for the purpose of enforcing with still greater emphasis the doctrine, that at present the only true, just, and justifiable means of propagating our political ideas and of helping the cause of popular government abroad, is to set an example of good government ourselves; to show that under our institutions men are happier, more intelligent, and more industrious, that life and property are more secure, that children are better educated, that human nature is held in higher respect, that justice is better administered, the weak, the helpless, and the criminal better treated, than under other systems of government. Armed crusades in defence of the holiest of causes, if it be not your own cause, are at best dangerous experiments. War leaves behind it a thousand evils, creates a thousand dangers, and may fail to attain its object after all; but the spectacle of a powerful government, created and upheld by the votes of a free people, existing only for the happiness and security of all, is something which strikes more terror into the soul of the "privileged classes" than a million of armed men, though every one of them was boiling over with that extraordinary emotional compound to which Mr. Harney ascribes so much virtue, "the unnamed sentiment of mingled pity and indignation, sacred grief and holy rage."

THE NEW EXODUS.

"Forsake this flowery garden," the frowning angel said;
"Its vines no more may feed thee;—compel from stones thy bread.
Pursue the veins deep buried, that hide thy wine and oil—
Fruit shalt thou find with sorrow, and children rear in toil."

Oh! not in heathen vengeance the wing'd apostle spoke,
Nor savage retribution the blooming fetters broke.
Man had an arm for labor, a strength to conquer pain;
A brain to plot and study, a will to serve and reign.

That will with slow arraying confronts itself with fate,
The pair unconscious twining the arches of the state.
Earth keeps her fairest garlands to crown the tireless shade,
The fields are white with harvest, the hirelings' fee is paid.

From tented field to city, to palace, and to throne,
Man builds with work his kingdom, and makes the world his own.
All welded with conditions is empire's golden ring,
The king must keep the peasant, the peasant feed the king.

The word of God once spoken, from truth is never lost.
The high command once given, earth guards with jealous cost.
By this perplexing lesson men build their busy schemes:
"The way of comfort lies not, kind Eden, thro' thy dreams."

I see a land before me where manhood in its pride
Forgot the solemn sentence, the wage of toil denied.
To wealth and lofty station some royal road must be;
Our brother, bound and plundered, shall earn us luxury.

One half of knowledge give him, for service and for skill,
The nobler half withholding, that moulds the manly will;
From justice bar his pleadings, from mercy hold his prayers;
His daughters for our pleasure, his sons to serve our heirs.

Again the frowning angel commandeth to depart,
With fiery scourge of terror, with want and woe of heart.
Go forth! the earth is weary to bear unrighteous feet;
Release your false possession, go, work that ye may eat.

Bring here the light of knowledge, the seat of equal rule,
Bring the republic's weapons, the forum and the school.
The Dagon of your worship is broken on his shrine,
The palm of Christian mercy brings in the true divine.

So from your Southern Eden the flaming sword doth drive;
Your lesson is appointed, go, learn how workmen thrive;
Not sloth has fee of plenty, nor pride of stately crest,
But thou of God belovèd, O labor crowned with rest!

A TRIP IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

COLUMBIA, S. C., July 6, 1865.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Not one among the marvellous events of the war seems to me more marvellous than the almost perfect tranquillity into which South Carolina has returned. I can hardly believe that in less than five months since Sherman passed through this place, literally with fire and sword—less than three months since Johnston's surrender—I should be here attending a Fourth of July celebration, and discussing State rights and slavery as calmly and safely as in New England. Surely this is not the defiant South, "ground down by the iron heel of despotism," that we have heard so much about. Here at Columbia, to be sure, and at Orangeburg, there are garrisons of troops; but in the forty miles between we saw no guards—only alternately squads of Confederate soldiers on their way home, and of New York soldiers marching northerly, to garrison the upper districts. I saw no signs of ill will on either side. Neither is there anything insincere and reluctant in this quiet. As a Southern lady said to me, "When they fought, they fought; and when they were done, they were done."

The railroad is running from Charleston to Orangeburg under the management of its proprietors, to whom it has been recently turned over by the military authorities. The country is flat, mostly wooded as far as Branchville; beyond that with some plantations, in which I saw a few excellent fields of corn—only two little patches of poor looking cotton. At Orangeburg, a pleasant village, built in the midst of the pine forest—the trees still left standing—we took an ambulance, and toiled over the sandy, hilly road forty miles to this place. It would seem too sandy a country to produce good crops, still the sun and copious rains of this climate make some amends for the poverty of the soil, and we saw here and there good fields of corn, a little cotton and upland rice, orchards of trees loaded with peaches and apples, and thrifty patches of vegetables. It is a poor, sparsely populated country, and so completely laid waste, first by Wheeler, then by Sherman, that dry corn-bread and coffee were all we were promised when we stopped to dine. Except for the soldiers, we might easily have imagined ourselves in some barren region of the North. There was hardly anything in the vegetation which one might not see there, and even the heat—if we were sheltered from the direct rays of the sun—was no hotter to bear than on a hot summer's day with us. Columbia, too, what is left of it, with its broad, well shaded streets, its pleasant wooden houses, and its fine view over the valley of the Congaree, is just a New England village. And they have had the good sense, as at Charleston, not to let its growth into a large city deprive them of their generous gardens about their houses.

I find an intelligent, self-reliant body of colored people here, and few signs of the jealousy between blacks and mulattoes which has done so much mischief at Charleston. I was just in time to attend a Fourth of July celebration, got up and managed entirely by them, and so well conducted that the Columbia Phœnix (edited by the well known author, Gilmore Simms) says of it: "The proceedings were conducted throughout in a most sedate and orderly manner. There was no rioting nor outlawry; the negroes were invariably civil and respectful in their deportment, behaving with marked propriety equally in house and highway. We have heard of neither strife, nor blasphemy, nor drunkenness." This is well deserved praise, and I will add that I have never met with a body of colored men whose views upon their new relation have appeared so just, temperate, and manly. They have been heretofore, both free and slave, under much stricter regulations here than at Charleston, in which place the free blacks had many privileges; and this has bound them together as a body, and taught them to rely upon themselves. At the same time, I observed no bitterness against the whites, as a class, such as exists at Charleston.

Columbia is a sad sight. Fully one-half its area, containing, as is estimated, two-thirds of the houses, was burned over, and there stand the melancholy walls and chimneys waiting for trade to revive. And this is not all, for in every direction for from twenty to forty miles railroads are torn up, and bridges burnt, so that the ruined city stands almost, like Tadmor, alone in a desert. Perhaps nothing but this desolation would have brought the war to an end so soon; but it was a sad necessity, and its execution was attended with many needless cruelties and much wanton destruction.

ORANGEBURG, July 9.

The citizens of Abbeville have just issued a manifesto—well written and dignified in tone—touching the inconveniences of the present order (or disorder) of things in that district. Abbeville lies outside of our military occupation, and, as they complain, is "without any form of government," and "depends upon irregular and voluntary organizations for the protection of persons and property." The manifesto declares that "the speedy and complete restoration of our relations to the Constitution of the United States and the Union are our unfeigned desire and the great want of our whole country. In view of these desirable ends, we pledge, in good faith, ready and unreserved submission and obedience to all lawful authority." It then proceeds to enumerate the various evils from which the community is suffering—the interruption of labor, the emigration of laborers, the devastation of the country, the want of a circulating medium, and the danger of a conflict of races, and ends with asking for the restoration of civil authority. The description is no doubt correct in every point, and yet it omits one thing—the terrorism and brutality exercised towards the blacks wherever our army has not gone, and which, no doubt, have been largely instrumental in driving them from their homes. I do not know that these exist in Abbeville, but it is certain that they did exist in a fearful degree here and at Columbia and Newberry, and that they have been completely stopped by the arrival of our troops. The demoralization of the laborers also, and the neglect of the crops, have been largely remedied, and the promise of the future is good. Indeed, the argument of the Abbeville manifesto is sound as regards the need of a government—fallacious, in asking that it should be a civil government. If the Legislature should "be allowed to hold its usual sessions," what guarantee have we against class legislation? It seems to me that nothing but military rule can, in the present disturbed and baffled state of the public mind, secure the administration of justice. These people must learn what justice is before they can take its exercise into their own hands.

Still, in one thing, this manifesto is a most gratifying sign of the times. Compare its frank utterance, and that of the resolutions passed at Anderson the other day, with the timid and reluctant expressions of loyalty in the Orangeburg, Columbia, and Summerville resolutions last month, and you have an indication of the progress made in that time towards a healthy popular sentiment, which it is hard to put trust in, and which yet, I am convinced, is not far from correct. A few weeks ago the tone was: "We're whipped, and the Yankees have matters in their own hands. We'll step aside and let them 'run the machine' to suit themselves—and a nice time they'll have of it." Now, on the other hand, there is a disposition to look jealously upon any interference from outside. They say they understand the terms imposed, and are willing to live up to them; but they wish to manage their own affairs themselves, and are able to do it. So thoroughly satisfied are the people of this State of the uselessness of any further resistance, that, if State sovereignty and secession were the only issue, I should see hardly any obstacle, in view of this progress towards loyalty, to an immediate reconstruction. "We went into this contest believing we were in the right—we have fought well and been beaten—now we submit in thorough good faith, and desire to become loyal citizens of the United States." These were the words of a clergyman to me. A Confederate captain said: "I have taken the oath to support the Constitution under your interpretation of it, and I mean to keep it. I am not convinced that I was wrong, still I am bound now to fight to put down secession." These are illustrations of the completeness with which South Carolina has submitted, so far as secession is concerned. And my safe journey of a hundred and twenty-eight miles into the heart of the State is due not to military rule—for I could have gone with equal security into those districts which are not occupied by our forces—but to the fact that there is nothing to fight about, and no wish to fight. Another encouraging fact. In the many conversations I have held with Southerners, or which have been carried on by them in my hearing, I have never heard any expressions of bitterness against the North.

As to slavery, they say with equal frankness that it is dead, and they have no desire to bring it to life again. I have myself heard no other opinion than this expressed, although I am told that many of the least intelligent planters have a lingering hope that Congress will yet do something for them. Wherever our forces have gone, the planters have made contracts with greater or less readiness, and a very reasonable proportion of them are trying to carry them out sincerely and in good faith. And if they were left to themselves, only with military protection, I believe there would be less antagonism than exists now. The most vulgar, abusive language I have heard applied to the negroes has been from Northern men, with whom prejudice against color was combined with indifference to moral right. If the Southerner has the indifference, at least he is free from the prejudice, and is a better friend to his former slave than one half of the Northerners who come down here. And it is not from the native disposition of the negroes themselves, but from the bad influence of some of their friends, particularly soldiers, that the hostility towards the whites and the serious interruptions to labor have arisen. In the best of our regiments there will be a few mischief-makers, who persuade the field-hands that they should refuse to work, that they are the rightful owners of the land, that they should leave their homes and go to the islands, where lands will be given them. And we know that ignorant people are always more ready to take bad advice than good. The colored people upon the plantations are therefore in a very unsettled frame of mind, and it requires constant watchfulness and delicate management to keep them quiet, and persuade them to work faithfully until New Year's, when the contracts will expire.

Gen. Hartwell, commanding this sub-district (including Columbia), has given great personal attention to this matter, and has appointed a Commission of Free Labor to attend to these matters. They have not interfered with the making of contracts, or imposed any uniform rate, but have exercised the right of rejecting them if unfair to either party, and of obliging both to keep them. The great urgent object is that the crops shall be cultivated; otherwise there must be famine. The corn is doing well, but not two-thirds of the usual quantity has been planted, and nothing to speak of of any other crop. This section, through which Sherman marched, will do well if it raises enough to live on until another crop; and I think the lower districts are for the most part in the same condition. The upper districts will do better; and, besides, they have a considerable quantity of cotton, which is now coming into the market—several wagon-loads passed through this place yesterday.

The news which we received yesterday of the riots in Charleston show that the apprehensions expressed in my last letter were well founded; and illustrate, likewise, the views just expressed as to the trouble being made by Northerners. It was Northern white soldiers and, in some part at least, Northern colored soldiers who were guilty of the disturbances. Of course this community could not be safely left without these soldiers. We must run the risk of these lesser troubles in order to secure the great object of the suppression of the rebellion. But if Northern men would abstain from language that tends to excite unnecessary ill feeling in the present sensitive condition of both parties, I see nothing to prevent the development of real good-will between them.

There is, however, one opinion in which the Southern people are nearly unanimous—that the colored race is destined to speedy extinction, crowded out of existence by competition with the superior race. When, after a long discussion of this point with the Southern officer before mentioned, I ended with a hope for peace and prosperity for the land—"Peace," said he, "we have, and prosperity is coming; but not for them." The most moderate shape in which I have heard this expressed is that which is, I fear, not far from the truth—that the blacks are to be the great sufferers by the war, and that perhaps half the race will perish by the time the other and stronger half will be in a condition to prosper. Another almost universal fear—I do not think it is so strong as an expectation—is of a war of races, in which one or the other will be exterminated at once. As there is no doubt that to expect a thing is the very way to bring it to pass, and as alarming signs of such a conflict do exist, nothing seems to me more clearly the duty of every friend of the South than to abstain from everything which will increase this alienation, and do everything to bring about harmony.

It is an important question whether, with this full admission that slavery is dead, it would be safe to trust legislation to the people of the State. They say that it would be; that they desire the harmony and welfare of all classes, and have no thought of any reactionary measures. In this I do not doubt that the best and most intelligent are sincere. Only there are two considerations. In the first place, the best and most intelligent do not form a majority, and it is certain that among a portion of the planters a very fiendish spirit still prevails, and that a still larger portion are submitting with no good grace to the indignity of treating with their former slaves on terms of equality. In the next place, even if all were sincere and earnest in this, it would still be legislation by a class, and, with the best of intentions, such legislation will almost certainly be more or less biassed by the prejudices and interests of those who possess the power and by these unfavorable expectations which I have just mentioned. No one can help looking with anxiety upon any plan of reconstruction which does not admit the most intelligent of the colored citizens to a participation of political power, and, I will add, exclude the ignorant and degraded whites.

CHARLESTON, July 12.

The favorable judgment expressed in my letter from Orangeburg must be understood as applying to the upper districts of the State; in the Low Country, as it is called, and especially in Charleston, I do not think the feeling is so healthy. The division of the State into upper and lower is a fundamental one, and perhaps needs explanation. The upper districts—beyond Columbia—are the most populous, and in these the system of farms and small plantations prevails. The slave-owners, having the personal management of their slaves, are generally inclined to treat them kindly. The lower districts, on the other hand, along the seaboard, are the seat of the wealth of the community. Here are the great plantations, whose owners live upon them only a small portion of the year, and even then leave the control of the slaves entirely to overseers. Under the constitution of the State the low country has the preponderance in the Senate, the upper in the House of Representatives. Between the two sections are the middle districts, comparatively sterile and thinly inhabited, but belonging in their character to the upper section rather than the lower.

The plantations along the sea-coast, the aristocratic portion of the State, are in great part abandoned by their proprietors, and cultivated on their own account by the negroes, who from all I can learn are getting excellent crops. The planters who have remained have made contracts with their hands, and some of them—but I think a smaller proportion than in the upper part of the State—are disposed to deal fairly and honorably by them. From all accounts, those negroes who are carrying on the plantations by themselves are making better crops than those whose master remains with them and superintends the work—they know that the whole is to be theirs, instead of a part. There is no cotton, however, to speak of planted in any of the parishes about Charleston. The great rice plantations, too, about Georgetown are lying untouched—nothing for export will be raised this year in South Carolina.

Meanwhile in Charleston the destitution and suffering are on the increase—the rapid development of trade not keeping pace with the wasting of the scanty resources still left to the people. The most discouraging feature is the utter helplessness of the white community in the face of the terrible problem. The blacks manage to live comfortably for the most part, and help each other; but the whites, accustomed to have all their affairs managed by an aristocracy which is now ruined, seem powerless. They choose committees, and report cases of suffering, but any organized action on a large scale cannot be looked for from them. Unless liberal aid comes from the North, and that speedily, we must look for fearful distress from hunger and sickness.

MARCEL.

THE HARVEST OF DOCTORATES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

DEAR SIR: Annually about the time that corn is coming to the silk and wheat to the beard, the doctoring mania of our crude American civilization comes to blossom. What for a better name may be styled the titular fecundity of American colleges has grown to the dimensions of an alarming disease—a sort of salt-rheum or scrofula having periodic eruptions. One blushes at the contrast between the present and the olden time. To be elected to a doctorate, whether of divinity or law, a century ago was as rare a distinction as it was presumptively deserved. A lazy or commonplace man never dared to hope for such coronation. Every requisite of intellectual excellence was implied in it. It was an Olympian prize, and none but athletes won it. The race was only to the fleet of foot, and the battle to the strong of sinew.

I maintain that there is not a symptom of superficial civilization more suggestive and startling than the indiscriminate multiplication of titular dignities by our American colleges. The initiated know well enough that doctorates have become nearly as marketable commodities as butter and eggs. Every year the moral disease grows, and in a corresponding ratio titles cheapen, till to-day they are a drug which men of true culture despise and pretenders can buy with pelf or patronage.

I consider that the rapid multiplication of colleges over the land, which is wont to be paraded in the reports of educational societies and the speeches of the many anniversaries as a great national blessing, is in some respects a huge public disadvantage. Almost every college when it begins its career is a beggar at the door of public charity. Money is the great want, and the old maxim of commerce becomes installed as a presiding genius in education: "Si possis recte, quocunque modo, rem;" that is to say, "Money by honest means if possible, but anyhow money."

Begging money proving to be a slow process, our newly fledged college goes into the business of making money. It becomes a manufacturer first, and then a trader. It cannot manufacture sewing-machines, but it has by legislative permission and popular consent a monopoly of titles; and so the world of literature, real and sham, is invited to bid. Of course pretenders will outbid men of intrinsic merit. No true scholar was ever known to buy a title with his own or his uncle's cash, but the thing is not unheard of among quacks.

In this wise what multitudes of commonplace men are annually ornamented, or shall I not rather say made ridiculous, with scholastic appen-dages. Of course I admit honorable exceptions of men in the pulpit and at the bar, who wear titles worthily, like well-fitting garments which a man hardly knows he has on. The doctorate of divinity long ago ceased to mean anything, but the doctorate of the law has till of late been measurably saved from the auction block. The tendency, however, is downward, and to-day there are flagrant examples of the commercial quality, indicative of the intellectual and moral apostacy of this latter title. Think of a man whose head is vacant of Murray's syntax being an LL.D.! I beg leave to inform you that one or two such specimens of natural history are on record. Our colleges are doctoring the people, and will not somebody doctor the colleges?

Yours, VERITAS.

REPUBLICAN PROPAGANDISM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Welcoming THE NATION, so appropriately appearing at the moment when "these United States" can, without challenge from domestic disturber or foreign foe, command respect as a nation, "one and indivisible," may I venture to hope that in your columns will be found some representation of the claims of humanity at large, and some enforcement of the duties incumbent on this nation as a leading member of the great family of mankind? I often see in American papers pharisaical comments on the insular egoism of English politicians and the English in general; but these comments only serve to illustrate anew the old story of the "mote" and the "beam." There may be continental as well as insular egoism, and if that weakness is not abundantly illustrated by American journals then I am much mistaken, and shall be thankful to be set right by the production of proof to the contrary. I think I discern a nobler spirit in the columns of THE NATION, and trust that "the blossom of promise will ripen into the fruit of performance."

In your notice of the letter of the great Italian patriot and Roman triumvir, Joseph Mazzini, to the London agent of the United States Sanitary Commission, you say he would have this country "lead in the progress of mankind, and assist in the great battle that rages everywhere, between liberty and tyranny, equality and privilege. The Italian patriot may count upon our support in the sense in which he invokes it" . . . . . "that is, sympathy, encouragement, and all the aid that flows from the conspicuous example of a successful, enduring republican society, consistent, above all, and true to its fundamental idea." But the main value of the brief article under notice I find in the two concluding sentences: "The Union exists by, and in consequence for, the equal brotherhood of man. Republican propagandism is inseparable from a republican establishment."

Very good. Whether the oppressed peoples of Europe should under no circumstances receive the "material aid" which as you say (approvingly) Kossuth prayed for in vain, I will not now discuss—that question may be more profitably considered when a demand similar to that made by the Hungarian leader shall come to test the depth and earnestness of American "sympathy;" but I should like to have a clear understanding of the kind of "republican propagandism" THE NATION would support. If likely to be effective, the sooner that propagandism is commenced, the better.

I admit the value of the "conspicuous example" referred to by THE NATION, although I fear its value will be very much detracted from for some time to come by our "republican society" not being so "consistent" and "true to its fundamental idea" as it will be when the insolence of Southern slaveocrats shall have been effectually humbled—when the loyal black man of the South shall fully enjoy his "inalienable rights"—when white soldiers shall cease from the infamy of outraging their colored brothers-in-arms, an atrocity which is the very acme of base ingratitude—and when Ohio and Pennsylvania, and the rest of the old "free States," shall purge themselves from the inconsistency and hypocrisy of boasting their loyalty to the republic whilst grossly violating the republic's "fundamental idea" by their relegation of the colored people to the rank of political (and social) pariahs. But let the "conspicuous example" come to be as unchallengeable as it is very far from being at present, still I think that both duty and self-defence demand something more active than the exhibition of the said example, merely to satisfy mankind that "there is no hollowness in the professions of this nation" when it answers the cry of any people elsewhere struggling for freedom.

As to duty: I maintain that that which is the duty of any one man is not less the duty of any aggregate of men, whether ten, or ten millions, or a hundred millions. Every man witnessing an act of cruelty or oppression in ordinary private life is bound, not only by the demands of justice and by the ethical rule, to do by another as we would be done unto, but also by that unnamed sentiment of mingled pity and indignation, sacred grief and holy rage, which rises within every unbrutalized human being, to do all that in his power lies to help the assailed and the wronged, to invoke the law's aid when at hand, and, failing that aid, to do all that he can by his own right arm to shield the weak and smite the strong. The like duty is that of every people, all "diplomatic" arguments to the contrary notwithstanding. There is no need at present to enlarge on this topic. I pass to the next consideration, that of self-defence.

The great civil war now ended (at least in the matter of the clash of arms) proved, what might have been understood much earlier, that this republic can count upon friends only among the peoples, not the governments and "governing classes," of Europe. I know that Americans in general except Russia from this sweeping assertion. But only the wilfully blind must fail to see that Russia's friendship for the United States is dictated by hatred of Great Britain, and by the hope that flattering American egoism may induce the States to respect the integrity of the Russian possessions on this continent, and, perhaps, some day make common cause in an effort to dispossess England of her colonies. Every man of common sense must know that between the "fundamental idea" of this republic and that of the Russian autocracy there can be no real community of sentiment. Any alliance between the two cannot be otherwise than unnatural and shameful, at least to one party to the compact. In the course of my experience I remember nothing so scandalous as the exhibition of republican servility on the occasion of the visit of the Russian fleet in 1863, when the "authorities" and merchant-princes of New York and Boston vied in performing kotou at the feet of Admiral Lessoffsky. Appearing in American harbors as the naval representative of "a friendly power," the Admiral had a fair claim to official courtesies, and, considering all the circumstances, not even a Polish exile could have found fault if the welcome had been marked by a certain warmth not extended to the admirals in command of the English and French naval forces in American waters. But the line might have been drawn between civility and servility, instead of which the politicians and editors and merchant-princes aforesaid exerted themselves to the utmost capacity of voice and pen in offering the most fulsome adulation to the Russian Tsar, and proclaiming the alliance of the American republic with the Muscovite despotism. Even the butcheries then going on in Poland were excused, and whilst Alexander II. was extolled as an imperial civilizer and benefactor, Nicholas (of execrable memory) was apotheosized as an imperial saint or demigod! But enough of Russia and the pro-Muscovites. This republic is now too strong to fear dismemberment at the hands of any league of European kings; still, in the present temper of the South, the materials of renewed insurrection are not wanting, and are ready to the hands of foreign incendiaries. National safety calls for the "Americanizing" of Europe. Her nationality assured, America, as Joseph Mazzini says, must become cosmopolitan. A do-nothing "conspicuous example" will not alone suffice. The republic must be active, aggressive. "Republican propagandism is inseparable from a republican establishment."

I would not expect the United States Government to engage in any such crusade. The propagandism must be the work of the people, that is, of enlightened, far-seeing, and generous men eager to promote the good work of civilization and the good cause of freedom. In relation to England, where the old cry for Parliamentary reform is being revived, and where an earnest struggle to make the Commons House of Parliament a veritable House of "the Commons of England" must ere long be renewed, could not something be done on this side of the Atlantic to assist a movement which, successful, would transfer power to the friends of America? Necessarily but little really is known in England of the workings of "popular suffrage" in this country, a subject of constant misrepresentation on the part of such papers as the Times. Could not something be done by a body organized like the Loyal Publication Society to diffuse correct information on a question of such vital interest to the English reformers? I throw this out as a hint suggestive of what might be done in the way of "propagandism" to assist those who have been faithful to this country during a long period of temptation to the contrary, and in whose success this republic would find the strongest guarantee for peace with, and absolute justice on the part of, England.

A word as regards "sympathy." Notwithstanding the pro-Russian fever before referred to, I must believe that numbers of Americans may be found who can feel for the sufferings of unhappy Poland, and will, on due requisition, be prepared to afford evidence of the reality of their sympathy by giving aid to the proscribed sons of that desolated land. That Poland's sufferings still continue, the following paragraph will suffice to show:

"A letter from Warsaw of the 9th inst., published in the Posen journals, says that on the 1st inst. forty political prisoners were embarked at Praga to be transported to Siberia. The celebrated lawyer, Koutlauski, who was delivered up to Russia by the Austrian authorities, and was sentenced to hard labor for fifty years, was forced to submit to have his head shaved and to wear the clothing of the most degraded convict. Many of the unfortunate prisoners were heavily chained."—London Morning Star, June 17, 1865.

Such cruelties occurring in any other country would call forth indignant denunciations from the American press, but as "the mild and beneficent" Alexander is the perpetrator of these atrocities, they are allowed to pass unnoticed. As to the Poles themselves, some thousands of a new emigration are now starving fugitives in France, Switzerland, Belgium, and England. Statements have appeared in the American papers that as many as twenty thousand (including women and children) were contemplating emigration to this country. I have reason to believe this number exaggerated, but I have information that one thousand or twelve hundred fugitives from Poland, at present in Switzerland, are seriously desirous of coming here and founding a Polish colony. Lamenting the stern necessity which compels such a step, for it is another drain of Poland's life-blood, I must yet urge that if these martyr-combatants for freedom seek this country as an asylum, something more than permission to enter the ports and traverse the soil of the republic should be accorded to them. On this matter the Polish Committee in New York are no doubt prepared to impart every necessary information to the public. I have not heard of any appeal to American generosity, but in the event of such an appeal being made, I trust it will be responded to not only by gifts of money, but also aid in the shape of counsel, direction, and the assistance which political and social influence can render, toward the end proposed, that of affording the expatriated Poles a self-sustaining home under the ægis of the star-spangled banner. Thus much is due to the countrymen of Kosciusko and Pulaski, and will serve to demonstrate that there is no "hollowness in the professions of this nation," and that the Union exists "for the equal brotherhood of man." The hand of fraternity extended to the victims of Muscovite brutality will count for something in the way of atonement for the disgraceful servility before alluded to, and will not be fruitless as a means of "propagandism" in extending the fame of and enlisting the peoples' affection for our republican institutions.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

II.

Richmond, July 12, 1865.

Sitting in the piazza of the hotel to-day were two Virginian ladies. The younger, whose home lay on the western side of the Blue Ridge, was making her first visit to Richmond since the war ended. She had many questions to ask and answer, and while she and her friend gossipped, her two little boys ran about, barefooted, and certainly not so well dressed as children who are staying with their parents at good hotels in New York.

"There," said the mother, "just look at Charley! Do see him! Stop that, sir. You're bad looking enough as it is. Anybody might tell that you're no Unionist. I'm sure the child appears like he was a little Confederate."

"I a'n't a Unionist," said the boy.

"No, I'm sure you're not. If you were I'd disinherit you, sure, and so would the captain."

"How is it," she enquired, turning to the hostess, "do you give our officers their rank now, or don't the Yankees let you?"

"Oh, yes, just as we always did."

"My soul! I thought they wouldn't let you speak above your breath here. The other side the mountains they told me I'd be hung sure if I was to come to Richmond, I speak right out so. But I told 'em they wouldn't hang me."

The people on the other side of the mountains are tolerably well represented by this lady, I suppose, for, so far as my observation extends, the feelings of the people in Eastern Virginia are the same with hers. This condition of mind is very easily discernible in the ordinary conversation of the street and other public places, and is also discoverable now and then in the more deliberate and cautious utterances of the pulpit and the press. Last Sunday I formed one of the somewhat scanty audience in a Congregational church. The last few minutes or so the preacher devoted to a eulogium on the character of a young man who, like many other members of that church and society, had died in the service of his country. The few closing sentences of the sermon proper were, as nearly as I can recollect them, as follows:

"And does it seem to you, my brethren, that during the last terrible four years the prayers of God's people in these Southern States, because they have not been answered in just the way you had chosen, have not been heard at all? Be not cast down. Do we not know that the fervent prayers of the saints cannot fail of an answer? But now we see through a glass, darkly. By-and-bye, if we will but wait, in God's good time we shall see, and know, and understand."

Doubtless there was much in the discourse to edify the believer, and the audience seemed to derive consolation and instruction from it, but it is easy to see that such preaching tends to make its hearers neither repent of rebellion nor forget it.

The press of Richmond is of course under strict surveillance, and it is not so much in its set articles as in its tone that one finds evidence of its being printed for a people not yet reconciled to the Government which has overthrown the cause of their choice. But in one of the city papers I find addressed to the voters these words of guidance for their action in future elections—advice, I venture to say, far from being needless:

"There is one admonition, however, which cannot be too often given to the people of the South. The election of candidates to office who are notorious for radical, violent, and extreme political opinions should be carefully avoided, as their success would be pointed to by our most dangerous enemies as evidences of most stubborn and unyielding disloyalty.

"Men prominent in the past for their secession doctrines would, if elected and admitted to seats on the floor of the national Congress, prove most useless and inefficient representatives at this time. The prejudices of the North would be so strongly arrayed against them that they would not be able to accomplish a tithe as much good as men of moderate and conservative views."

Occasionally, however, an editor furnishes outspoken proof of his misconception of the privileges and duties which belong to a writer who addresses a community so recently in arms and making deadly war against the Federal Government. The Whig of yesterday contained an article which caused the suppression of the paper, for stigmatizing a certain clause of the Amnesty Proclamation as heathenish, and pronouncing a law of the land, enacted by Congress and approved by the President, "mean, brutal, and cowardly, revoltingly absurd and atrociously unjust." The Whig, I am told, has hitherto been the most popular journal in Richmond.

I was the other day thrown into the company of a gentleman residing in Amelia County in this State, and for two or three hours conversed with him upon the topics now uppermost in the minds of all men. He was past the prime of life, evidently was well educated and well read, and apparently a pious man. He was, or before the war had been, wealthy, carrying on business in Richmond, and owning a plantation about forty miles distant from the city. I found him disposed to be communicative, and was much interested in hearing his views and opinions. This year's crop in his section, he said, promises to be a good one. The country had not been much devastated, and there was no lack of farming utensils or laborers. A better yield of oats has not been seen for many years, and the wheat, which is already harvested, is quite up to the average. There will, however, be no tobacco, as in February last, when the ground should have been prepared, the future was too uncertain for farmers to risk putting in seed. Indian corn is backward, but there is hope of a fair crop. Corn-planting should have been done about the time of the evacuation, but people then were thinking more of Richmond and Lee's army than of farming, and just after that the negroes began going away from home, and labor for a time was scarce.

I asked if many of his negroes left him. "I had about a hundred and fifteen servants on my land. I own a tract of fifteen hundred acres, but I have never been anything more than an amateur farmer. My people were always well treated, and never were worked hard. A number of them had been with my father, and there were a good many that I had grown up with from boyhood. I loved some of them. Of course, if a servant has the charge of one of my little ones, and I see the child grow fond of her, and that she loves the child, I cannot but feel kindly towards her. When the city was evacuated, of course, they heard that they were free. Well, sir, to-day, out of more than a hundred servants that were on my place on the first of April, I haven't six left, and those are mostly infirm old people. Some of them came up with tears in their eyes to shake hands with me and say good-bye.

"'Sorry to lef' you, massa; good-bye, massa.' 'But why do you go, Toby (Sam, Sue, what not); what makes you leave?' I said. 'Oh, sah, we 'bleege to go, sah.' 'Well, what is it obliges you? Do you expect to find a better place than this? Haven't you always been well treated here?' 'Yes, massa, but we 'bleege to go, massa.'" So they went, and I have been working my crop with negroes that I have hired, and I suppose somebody else has hired mine."

I asked what wages farmers were paying the freedmen in his part of the country, and if there had been any concert among them in reference to prices. He said he was not aware that there had been any measures taken by the planters to regulate wages in any part of Virginia. At any rate, there had been none in his county nor in the adjoining counties. Some owners paid six dollars per month, some seven, and some eight. He himself paid eight, and knew of no one that paid less than six. Each hand that he hired had, besides his wages, a house, fuel, board, and about two acres of ground on which to raise corn or what he liked. These things, together with the privilege of keeping poultry and a pig, he considered equivalent to at least eight dollars per month added to the laborer's wages. He thought he was doing very well by his negroes, and they were working very well, about as they had in old times, perhaps a little harder, but, on the whole, except in the degree of power which he possessed over the laborers, he did not find the practical working of the present system very different from that of the old one.

Two or three colored men to whom I have since spoken on this subject, set the proper rate of wages as high as ten dollars a month, and thought the employer paying no more than that sum ought also to clothe his laborers, as well as provide them quarters in which to live and the ordinary rations of corn and bacon. But these men had no expectation that such wages would be obtainable. Indeed, they appeared to have as little faith in the whites as the latter profess to have in the negro. "What kin we do, sah?" they say; "dey kin give us jes what dey choose. Man couldn't starve, nohow; got no place to go; we 'bleege to take what dey give us."

"The negro," said Mr. K., "I sincerely hope may disappoint my expectations. But if he does not, he is doomed to undergo extinction. Less than a hundred years of freedom will see the race practically exterminated. The negro will not work more than enough to supply his bare necessities. There isn't a county of Virginia where we haven't had some hundreds of free negroes, and they have been always perfectly worthless and lived in wretchedness. The negro stands as much in need of a master to guide him as a child does. When I look at my servants, I feel weighing upon me all the responsibilities of a parent. In the course of my life I have known many men who for that reason alone would never become the owner of a slave. I have brought up my children to feel so, and accustomed them to the thought of dispensing with slave labor. Those of them who are old enough share my views on the subject. But the negro will always need the care of some one superior to him, and unless in one form or another it is extended to him, the race will first become pauper and then disappear. Nothing but the most careful legislation will prevent it. Now take an example: of my negroes, nearly half were not on the working list; but I had to support them all. What will the negro do when he is called upon to support not only himself (he isn't inclined to do that, and I don't believe he will do it), but also to get food, and clothes, and physic for the infants and disabled people belonging to him? Why, I doubt if my farm ever returned me one per cent. interest on the capital invested in it. He cannot do it. He couldn't do it if all the Southern States were confiscated and given him to do it with."

This last assertion was called forth by my suggestion that perhaps the self-supporting character of the colored communities of Port Royal was due to their having become possessors of confiscated lands in that district, and that if a like policy were adopted in Virginia like results might be expected. "So far as the owners of land are concerned," he continued, "emancipation will prove advantageous. I shall not be obliged to support sixteen people for every nine that work for me. But in order for me to reap any benefit from emancipation, the relation between master and man must be made the subject of wise legislation. That matter ought to be left to the States separately, for, of course, in many matters of detail there will be great differences of requirement."

Happening to have with me a late copy of Harper's Weekly, I called his attention to an editorial article containing an extract from one of the Nashville papers, which states that the Legislature of Tennessee have recently placed the negroes of that State under almost every conceivable civil disability, and left them in a condition differing little from their former slavery, and asked him if the course taken by Virginia would not be identical with that of Tennessee. The statement we had just read, he replied, was probably entirely partisan. He supposed, however, that if it were true, a remedy for the evil would be found by requiring the States to take such action as should be satisfactory to the general Government. The general Government seemed to be doing what it liked. But, after all, the great hope of Virginia lay in the influx of immigrants that might be expected from Europe and the North. He knew many men in the State who owned five and six thousand acres of land. Of course they could not attend to all of it. Let such immense half-cleared tracts be broken up into small farms, and he had no doubt the soil would yield a product fourfold greater than now. The mineral resources of the State were inexhaustible, and certainly there was nothing to prevent its becoming a great commercial country. They only needed men. But between the day of those things and to-day there were many years, and perhaps fearful suffering. Immigrants might come fast, but the South would not be peopled in one year, nor in fifty. He should not live to see it.

If the negro must go before Southern prosperity can come, perhaps Mr K. will never see it. But, of course, denying the possibility that the blacks can ever become a respectable, self-supporting peasantry, it is impossible for him to believe that by the side of his German, Yankee, and white Virginian manufacturers and farmers of the future there may exist also an intelligent and industrious yeomanry composed of colored Virginians.

As we sat and talked, we had been watching a boat of the "new line for Baltimore" which was rushing along close beside us. Acquaintances were exchanging morning salutations across the few yards of water that separated the steamers. Our speed was not far from seventeen miles an hour, and as we shot along, the near green banks and the yellow stream seemed to be gliding swiftly past us. Now one and now the other boat would gain a foot or two. At last, after several miles of this neck-and-neck running, we placed between our boat and the Dictator some rods of clear water. "Fare you well, chile, we can't always be with you," shouted a deck-hand to the beaten steamer, and we went on our way alone. Turning a sharp bend in the river we came upon a small encampment. A few soldiers sat about drinking their coffee, and near one of the tents a rude effigy clad in female apparel was dangling from a tree.

"Ah, what have they there?" asked my companion. I told him it was probably meant to represent Jefferson Davis in the dress he wore when he was captured. "Do people in the North believe that absurd story? I thought Mr. Davis's character, indeed I thought the state of his health for a long time past, was too well known all over the country for any one not very ignorant to give credence to such a tale. I never was particularly friendly to Mr. Davis, but of course I set the thing down as a fabrication as soon as I heard it. For many years he has been a great sufferer from neuralgia, and obliged to protect himself from the slightest draught of cold air. When he was taken it happened that he had his wife's shawl thrown over his head and shoulders for that reason. It was this which gave rise to the story, but the story ought not to be believed by men of intelligence."

Mr. K. was curious to know how the Northern people felt in reference to the Southern ex-President. I replied that I thought they were bitterest against him when they thought of the miseries inflicted upon Union soldiers in rebel military prisons. Mr. K. could not believe that there was much truth in those reports, nor that Mr. Davis could justly be held responsible if they were in the main true. He knew that during the war such charges were constantly made by the Northern papers, and he felt concerned for the honor of the South. He visited Libby Prison in order to satisfy himself, and found that the Union soldiers confined there were fed in the same way with the Confederate soldiers in the intrenchments. In the Southern local papers it was common to see paragraphs stating that such a one had just arrived home from the North, where he had been so treated while in confinement that it was impossible he should recover. The whole South was full of such stories. He was free to confess, however, that he himself had never met a returned prisoner who seemed to have been ill used. He thought that, cleared of all exaggerations, the stories of barbarity to prisoners would be found to be of very slight importance. He believed the people of the North to be humane, and he knew that there was no humaner people in the world than the Southern people. In reference to the responsibility of the rebel leader for the cruelties of Andersonville and Salisbury, and in reply to a question of mine, he said that he thought charges of equal magnitude might have been brought against the North during Mr. Lincoln's administration of office, and yet have received no investigation nor attention from him. At the same time, he said, Mr. Lincoln differed from Mr. Davis in many respects.

I may say here that I have never heard Mr. Lincoln mentioned by any Southerner except in terms of respect and liking.

Continuing our conversation, I asked Mr. K. if he did not believe that the inhabitants of the two sections would come together again with the old friendly feeling and be one people as before. Our talk had been so pleasant that, though I retained a vague sense of an antagonism between the North and the South, I had half forgotten that men had been killing each other in the quarrel, and it was a little surprising to note the bitterness of his answer.

"No, sir, never. The people of the South feel that they have been most unjustly, most tyrannically oppressed by the North. All our rights have been trampled upon. We knew that we had a perfect right to go and leave you. We were only carrying out the principles of the Revolution. It was our deliberate opinion that we ought to go out from the old Union. We could no longer give to the general Government the consent of the governed, and the general Government could therefore no longer have any just powers over us. But aside from that, our right to secede was perfect. Mr. Calhoun demonstrated that. Mr. Webster's speeches in reply are powerful appeals to sentiment and imagination, but the argument of Mr. Calhoun is irresistible. And even Mr. Webster allows that one party to a compact having violated it, the other is released from all obligation. Now the North has repeatedly violated the constitutional guaranties of slavery. Yes, sir, we had a most perfect right to secede, and we have been slaughtered by thousands for attempting to exercise it. And yet it is the fashion to call us traitors! Now the people of the South are not going to stand that. They are subjugated, conquered, and in their collective capacity they must submit to whatever may be inflicted upon them. But individually, between man and man, they are not going to endure the infamous charge of having committed treason.

"If the United States Government bring Mr. Davis to trial, and he defends himself, or if his counsel do their duty, this matter will be set forth so plainly and convincingly that I for one am willing the nations of the earth should judge and pronounce if we were not right, and did not act within our powers. It was not slavery that caused this war, for it was not the South that began it. We endured the encroachments of the North upon our rights, and then quietly availed ourselves of the reserved right of secession. We fired upon Sumter. True; but not till Sumter had become a South Carolinian fort, in which you maintained our enemies. Few men at the South owned slaves. We wanted to leave you. At first I voted for what was then called a Union candidate for the State Convention. We elected him by a large majority. We thought it would not be necessary to secede. The whole State thought so, and an overwhelming majority of that convention were anti-secessionists. Yet they voted the State out of the Union, and when our members came back to their constitutents, we justified them and ratified what they had done. I don't think there was a vote cast in our county against immediate secession when the ordinance came before the people. You see Mr. Lincoln had issued his proclamation calling for seventy-five thousand men. We all, whether we owned slaves or not, believed that coercion was mere tyranny, and that we ought not to submit to it. No, sir, I believe that if the North were to engage in foreign war, or in any way to need the help of the South during the lifetime of the present generation, ninety-nine men in a hundred throughout the South would take up arms against the Washington Government. I have no doubt of that, sir. You may have a new Union with these States kept in it by force, but it cannot be said that this war has perpetuated the old Union."

He believed all Southerners felt so; from the meanest private in the army up to the highest men in the land, up to Gen. Lee, all felt that the South had been most deeply injured. He went on to say that for a time his high admiration for the character of General Lee had sensibly declined. He had been told that the General had made application to the Washington authorities for pardon. He had supposed that rather than do that the General would undergo exile or death. Not long afterwards an opportunity had presented itself for speaking to General Lee on the subject. The report proved to be correct and not a slander. A voluminous application had been sent in, to which, however, no answer has yet been made. Since the time of his visit a reply may have been received. Having learned the motives which had actuated General Lee in asking for a pardon, his admiration, his veneration, for the man and the patriot was profounder than ever. Had the General considered his own feelings alone, he would have died sooner than humble himself and a just cause by a seeming admission that it was wrong. His application was one more proof of his love for his country. There were thousands of high-toned young men in the South who meditated expatriating themselves, and who, when asked why they did not seek for a pardon, replied, that until General Lee had done so they would not. After a long struggle with his inclinations, believing that these young men ought to be saved to the country whose future they were so well qualified to adorn, and, by participating in the rights of citizenship, to guide and shape, the General had done violence to his own feelings, and made the request. Still he had made no abject submission, but had accompanied the petition for pardon with a full statement of those things which made his past conduct seem to him right and proper, and had avowed his unchanging devotion to his former principles.

I asked Mr. K. if he supposed the Government would send General Lee a favorable answer. "Oh, yes," he replied, "undoubtedly."

"And does he expect to be restored to full enjoyment of all the rights of citizenship?"

"Yes, sir; he has asked for that. And if it is refused him, he will at any rate have done all that he intended to do. The class of men whom he intended to benefit have, many of them, applied to be pardoned, and probably all will do so. Thus General Lee's sacrifice will have saved many of our first young men from exile, and opened to them a public career from which they would otherwise have shut themselves out."

Among other things which I might quote to show how honest and how earnest this gentleman was in his devotion to the cause which has just been so signally defeated, he asked me if, at the North, there was not among the intelligent classes, at any rate among the religious people, an expectation that God would visit upon that section some terrible retribution for the unjust war they had waged upon their brethren, the calamities they had inflicted on the South.

He seemed surprised and perplexed when I answered that the Northern people were so far from feeling any apprehensions of that sort, that they believed it was God's blessing which had enabled them to carry on so exhausting a war till it was at last successful, and that they regarded themselves as having done much for the cause of humanity and true democracy; in short, that they considered themselves as crusaders rather than criminals.

"Possible!" he said. "The people here look for some heavy visitation of Divine Providence upon you. But God will judge, and judge more wisely than we." By this time Norfolk and Fort Monroe were at hand, and we separated.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, July 8.

The hustings are already being run up in the different polling districts of London; and before next week is over, the borough elections, about which there is always most excitement, will be virtually completed. On Thursday night the writs were all sent out, and on Monday the first elections will commence. Meanwhile the impression gains ground that the Ministry will have a majority of a decisive character. However, there is very little good in discussing probabilities that will shortly be turned into certainties. The shrewdest prophetic authorities always assign a somewhat distant date to the apprehended destruction of the universe by fire. "Che sarà, sarà," the motto of the house of Bedford, is a wise one for the guidance of all political critics; and, therefore, I shall defer all foretellings about the elections till next Saturday, when practically the result will be known. This much, however, I can fairly say, that as yet the popular excitement about the approaching contest is of the mildest order. You must go away from the metropolis into the country districts to witness any excitement at all. There, indeed, the question whether the orange or the blue candidate shall be returned to Parliament is a matter of very keen interest; but it is so rather on personal and local, than on public and political, grounds.

An aristocratic liberal and a liberal aristocrat probably entertain in their own hearts very much the same views as to politics. But yet, to the country at large it is not a matter of indifference which party is most largely represented in the electoral returns. Though there is a general disposition amidst men of all parties to let moot questions rest for the present, it is certain that, in the course of events, questions must suggest themselves demanding solution; and the nature of that solution will be greatly influenced by the constitution of the next Parliament.

Everything is for the best in the best possible of worlds—such is the key-note of our addresses, whether issued from the Carlton Club or the Reform. Never, I think, was there a more rose-tinted proclamation than that issued by Lord Palmerston to the electors of Tiverton. In casting a retrospective view over the six last years, about the only circumstance the Premier can find to regret is the death of the Prince Consort; and even this chastened sorrow is mitigated by the consoling reflection that, during the same period, the Prince of Wales has married and become the father of two infant sons. How long is this contentment to last? The only answer I can give is the one that my Lazzarone servant at Naples used invariably to give me when I asked him any question to reply to which involved any mental exertion on his part, "Chi lo sa?" Other response I have none to give. However, if political excitement is almost wanting in the present contest, there is an unusual amount of local agitation. There are, as I suppose you know, 658 seats in the House of Commons. Now, according to the latest reports received from different parts of the country, the candidates are distributed as follows:

England and Wales.....	383	Liberals;	322	Conservatives.
Scotland.....	51	"	15	"
Ireland.....	70	"	64	"
Total.....	504		401

The excess of Liberals is due to the fact that the candidates who hope to get in by what in the game of billiards is termed a "fluke," always stand on popular principles. It is a significant fact that, if any would-be legislator desires to contest a seat where he has no local interest, or for which he is not prepared to spend money, he always finds it advisable to bid for Liberal, not Tory, support. Then, too, the organization of the Ministerial party is very inferior to that of the opposition. There are scores of seats for which there are more candidates on the Liberal side than places; but I cannot recall an instance where the Conservative interest is unnecessarily split up in the face of active opposition.

Mr. Mill has at last responded to the appeals of his supporters, and made his appearance before the electors of Westminster. The shrewd hard sense of his speeches, and the undeniable honesty of his language, have done much to win back for him the popularity which he had endangered by his long continued absence. He is not—and, I think, never can be—an effective popular speaker; his voice is too deficient in physical power; but it is clear he can speak well enough to hold his own in the House. Professor Cairnes, the author of the "Slave Power," Professor Fawcett, Mr. Hughes, and other leading supporters of the Federal cause, have addressed meetings in his behalf this week, with great success. On the other hand, he has even received advocacy from quarters not calculated to improve his chances. Henry Vincent, a third-rate Chartist orator, has delivered stump orations on his behalf; and a Mrs. Laws, who is said to be a spiritualist lecturer, astonished a British audience by rising up suddenly, at St. James' Hall, to give Mill the tribute of her support. Considering that Westminster is one of the most numerous and radical of our great constituencies, it may, perhaps, surprise you to learn what were the objections which the canvassers for the great political economist have had most often raised against their candidate, and have found most difficulty in encountering. In the first place, Mill's advocacy of female suffrage is bitterly unpalatable to the great majority of the constituency. Then there is an uncomfortable doubt on the part of the electors whether Mill's theory, as to the advisability of restricting the growth of the population in order to raise the position of the working classes, is altogether consonant with British notions of family life. And finally, a surmise that the matrimonial relations of the candidate for Westminster were not quite in accordance—not indeed with the principles of morality—but with the conventional prejudices of society, appears to have as much weight in the region of Tothill Fields as it would have in the adjacent district of Belgravia. However, in spite of these disadvantages, an impression is gaining ground amongst the electors that Mill would be the right man in the right place, if returned for Westminster; and this impression will, I hope, carry the day.

Since the defeat of the Government on the question of the Chancellor's conduct, the Tories have tried to make electioneering capital out of Lord Westbury's downfall by placarding the streets with the names of the Liberal members who voted for the impugned minister. But the attempt, as yet, has met with no response. A vote of censure—for Mr. Bouverie's motion was nothing less—directed against the highest legal authority of the kingdom—the official who, with the Primate of England, takes rank next after the princes of the blood royal, is a very grave occurrence, and one to which we can summon nothing similar since the days of Lord Macclesfield. But yet, whatever may be the cause, it has produced but little sensation in the country. In the first place, the charges on which Lord Westbury has virtually been condemned were not very clearly made out, nor are they of a distinct and definite character. It is not worth while to trouble you with a résumé of the Edmonds and Leeds scandals. It is enough to say the investigation showed convincingly that there had been great laxity in the administration of the Chancellor's patronage, that offices in the gift of the Crown had been bought and sold, and that these transactions had resulted, somehow or other, in the advantage of the Chancellor's own family. Now these facts were quite adequate in popular estimation to necessitate the Chancellor's withdrawal from office; but they did not prove actual corruption on his part. On the contrary, no evidence whatever was forthcoming to prove that Lord Westbury had derived any personal benefit whatever from the jobbing perpetrated through his own neglect of vigilance; and it was clearly shown that in the cases where he had connived at pensions being conferred on officials whom he had compelled to leave their offices for breaches of duty, he had no conceivable motive for compromising the matter, as it was in his power to have secured the immediate migration of the delinquent officials, supposing—as his accusers alleged—he wished to bestow their situations on members of his own family or their nominees. Then, too, the British public always has a sort of sneaking sympathy with anybody who jobs for his own family. "There is no selfishness in the world"—Helps says, somewhere—"like that of your respectable family man." The saying has much truth in it; the very strength of our national home feeling makes us "wondrous kind" to sins which have as an excuse the attachment of parents and children; and so everybody, in the House or out of it, felt that they themselves, in the Lord Chancellor's position, would have jobbed a little to help Mr. Slingsby Bethell or even the scapegrace Richard—whom his father is once reported to have described as "Honorable, but only by act of Parliament." And, more than all, the country had a conviction that, whatever the Chancellor's sins may have been, he was attacked rather from his personal unpopularity than from any indignation at his misconduct. There was, and is, about the man an almost sublime arrogance, that offended every one who crossed his path. Anything more superciliously offensive than his tone in addressing the House of Lords, as Speaker, cannot well be conceived. Nothing seemed to give him so much pleasure as an occasion of showing his contempt for the intellectual inferiority of less able men. As a specimen of his manner, I may mention a story which came to my knowledge. During the discussions on the Bankruptcy question, a deputation of eminent Manchester merchants waited on Lord Westbury to protest against some of the provisions of his act. After hearing their reasons for objecting, the Chancellor dismissed them with the following comment, delivered in that mild, mincing tone of his which in itself is almost an insult: "That, gentlemen, you should be utterly ignorant of the principles of law is what I anticipated; but it does surprise me to find that you know nothing of the rudiments of business." I plead guilty myself to a private belief that his grand law reforms were chiefly due to the satisfaction he felt in trampling on the prejudices and depreciating the interests of the profession to which he belonged. But, nevertheless, he was the only Chancellor we have had for many a long day who showed that he cared more for the interests of the public than of the lawyers, and as such he was held in esteem by the non-legal portion of the community.

The true history of the division, as far as I can learn it, I take to be this. The main object of the Government was to adjourn all discussion in the House till the elections were over. This object was in no small measure the explanation of the repeated delays in the production of the various reports, and of the hurried prorogation of Parliament. Last week it was believed the object had been attained, as the great majority of the members on either side had left town and were busy attending to their electioneering affairs. Mr. Ward Hunt's motion fell, like a bombshell, into the ministerial camp; clear notice was given of it on the Friday evening. Lord Palmerston, with his usual personal loyalty towards his colleagues, was anxious that the rejection of the motion should be made a Cabinet question, and intimations to that effect were, I believe, conveyed hastily to all the absent supporters of the Ministry. On both sides a tremendous whip was made; but the result by Monday morning was not encouraging to the Government. Under these circumstances Mr. Bouverie's amendment relieved them from a grave embarrassment. This amendment, though severely impugning the conduct of the Chancellor, acquitted him of any corrupt practices, and, what is more, directly dissociated the Ministry from any responsibility in the Chancellor's misdoings. Mr. Bouverie undoubtedly acted as an independent member; but I doubt so stanch a Whig as the member for Kilmarnock having drawn up his amendment without communication with the Ministry. Thus, when the decisive evening arrived, it was found that the fate of the Government was not to be decided after all by the issue of the debate. Mr. Ward Hunt, in behalf of the opposition, accepted Mr. Bouverie's amendment in lieu of the original motion; and the Government contested it without any very earnest vigor. Not a single leading member of the Ministry or of the Liberal party spoke strongly in the Lord Chancellor's defence. At the close of the debate, when it was clear the majority would be in favor of Mr. Bouverie, Lord Palmerston made one last effort to save his colleague. He moved the adjournment of the debate; and it was known privately, though not officially, that if the adjournment had been carried, the Premier would have announced the resignation of the Chancellor at the next sitting, and thus precluded the passage of any direct vote of censure. A great number of Liberal members, who would not have voted against Mr. Bouverie, voted for the adjournment of the discussion; but the feeling of the House was too strong for delay; and the Government sustained a damaging, though not a decisive, defeat. In former and bolder days, the Premier would, I think, have resigned office on receiving such a rebuff from Parliament. But the older he grows, the keener his passion for power appears to become. The Parliamentary drama was terminated not unworthily by the speech in which the Lord Chancellor announced his resignation to the Peers. The old defiant air was maintained to the last; and a position which in almost any other man would have been one of humiliation, was invested by Lord Westbury with a strange kind of dignity. In his official capacity he has no need to fear comparison with his successor. Lord Cranworth is a man of seventy-five, and has the reputation of being one of the worst lawyers and most inefficient officials who ever sat upon the woolsack. His appointment is doubtless only intended as a temporary one, till it can be seen whether the administration is likely to have a prolonged lease of office.

This week has witnessed the termination of a poisoning trial which will rank amongst the causes célèbres of English judicature. A Glasgow physician of good family, high standing, and considerable professional reputation, has been convicted of murdering his wife and mother-in-law by doctoring their food with repeated doses of antimony. The evidence against him was of the most conclusive character. It was shown beyond possibility of doubt that the unhappy victims died of antimonial poisons; that the prisoner, Dr. Pritchard, had been in the habit of purchasing unusual quantities of antimony with no assignable motive; and that the explanations he had given as to the illness of Mrs. Pritchard and her mother were obviously inconsistent with the known facts of the case. Moreover, it was clearly established that he desired his mother-in-law's death, in order to relieve him from pressing pecuniary embarrassments, while he might reasonably wish for that of his wife, in order to carry on an illicit connection he had formed with one of his maid-servants, to whom he had promised marriage in the event of Mrs. Pritchard's decease. After a lengthened trial, the doctor was condemned by a unanimous verdict, given after a very short period of deliberation. Growing as is the dislike to capital punishment in this country, no effort will, I expect, be made to save Dr. Pritchard's life. North of the Tweed the trial has created immense excitement, but in England it produced less interest than many cases of far less criminal notoriety. To make a regular "sensation" trial a lady must now be the alleged criminal. That element, at any rate, will be found in the approaching trial of Constance Kent.

I have no doubt you will receive from other quarters full accounts of the Fourth of July dinner, which was held on Tuesday last at Willis's Rooms, and at which I had the honor to be present. As an Englishman, I could have wished that the English element had been somewhat better represented; as I am sure it might have been, if the arrangements had been more carefully made. Mr. Potter, the member for Rochdale, is a very worthy gentleman, but he is hardly a fit representative of the public men in this country who have done what they could to move the sympathies of Englishmen in behalf of the cause of freedom in America. However, my own private opinion is that the Fourth of July is, and ought to be, a purely American, not an international festival: and I believe the gathering at Willis's Rooms was a very brilliant one as far as the American residents in London are concerned. The dinner was excellent; and the only defect was the overpowering heat, for which the elements have to account. I can never recollect so hot a summer. Every day the rain has threatened, but the threats have not been realized; and now farmers are beginning to fear that we shall have our rainy season at the critical period of the harvest.

A WORD ABOUT MUSEUMS.

BARNUM'S Museum is gone at last. It has fallen before that conflagration with which it has often been threatened, and which it has more than once barely escaped. The children will miss an accustomed place of amusement for their Saturday vacations. The occasional visitors to the city from the "rural districts" will no longer yield to its irresistible attractions. The worst and most corrupt classes of our people must seek some new place of resort, and other opportunities of meeting one another. A most dangerous man-trap is removed, and without loss of human life. These four considerations make the sober citizen of New York hesitate whether to regret this burning and destruction or not.

But there is another consideration. Were the lovers of curiosities—whether of natural history or of human ingenuity or of historical association—the more pleased by the existence of the collections which are now destroyed, or more insulted by their insufficiency, disorder, neglected condition, and obviously secondary importance? It is one thing to love shells and minerals, and to enjoy collections of them, but quite another to enjoy every collection of them. The more truly one loves a good collection well arranged, the more he will be offended by a chaotic, dusty, dishonored collection. The more one loves the order and system of scientific enquiry, the more he will feel personally injured by disorder and lack of system among the materials of scientific enquiry. The more one aspires to neatness, exactness, and care in his own private "cabinet," the more he will revolt at slovenliness in a larger and more public museum. And it is probable that no class of the community was less satisfied with the museum of Mr. Barnum than that class for which it would seem to have been originally intended.

This class is not an unimportant or even a small one. The host of readers whose favorite reading is natural science, the armies of listeners to lectures on geology, that large proportion of our boys and young men who collect and study "specimens" of minerals, all belong to it. The profoundly scientific are not those who care for public museums, unless containing this or that unique treasure. The frequenters of museums are those who cannot themselves give much time or means to the collection, classification, and study of specimens, but who read in the evenings, and would gladly see by day a larger number and a greater variety of helps to understand than their own limited time has sufficed to discover—than their own limited means have sufficed to procure. There are thousands of these earnest amateur students, whose amateur studies are not to be despised even by the profounder scholar. These would visit the lost museum rarely, early in the morning when no disreputable crowd was thronging it, looking along the crammed and disordered shelves in the hope of lighting on something which they wished to see, finding it or not as the blind deities of chance might order. Without scientific arrangement, without a catalogue, without attendants, without even labels, in very many instances, the heterogeneous heap of "curiosities," valuable and worthless well mixed together, could not attract our students very often or detain them long.

This class of visitors was never wholly ignored in the advertisements which announced to the world the charms of Barnum's Museum. The "million of curiosities" were mentioned, and their scientific value hinted at. These curiosities were never, so far as we are aware, turned out of the building to make room for fat women, giants, dwarfs, glass-blowers, mermaids, learned seals, and dog-shows. The aquaria had a certain attraction for the intelligent, and, in almost any other place, would have been worth frequent visits. Dog-shows in themselves are harmless and not without interest. We desire to give the late "American Museum" all the credit it deserves. For it needs it all. Its memory is not pleasant. It pandered to the most foolish curiosity and to the most morbid appetite for the marvellous. The most gross deceptions were shamelessly resorted to to cause a week's wonder and to swell the week's receipts. The "Lecture Room"—once a sort of "lyceum" hall, latterly a minor theatre in look and character—furnished for the entertainment of its patrons the most vulgar sensation dramas of the day. Its patrons were suitably entertained. It has been many years since a citizen could take his wife or daughter to see a play on that stage.

That respectable people never went to this so-called museum we do not assert. There were hours in the day when the halls were nearly empty; and, where certain shells, stuffed birds, and Indian relics are, there is always something to see. But we hold that the class of students of whom we have spoken deserve better mental fare than this dreary refectory could afford.

It is in behalf of this class that we ask for a real museum. It is in behalf of all classes of the community, except that vicious and degraded one by which the late "American Museum" was largely monopolized, that we ask the community for a building and for collections that shall be worthy of the name so sadly misapplied. Μουσειον, museum, musée; the word seems full of honorable meaning in every language but our own, and with reason. Home of the Muses, it means, and is akin to "music" and "musing," and to "amusement," too, which is a good word with a good meaning. Collections of animals belong to it, indeed, both living and prepared, collections of minerals and shells, of historical and personal relics, and not only these, but collections representative of all the arts, both industrial and decorative, fine art and artisanship. All those valuable things which men do not consume but keep (money, of course, as it has no value except to represent value, is not in itself a valuable thing, and is not included in our statement) have a home in a museum. And "American," "The American Museum!" when that name is again written across the front of a building, let it be a building worthy in itself and in its contents of the honorable and responsible rank which, by taking that name, it assumes.

The British Museum is a national institution, founded and supported by the revenues and the government of an empire. The American Museum of the future will be such another, and even more worthily lodged. It would be good taste if all local institutions, whether belonging to individuals, to companies, to cities, or to States, would adopt names less inappropriate to their natures. But as long as we have American institutes of various kinds, and American companies of many sorts, all incorporated under State laws and limited in their spheres of action by State boundaries, such observance of fitness as we might desire we certainly cannot hope for. Let New York City, then, create for itself an "American Museum." And let the thing itself be not unworthy of the name it rashly assumes.

By the perseverance and the intelligence of some, aided by a series of happy accidents, New York obtained a park, which was put into the hands of good managers and ingenious and conscientious artists, and was carried on by them to such a point of quasi completion that it can hardly be spoiled now, and is likely to remain for ever, to cause posterity to doubt the truth of the future historian's account of misgovernment and corruption in New York in the nineteenth century. Let us try to make our descendants still more incredulous on this point. Let us have a place of public instruction as well as of public enjoyment. Perhaps in the neighborhood of the Central Park itself would be the best place for it; let us establish it there, and try to draw encouragement and a stimulus to exertion from our beautiful neighbor.

Nearly every one who has travelled in Europe remembers something of European museums, even though it be but a shadowy image of them that his mind retains. Something of the wonders contained in that sombre temple in Great Russell Street, and something of the artistic treasures "put out of sight under the shadowy vaults of Kensington;" something of the Louvre and the Garden of Plants; something of the Green Vaults of Dresden, of the half-score museums of Berlin, and of the various Sammlungen of Munich—remains to help furnish forth everybody's pleasant reminiscences of his European trip. But perhaps there are few who have thought of this, that a museum should include, to be perfect—that any museum may include—all the different collections of all the different kinds. As a good example, more apt to be known to our readers than another, let us take the national collections in London.

The British Museum contains the following collections: 1st, the collection of manuscripts, to guard which the "Trustees of the British Museum" were first incorporated in 1753, and which was first exhibited in 1759; 2d, the library, at first small, increased to many times its original size by bequest of George IV., and now the second library in Europe in size, and the first in practical value—open to the public under wise restrictions, nearly six hundred thousand volumes strong, furnished with the best reading-room in the world, and rich in a world of curiosities and artistic treasures; 3d, the collections of natural history, divided into zoology, fossils, minerals, and botany, magnificent in every department and subdivision, and unequalled in many; 4th, the collection of portraits of sovereigns and famous men, now hung on the walls of the zoological galleries; 5th, the collection of antiquities—Egyptian, Assyrian, Greek, Roman, and British—including in its glorious assembling together of riches the famous Elgin Marbles, the Ninevite and other sculptures of Layard's and Rich's discovery, and the best collection in Europe of the oldest art of all, the art of Egypt; 6th, the ethnographical collection. These are under one roof, not large enough now to cover aright the overgrown and still growing collections.

Not far to the west of the British Museum is that ugly building in Trafalgar Square of which one-half is devoted to the Royal Academy of Arts and the other half to the "National Gallery—Foreign Schools." This collection of pictures, but a few years ago inferior to the collection of any of the great European capitals, has been enlarged within a few years, by great watchfulness and lavish expense, to respectable size and immense value. The English pictures, or part of them, were once in the same galleries, but they have gone still further west.

The "National Gallery—British School" is housed at South Kensington, in the upper story of an unpretending and purely utilitarian building of iron, or series of buildings rather, which bears the local, alliterative, but very appropriate name, "The Brompton Boilers." This name, Brompton, contended with the name of its neighbor village, South Kensington, for the honor of entitling the new region of the expanding metropolis and the national museum it contained. South Kensington has won, but the rival name is preserved in the popular appellation of the range of ugly buildings which are so fair within.

In the lower story of this edifice is arranged the "Museum of Ornamental Art." Into a minute description of this we have not space to enter. It is new—the creation of a half-score of years—an embodiment of the newly developed ambition of the British people and Parliament to be cherishers and patrons of the fine arts—made as private collections are made, by purchase in open market, but made with the rapidity and ease coming of an exhaustless purse and a resolute will—growing more rapidly every year; not in every respect well contrived, but already containing a splendid museum within itself, and destined soon to be developed into a near approach to completion.

Such are the national collections. Besides these, there is at Sydenham Crystal Palace a great gallery of casts from sculpture, ancient and mediæval, and from architectural sculptured ornament, which, or the like of which, should belong to Government, and probably will at some future time. The famous collection of living animals in Regent's Park belongs to the Zoological Society, but answers the purposes of a national collection in every respect except in the charge of a fee of entrance. To all the others is now to be added the contents of the old India House, a treasury of rarities which a few years ago, with the dissolution of the East India Company, passed into the hands of the Government. So the museum of London is very widely scattered, and lacks as yet worthy buildings to contain it properly. The English, perhaps, are willing to wait until their present labors in search of a good national architecture shall have been crowned with success. Their experiments in public buildings have compared but poorly with the very excellent private architectural work which has been done in Great Britain, and when, not long since, they were on the point of getting a really good building in London, the present venerable Premier put a stop to all that undertaking. Therefore it is cause for rejoicing that so many of the national collections have only temporary homes.

New York may have its choice of departments, and make collections of any kind. A good collection in any department is a work either of much money or of much time; and a very good collection requires both. New York can better afford to give money than time for her good collections, to begin with, for New York wants her museum at once.

There is talk of a joint stock company which proposes to have a museum and to pay a large profit in money to stockholders. It may be doubted whether a joint stock company can best do such work; whether the sum of three hundred thousand dollars is money enough to do it with; whether this particular enterprise, if successful, will give us what we want, or not rather another undertaking like Mr. Barnum's of yore, which Mr. Barnum himself, also in the field, will delve one yard below and blow to the moon—and then buy out. There is money enough to be had which will not seek pecuniary interest, intellect enough to be had, and experience enough to establish such a museum as we need, if only these three—money, intelligence, and experience—will come together and understand each other. Let New York beware lest Philadelphia and Boston should each step in before her and use the intelligence, the experience, the opportunity, the well stocked markets, and some part of the money which she should secure.

By statute the New York Historical Society is authorized to form a Museum of Antiquities and Science and a Gallery of Art, and is given for this purpose the old arsenal building in the Central Park, with as much ground as the Commissioners of the Central Park will allow. The Society, moreover, has authority either to use the building as it is, to alter it, or to remove it and build anew. The use of this present or future building is given for the use specified for ever, to revert to the Park Commission only on the removal of the collections forming the museum or gallery.

It is well to remember that gift, for it is out of this gift and by the influence and position of the Historical Society that such a museum as we want may perhaps be reared. The Society has already a good museum of Egyptian antiquities, a few Assyrian sculptures, historical relics, a library rich in one department, and among its pictures perhaps three or four of a certain value. It is strong in numbers and in the social standing of its members. It surely could not require an unreasonable amount of exertion on the part of such a body to raise what money is wanted and begin the so much needed work.

A society is incorporated, its incorporation dating from 1860, and is granted a portion of land in the Central Park for the formation of botanical and zoological gardens. This society, which has honorable and well-known names in the list of its incorporators, may perhaps be expected to act for us if the Historical Society will not. That more energy is needed in the action of the latter body than it showed in the matter of the Jarves Collection is evident, and that they will show this energy is not certain. We may well look at other companies, and consider what further means may be employed to secure the end we so much desire.

But of one thing let us be certain. No individual or stock company which may undertake to form and manage a museum as a way of making money will be of any great or permanent service to the community. Let those who are disposed to aid any of these movements remember this, that the efforts of an ingenious showman to attract popular attention and make money rapidly are not likely to accrue to popular enlightenment. It would not seem well to such a showman to spend money, time, and thought to make valuable antiquarian and scientific collections, classify and catalogue them accurately, and build a fitting and permanent building to contain them. Perhaps the British Museum, charging twenty-five cents admission fee, would take in less money in a year than did Mr. Barnum's old museum at the same price. Let the would-be stockholder invest his money in a proper enterprise properly guarded, and take dividends for his reward. Of his abundance let him give to the foundation of a real museum for his own enlightenment, the good of his children, and the honor and benefit of the community.

ARMY CORRESPONDENCE.

ITS QUALITY.

MASTERY in the art of war is said to be evidence of genius of the loftiest type. It may be held with equal justness, that to write the history of a war as it should be written, the highest attributes of the human mind are required. Great deeds can be exactly measured only by great minds. For to define and appreciate distinctly their motives, means, and results, he that essays their commemoration must in a measure reconceive them, and such a reconception is possible alone with natural gifts, if not absolutely, at least nearly similar.

Great historians are just as rare phenomena as great generals. Hence it would have been unreasonable to expect that managing editors could secure the services of first class historical writers as army correspondents. To insist upon a full possession of the qualities of eminent recorders of human events as a test of fitness for army reporting, would have been equally irrational on their part, and could only have resulted in frustrating their object. All they could do was to find the best material to be had, and to use it as best they could. Even if there had been an bundance of high historical talent in the country, very few journals would have felt warranted by their pecuniary circumstances in endeavoring to enlist it in their service by holding out adequate compensation. Had there been a plenitude of Bancrofts, Prescotts, and Motleys, it was not likely that weekly wages ranging from $20 to $50—no higher remuneration was paid by any paper to its correspondents during the war—would have induced them to serve the press with the armies.

There is in all human vocations an ideal mastery which is hardly ever reached. The task of army correspondents, defined according to a standard of absolute perfection, would appear superior, as to the quality of the intellectual means required and the professional ends to be attained, even to that of the historian proper. The former is called upon to record the events of the present; the latter, those of the past. A comprehensive grasp of mind, great power of observation and penetration, faculty for logical deduction, knowledge of human nature, concise, clear, and polished expression, would seem as necessary to the one as to the other. But upon the correspondent it devolves often to exercise these qualities amidst intense excitement and bewildering confusion, when oppressed with bodily discomfort, while the historian can bring them into concentrated play in the quiet and ease of his study. And, again, the former has to collect his material amidst the most trying difficulties, and, constrained by limits of time, hurry it at once into form, while the latter can both collect and elaborate it at his pleasure. Hence it would seem to imply no exaggeration to say that the perfect army correspondent possessed more eminent capacities than the historian.

But our civil war has produced no model army reporter. The very weight of duties imposed, the combination of talents required, the inherent obstacles to be overcome, rendered attainment of the ideal standard in this calling simply impossible. No human being, however gifted with strong physical senses and mental powers, could reach it without the additional gifts of omnipresence, omnivision, and supernatural capacity of intellectual production. Consider, for illustration's sake, the task of describing a battle in the time usually given to correspondents for that purpose. What one mind, in those frightful culminations of war, with the wide stretch of the lines of the hostile hosts, with the ever-changing roll of the waves of attack and defence, with the constant shiftings of positions, with the obstruction of observation by the nature of the ground, could absorb this vastness of mazy material while the conflict was raging, and upon its cessation forthwith mould it into a faithful reflection of reality? It is evident, indeed, that it would be unfair in judging the quality of army correspondence to apply the criterion of absolute excellence. To measure its merits and demerits justly, the intrinsic difficulties of the vocation, that rendered only relative success practicable, must be taken into consideration.

As before stated, there was a greater average of capacity among the army correspondents in the early than in the later stages of the war. Of these pioneers in this new branch of journalism, several were men of more than ordinary ability. Having no precedents to follow, no prototypes to imitate, they had to be their own teachers. The greatest perplexity they had to contend with was their entire want of military lore. For a thorough study of the organization of armies, of the properties and uses of the different arms, of grand and elementary tactics, of engineering and other coordinate branches of military science, with all of which as qualified recorders and critics of the events of the war they should have been more or less familiar, there was neither time nor opportunity. It is true, military judgment is acquired more from the practice than the theory of the art of war; but, on the other hand, the practice of years alone can in a measure make up for the lack of all theoretical knowledge. The more ambitious of the correspondents did their best to mend their defects in this respect, and managed to derive a sort of military smattering and command of technical terms from Jomini, Napoleon's Maxims, and other popularized works of this class.

Their début proper before the newspaper-reading world was made by the correspondents with the accounts of the first Bull Run campaign. Excepting a certain degree of verbosity and extravagance of language, some of the special reports of the New York and other journals were, as first attempts at writing of marches and battles, in point of form very creditable to their authors. But already at that time certain shortcomings became apparent that with the progress of the war grew more and more glaring—incompleteness of information, inaccuracy of statement, and a resort to fiction to heighten the dramatic interest of the narrative. The mass of the newspaper accounts of that shameful episode was sheer stuff of the most worthless and ridiculous description. In partial extenuation of this, however, it should be known that in the excited state of the public feeling in those days, it was deemed neither wise nor safe by most of the press to print the exact truth concerning that deep national disgrace—a restriction upon the free expression of correspondents that was frequently exercised on the occasion of subsequent disasters to the national arms, and must be kept in view in criticizing the performances of the correspondents.

In the Peninsula campaign some very fine letters were written to the press, but the average value of the productions of the reporters did not rise above mediocrity with some exceptions. They fell especially short of their task in the closing acts of that unfortunate military venture, when the public so anxiously looked to the newspapers for full intelligence. In the West the story of the capture of Fort Donelson was bunglingly told. Of the battle of Shiloh but one good account appeared in a Western paper. The amount of exaggeration, fiction, and falsehood relative to that bloody struggle with which the journals throughout the North were filled at the time was enormous. In connection with it the reprehensible practice of drawing solely upon the imagination for descriptions of decisive events, at a distance from the field of action, was first inaugurated by some unscrupulous correspondents, who from accident or dereliction of duty failed to be eye-witnesses. The preparation of fictitious reports became a regular trick of trade with quite a number in the course of the war. Some resorted to it to prevent the disappointment of their employers and a triumph of rival papers, others to cover up their own delinquencies. That this systematic falsification of history was practised so largely was due no doubt to a great extent to the countenance given to it by not a few of the managing editors. How extensively this journalistic "confidence game" with fictitious army reports has been carried on, the public has never known; and perhaps it is well, for the sake of the repute of the press, that it does not know more of the cheats of this kind which were imposed upon it.

The campaigns of Generals Fremont, Banks, and Pope, in the summer of '62 in Northern Virginia, were upon the whole well reported. Some accounts of the more striking incidents of those series of operations were excellent. The Antietam campaign gave occasion to the greatest successes accomplished by correspondents—the quickness and range of comprehension, fulness of correct information, and expeditious working up for publication displayed by a representative of one of the New York papers were truly admirable. The first Fredericksburg campaign furnished another great opportunity for distinction, improved, however, but moderately by few of the correspondents. Of the first battles in the Wilderness the same may be said. No events of the war gave rise to so angry and protracted a newspaper controversy as that produced by the carelessness of allegations and hastiness of conclusions of reporters as to the causes of that disaster. In '63, the crowning episode—the battle of Gettysburg—was reported in praiseworthy style by several.

In the West and Southwest, during the same period, no great things were accomplished by correspondents. The exploration of this field was deemed of much less importance by the Eastern press than a close following up of the varied fortunes of the Eastern armies, and its reports were scanty, and withal, save a few exceptions, of a low order. But one or two of the Eastern papers, naturally most interested in the operations west of the Alleghanies, were liberal enough in the first years of the war in the remuneration of their correspondents to make it an object for capable men to enter their service. Hence it was that neither the Murfreesboro, nor the Vicksburg, nor the Chickamauga campaign, nor any other of the major operations in the Western departments at that time, gave birth to many superior productions in the shape of army correspondence. A number of good letters were written, but the aggregate of success was far below that of failure.

With the close of '63, the epoch of "decline" alluded to in the first article commenced. From that time to the fall of the curtain in the grand national drama, a gradual depreciation in the value of army correspondence must have been noticed by every habitual reader of the daily papers. In '62 and '63, the reports of the more able and dexterous correspondents had steadily improved in quality under the effect of greater practical experience. The very reverse occurred after that. It would be unjust to say that this change for the worse characterized all of the journalistic followers of the armies in '64 and '65. Those of the old correspondents that continued in the field to the end lost nothing of their relative prestige. But they were very few in number, and formed in the last years so small a proportion of the army reporters considered as a body, that their still laudable performances were not adequate to redeem the profession from the discredit which the great majority of incapables brought upon it.

This deterioration was due in the main, as previously set forth, to the succession of an altogether inferior class of persons to the number of comparatively capable men who originally embraced the calling, but from various motives abandoned it after a more or less prolonged service in the field. The editorial managers did not of their own choosing fill the vacancies created by their retirement with the worse new material. Not finding it practicable to secure better men, and preferring, or compelled to accept by the strong demand for war news, a poor representation in the armies in place of none, they employed those they could have. These were, of course, men of low parts, acquirements, and character, writing army correspondence after a fashion and disgracing their calling. But they did not at first constitute the body of the profession. By degrees the number of this class increased, and the time arrived when incompetency in a thousand ways became the ruling characteristic of army reporting. It would be a curious, though hardly gratifying undertaking, to describe specifically the negative qualities and exploits of some of these latter-day correspondents; but only a generic characterization is here admissible. Among them were men whose antecedents should have excluded them for ever from any honorable profession. Not a few embraced the calling from inability to earn a respectable livelihood in any other. Corrupt, and following their new occupation only from necessity and with mercenary intentions, they were not long in becoming the servile tools of scheming officers, who sought with their aid notoriety and through it preferment, and rewarded them for their self-degradation with free quarters, liquor, and living. Others had good intentions, but no capacities. Men turned up in the army as correspondents more fit to drive cattle than to write for newspapers. With a dull or slow perception, incapable of logical arrangement of facts, innocent of grammatical English, they were altogether out of place in the positions they tried to fill. Many added to these defects a lowness of habits and vulgarity of manners that rendered them unfit for association with the higher ranks of the army, and confined them in their intercourse to like-minded subalterns. They could not and did not gain the respect, and with it the confidence, of those high in command, with whom to be on good terms was a prime condition of professional success. They got to be looked upon, as a distinguished general expressed it, "as intolerable but unavoidable nuisances."

What could be expected of these journalistic charlatans—of these sham war historians? Nothing better than what they produced. And thus the public was treated to so-called battle accounts, the pompous diction and meaningless verbiage of which might have done honor to Chinese gazettes. Thus, in place of a plain connected narrative of actual occurrences, allowing of correct conclusions, a mass of undigested matter, a maze of fact and fiction, from which no one could derive an intelligent conclusion, was served up. Thus shameless laudation of undeserving personages on the one hand, and reckless detraction from the merits of rival aspirants to public honors, superseded just comments and well founded criticism. History was falsified; reputations fabricated and destroyed; the judgment of the people vitiated; the faith of the public in the press shaken; the term "army correspondence" made synonymous with misrepresentation and mendacity.

Will any one familiar with the contents of the war columns of the leading journals during the last years of the rebellion call these strictures too severe? The constant contradiction of newspaper accounts by official reports; the continuous flow from the pen of correspondents of statements published and editorially commented upon as truths to-day, only to be authoritatively pronounced downright falsehoods on the morrow; and other abundant evidence of like bearing embodied therein, proves them well applicable.

It is, however, due to impartiality to state that the onus of responsibility for the comparative worthlessness of army correspondence towards the end of the war rests not with the correspondents alone. Their employers contributed no little to their demoralization, by encouraging them in improper practices. The intense rivalry between competing journals made their conductors set more store by early than by trustworthy news. They did not at all object, if their reporters, in order to beat rivals, sacrificed the accuracy to the expeditiousness of their accounts. To print the first, however incorrect and incomplete, intelligence was the height of their ambition. And it often happened to correspondents that, instead of receiving credit for trustworthiness, they were censured for tardiness, if, by taking more time to collect full and correct information, they were with their reports one day behind less scrupulous competitors.

Much has been said and written as to the service rendered to the country by the press through its army correspondence. That a strong ethical, political, and, by way of reaction, military momentum has been communicated to the war by the "mediators between the people and the army," as correspondents have been called, admits of no doubt. But whether more good or evil has been done by them directly as recorders and commentators, and indirectly as tuners of editorial writings, must still appear an open question. There is not a commander in the army that has not something to say about the injurious effect upon military operations of their indiscreet revelations. And is there any newspaper reader who has not been led into wrong views of events and unfounded personal prejudices through the same agencies? However, equally strong arguments can be made on the other side. As for the value, in conclusion, of army correspondence as material for history, we believe that the vexations which the historian must endure while toiling to separate the chaff from the wheat, will be likely to neutralize any feelings of gratitude which the discovery of useful matter may kindle in him.

SHIP CANALS.

At the recent International Convention of merchants, held in Detroit, this subject was brought up by the Committee on Commerce in their report.

For the reason that this appears to us a matter which should receive the attention of the Government, capitalists, and statesmen, we purpose saying something with regard to it. And we set out with the idea that the demands of the country require a ship canal from Albany to some point on Lake Ontario. Possibly this may be accomplished by the enlargement of the New York canals to a shipping capacity from Albany to Oswego, or perhaps it would be better to enlarge the Erie Canal the entire distance, as a matter of economy. This is a matter of minor importance, so that we connect the Hudson River with the lakes. Secondly, we want the Niagara ship canal; and, lastly, we want a similar communication from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River—making three canals which, in connection with the lakes, would form a direct line of water communication between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mississippi River. In the first place, a due regard to our national safety and security demand it. With this line of communication, in case of a war with England, it would take but a short time to run gunboats from the Atlantic seaboard and from the Mississippi to the lakes, and to organize a flotilla that would be formidable for either offensive or defensive operations. Our recent experience with the operations of rebel privateers upon the lakes should be enough to convince any one of the expediency and the imperative necessity of such a measure, as a guarantee of our security upon the frontier. In case of hostilities with England, it is fair to suppose that she would attempt to blockade the St. Lawrence River, and she would probably succeed. We are then shut out of the lakes, and must depend upon previous preparation or must build up a navy on the lakes. So far as previous preparation is concerned, under present circumstances, with but a single war vessel on the lakes, we should find ourselves in a sorry plight.

Happily, this is soon to be superseded by a different policy. Building up a navy after hostilities had actually commenced would be but the subjecting of every one of our towns situated upon the lakes to the mercy of an English navy, and every one of them would be laid in ashes before we were ready. This would never do. If ever we get into war with England, instead of receiving shot and shell in our defenceless cities, we should be in a position to put every Canadian town in range of our guns and overrun Canada immediately after the commencement of hostilities. With the exception of one town, this would not be impracticable, provided we could command the lakes.

Secondly, the commercial interests of the country also demand the adoption of this measure. Six years ago, the New York Central, the Erie, the Pennsylvania, and the Baltimore and Ohio roads were waging a suicidal war for through freight. How is it to-day? Not one of these roads is anxious about through freight. The war, to some extent, is the reason of this, but not the sole one. The largely increased railway traffic for the last three or four years is mainly due to the increased development of resources and increased production. The New York roads are able to live and declare a dividend upon the local trade that has sprung up, and have but little rolling stock disengaged for the shipment of Western produce.

We must have some increased facilities for the transmission of produce from the West, whose resources are as yet but imperfectly developed, and which will receive an impetus from the disbanding of our armies, as a large number of the discharged soldiers will go West to settle.

We are expanding in every direction. The time is not far distant when a railroad to the Pacific will be in running order. The embarrassments which our roads are now laboring under will then be doubled, and the capacity for carrying freight on all roads between New York and the Mississippi River will be immensely curtailed. Give us these ship canals, and the difficulty is obviated. New York must ever continue the metropolis of the country.

Goods for Western merchants can be shipped to the lakes, thence by a line of propellers to any point on the lakes, and thence to St. Louis, St. Paul, St. Joseph. In return these boats and propellers will bring back wheat and Western products, and put them in the New York or any other market at a lower price than can be done now. During the summer months the railroads would be largely relieved of this business, and be able to keep their rolling stock in repair for winter demands.

Everything should be done to diminish freights, call out competition, stimulate capital, and develop the resources of the country. The railroads are already inadequate to the demands upon them, and must every day become more so.

LITERARY NOTES.

THOSE who can look back for a period of thirty years may remember when the remarkable series of books, commencing with "The Natural History of Enthusiasm," followed up by "Fanaticism," "Spiritual Despotism," "Physical Theory of Another Life," etc., were among the works that most attracted the attention of thinking men, and impressed themselves most strongly on the leading minds who directed the current of theological speculation. Their author, Isaac Taylor, has just passed away at the age of seventy-seven, after a life of continuous literary labor, more resembling what we read of the scholars of the seventeenth century than the diffusive habits of the nineteenth. Nearly forty years elapsed between the publication of his first work, "Elements of Thought," and "The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry" in 1860. About thirty distinct books, besides translations, etc., testify to his industry. Many of them have taken a permanent place in literature. That Isaac Taylor, on the whole, occupies the rank as an author due to his great reading, profound learning, originality of thought, and mastery over a style at once bold, nervous, and picturesque, few will admit. The fact is perhaps owing to a certain independence of view that allowed no sect or denomination to claim him as their own, though his aid was eagerly accepted by all, as by the Evangelical party in his "Ancient Christianity"—perhaps the most damaging attack on the Tractarian doctrines that the entire controversy produced. The only outward incident of Isaac Taylor's life known to the public was his unsuccessful application for the professorship of logic and metaphysics at Edinburgh in 1836. His sisters, Jane and Anne Taylor, the friends of our youth, were the other best known members of the family, conspicuous in all its branches for mental cultivation, to which he belonged. They were Nonconformists or Dissenters; but Isaac Taylor, in the latter part of his life, conformed to the Established Church. His son, the Rev. Isaac Taylor, is a minister of it, and author of a late book displaying great philological research, entitled "Words and Places, or Etymological Illustrations of History and Ethnology."

—The sale of Mr. George Offor's Biblical library, mentioned in our paper of July 13, came to a disastrous conclusion on Thursday, June 29, when the premises of Messrs. Sotheby & Wilkinson, the auctioneers, were destroyed by fire, consuming the library of Mr. Offor and other collections that were to be sold during the present season, estimated at the value of from $300,000 to $400,000. Two days' sale of Mr. Offor's books had taken place when this deplorable fire occurred, at prices that were considered very satisfactory. The highest sum reached by any book was bid for No. 341 of the catalogue, a copy of the New Testament, printed by Whitchurche at London, in 1547, in small octavo: this brought £215 (for America, we believe). No other copy had ever been heard of, and, as it showed some remarkable omissions, etc., in the text, it was supposed the whole edition was purposely called in or suppressed. No. 165, a vellum manuscript old English version of "Epistles and Gospels," resembling, but not identical with, Wycliffe's translation, and richly bound in embroidered silk, with silver clasps, sold for £220. No. 275, the first edition of the English Bible, by Myles Coverdale, printed on the Continent, but where is unknown, in 1535, in blue morocco, sold for £135; twenty-two leaves were supplied in fac-simile, but the book is so scarce that no completely perfect copy is known to exist. The other rare editions brought excellent prices; the produce of the two days' sale being nearly £3,000. The progress of the fire was so rapid that nothing seems to have been saved. The library of the Earl of Charlemont, included in the loss, was a valuable one, being rich in Caxtons, Wynkyn de Wordes, early Shakespeare editions, illuminated MSS., etc. The firm that has met with this severe infliction claims an antiquity that has made it an institution in the world of letters. It was established in the year 1744, and has continued in the same business, as auctioneers of literary and fine art property, through various members of the same family and connection until now, when most of the great libraries, etc., disposed of pass through their hands. The late Mr. Sotheby was known as an author by several works on early typography and the origin of engraving, including "The Block Books of the Fifteenth Century," in three volumes folio.

—Peculiarly interesting to Americans is the fate of Baron Humboldt's library—a collection important in itself, and unique from its association with its owner, who had stamped a value on almost every book in it by his copious MS. notes and critical remarks. This was stored at Messrs. Sotheby's rooms, and is said to have been destroyed with the rest of the property there. It is to be hoped, however, that the loss is only partial. The entire library was (as is well known) purchased from Messrs. Asher, the booksellers of Berlin—who had bought it from Humboldt's faithful attendant, to whom it was bequeathed—by Mr. Henry Steevens of Vermont, the literary agent in London through whom most of the rare books in America have been procured. Mr. Steevens offered the collection to the Astor and other libraries, but failed to meet with a purchaser as a whole. He then printed privately a beautifully executed catalogue raisonnê of its contents, and by offering to sell the articles singly was able, it was understood, to dispose of the most valuable of them to public libraries and private collectors in the United States. It is hoped that in this way the choicest relics of Alexander von Humboldt may have escaped destruction and found a permanent resting place on the continent that he did so much to illustrate and make known to the rest of the world.

—Governor Colden's "History of the Five Indian Nations depending on the Province of New York" is now being reprinted by T. H. Morell, of 134 Fulton Street, from an almost unique copy of the original New York edition, printed by Bradford in 1727. It is only of late years that any copy of this edition has been discovered. It had never been seen by Mr. O. Rich, who passed a long life in the collecting of books in America, and its very existence was doubted. A comparison of it with the London reprint of 1747 shows some curious differences, proving that the book had been tampered with, unknown to the author and without his consent. Colden's dedication of the work to Governor Burnet is retained, but made nonsense of by being inscribed to General Oglethorp. The Indian speeches given at length by Colden are suppressed, and replaced by meagre abridgments. In fact, in the words of J. G. Shea, the competent editor of this new impression, "the whole work is so cut up and altered that no scholar can, in using the English edition, feel any confidence that he is quoting Colden at all." The book will be an exact fac-simile of the original, and as the first work on New York history issued in the colony by its first printer, must always possess an enduring interest independently of its historical value as mentioned above. The impression is limited to one hundred copies in octavo at five dollars, and twenty-five imperial octavo at twelve dollars each.

—Two volumes of unpublished writings by M. de Tocqueville will form the conclusion of the complete edition of his works now publishing in Paris under the supervision of his friend and colleague in his mission to America, M. Gustave de Beaumont. They contain a continuation of his work on the Ancien Régime in France, and also most interesting fragments, in a more or less complete shape, relating to the leading characters of the Revolution, intended to form part of a work that occupied the last years of the great French publicist's life, the subject of which was the political reconstruction of France as effected by Napoleon Bonaparte. Many other papers of value are given for the first time, including personal memoranda of travels in England, Ireland, Algeria, Switzerland, etc. For American readers the whole ought to appear in an English dress, and would well repay any publisher who should attempt it.

—It may interest the amateurs of a rising fine art manufacture in this country to know that the number of stained glass windows of a high class historical character, excluding simply decorated or pattern examples, executed every year in England, is estimated at seventeen hundred, costing more than one hundred thousand pounds. One of the most potent agents in the revival of what was considered to be a lost art was Mr. Charles Winston, a barrister, lately deceased, who devoted himself to its study, theoretically and practically, giving the manufacturers all the benefit of his researches. A new edition of his "Inquiry into the Styles of Ancient Stained Glass," the leading work on the subject, is now in press, and will shortly be published by Messrs. Parker of Oxford.

—In a clever book of real research, a history of the English Post-office, entitled "Her Majesty's Mails," the author, Mr. Lewins, gives some new information respecting an English worthy—Ralph Allen, the friend of Pope and the prototype of Fielding's Squire Allworthy in "Tom Jones," who has hitherto derived his celebrity more from his literary friends than from any knowledge of his own claims to notice. Mr. Allen was in reality, however, the Rowland Hill of the last century, as far as postal improvement was concerned. His memorials, agreements, etc., with the department are quoted by Mr. Lewins, and show a combination of intelligence and quaint simplicity thoroughly in keeping with the character of the man. He was the first to devise direct means of communication for letters between the different cities and towns of the kingdom without their previous transference to London. He obtained the necessary grant for the purpose while postmaster at Bath in 1719, and retained it by successive renewals till his death in 1764, when this business—of the "Cross Posts," as it was called—had grown to such gigantic proportions as to be unmanageable, and it was taken possession of by the post-office authorities themselves. An account left at his death, in his own hand, showed that the net profits of his contracts averaged over £10,000 a year, or during his official life amounted to nearly half a million sterling. In what spirit he spent it, the line of the poet which bids him continue to sufficiently testifies. Among other curious facts is mentioned that the rebellion of 1745 so disturbed his postal arrangements that the subsequent agreements contained a clause for his indemnification in the event of a fresh irruption of Jacobite rebels from Scotland.

"Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame,"

—Mr. Hall's arctic experiences, "Life with the Esquimaux," published here by Messrs. Harpers, has met with the success in England that its merits deserve, and a new edition is announced at the price of seven shillings. The first issue was in two volumes octavo at twenty-four shillings. We notice the fact as an illustration of a practice habitual to the English book trade, and one that we think might often be followed with advantage by publishers in the United States. Here, the prevalence of stereotyping every book fixes its size and price, so that it is very rare for any alteration to take place in either of them. There, where stereotyping is the exception, on the sale of a first successful expensive edition, it is customary to issue the following ones at a lower price, so as to bring them within the means of different classes of purchasers. Thus Mrs. Gaskell's "Life of Charlotte Brontè" (to take a familiar example) was originally published in two volumes, price twenty-four shillings; the second appeared in one volume for seven shillings and sixpence; and the third was brought out, in a small size, for half a crown, or two shillings and sixpence. If more discrimination was exercised by publishers, stereotyping—which excludes improvements and perpetuates things obsolete—would be more sparingly adopted, and the consequence would be that publishers' profits, at the end of twenty years' business, would not all be sunk in old plates, only worth so much per pound, as they too often are under the present system.

—The new book of travels, "Wanderings through Eastern and Central Arabia," by William Gifford Palgrave, acquires, from the singular career of its author, an interest almost as great as that derived from its freshness and novelty. Mr. Palgrave was formerly a student at Oriel College, Oxford, but, from extreme High Church notions, declined being ordained a clergyman. He then went out to Bombay as an officer in the Indian army and served five years. Becoming a Catholic, he left his regiment (the 8th Native Infantry) and entered the order of Jesuits. He studied at Rome and in France, was ordained priest, and sent to Syria as missionary, where he labored with great zeal for ten or twelve years, being conspicuous for his opposition to the Protestant missionaries of the various orthodox sects. He preached in Arabic at Beyrout and throughout the Lebanon region, displaying an unequalled knowledge of the language. It appears to be during this stage in his career that the journey recorded in his book was performed, as, by a combination of rare occurrence to an Englishman, he alludes to his expenses being paid by Louis Napoleon while he was reporting to the Superior of the Jesuits. Returning in safety from his year's sojourn among the wild Wahabees, his adventurous story was not ended, for within a few weeks he has made public recantation of the Roman Catholic faith at Berlin, and is about proceeding to Bagdad as Prussian consul-general there. Mr. Palgrave was probably aided by his descent in his assumption of an Eastern character and habit. His father, Sir Francis Palgrave, the historian, was by birth a Jew, really named Cohen, and Mr. W. G. Palgrave's portrait shows strongly marked Semitic features. As a record of a route through a country hitherto secluded even from modern enterprise, his travels rank first among the publications of the year. They evince great literary ability, but are rather too full and abounding in recondite information to make a book suited for popular reading.

—The taste, or it may almost be called passion, now prevalent in New England for family history, is a pursuit so truly conservative, in the best sense of the word, and so allied to much that constitutes true national feeling, that it is above all important it should be based on stable foundations. We were surprised, therefore, to see in a late number of the "North American Review," in an article on "Heraldry in New England," respectful reference made to the compilations of Sir Bernard Burke as authorities worthy of consideration. That that gentleman is a mercenary charlatan, apparently born for the confusion of a science once dignified by the labors of Dugdale and Camden, is now pretty generally understood. A little book by a Scotch antiquarian, entitled "Popular Genealogists, or the Art of Pedigree Making," lately published, is sufficient to convince the most incredulous of the ignorance or corruption (there is no escape from the dilemma) that could impose on the public such statements as are found in his books. By way of illustration, two pedigrees are examined at length, one of them that of a certain Mr. Coulthard, a Scotch banker, who apparently sighs for heraldic illustration, and is accordingly furnished by the accommodating "Ulster king-at-arms" with a pedigree, deducing his family in a right line from "Coulthardus, a Roman viceroy of Britain," supported by fictitious quotations from Tacitus and Bede, spurious references to charters, forged seals, documents, etc., in a manner so absurd to those who understand the subject, that Thackeray's mock pedigree of the Muggins' family from "Hogan Mogan of the Hundred Beeves, Prince of North Wales," becomes serious in comparison. How valuable an aid genealogy, when intelligently studied, affords to history, is well evidenced in Messrs. Sanford & Townsend's "Great Governing Families of England," just published in two volumes octavo by Messrs. Blackwood. It traces historically and biographically the origin, progress, and present relations of the thirty or forty families most conspicuous at the present day for their influence and connection with great affairs of state. In pure genealogical inquiries there is only one English work that can be entirely relied on, "The Noble and Gentle Houses of England," by Mr. Evelyn Philip Shirley. It contains a brief account of every family in England that descends in the male line from ancestors who occupied positions of estate and honor in the country previous to the year 1500, and who still possess enough of their ancient domains to be considered "lords of the soil." After that date the seizure of the Church lands at the time of the Reformation brought in a host of parvenus, who must not be confounded with the ancient gentry of the land. These conditions are strictly adhered to, yielding many curious results. Some counties afford no families that can stand the test, and many well known and pretentious names are "conspicuous by their absence." The entire number still extant in England is something between three hundred and four hundred, less than one half of whom are found in the peerage.

—The Weekly Bulletin of San Francisco gives some startling statistical notices of the progress of literature on the Pacific coast. The number of bound books scattered through the State of California is roughly estimated at two million volumes, and already almost every city, town, and village in the State has its public and circulating library, some of them numbering from ten to twenty thousand volumes. An example peculiarly worthy of imitation is given by the "What Cheer House," a hotel which offers for the use of its inmates a well-selected library of five thousand volumes. This is really a step in advance of the rest of the world in social science, of which California may be proud. The manufacture of books has already made fair progress, many of the legal works—the State laws, etc.—in general demand being supplied by home production. One, at least, of these, General Halleck's "International Law," has been sold extensively in Europe, and offers no outward mark of inferiority of "getting up" when placed by the side of books of English and French manufacture. The sales of two bookselling firms alone in San Francisco are estimated to exceed four hundred thousand dollars per annum. One of them frequently purchases at a single order from five hundred to a thousand copies of the popular books brought out here by Harper and other publishers. The editor well observes that with such a flood of Anglo-Saxon influence pouring over the land, the prospects of the Latin race on the Pacific coast are not such as to give rise for much alarm.

—A collected edition of the writings of W. J. Fox, late M.P. for Oldham, is proposed to be issued in England, and will form twelve volumes in handsome library style. Mr. Fox was an influential member of the most advanced liberal party. His position in the House of Commons was peculiar, as for many years (and we believe while sitting there as representative of the borough of Oldham) he was the "stated minister" of a congregation in Finsbury. As a public speaker he exerted himself most conspicuously during the Anti-Corn-Law agitation. Lately, his influence has been exerted more through the press. His "Lectures on Religious Ideas," on the "Corruptions of Christianity," and on "Christian Morality," are the best known of his writings. They will be included in the proposed collection, with his Anti-Corn-Law speeches, selections from his writings in the "Westminster" and "Retrospective" Reviews and other periodicals. Though essentially a man of the people, there was nothing of the demagogue, either personal or literary, about Mr. Fox. He was a writer of great elegance and finish of style, and a gentleman of scholarly and retiring habits, whose fine head reminded one of the portraits of Dr. Franklin.

—Alas for the poets, that fine and impalpable essence, the subject of so many apostrophes—the "balmy breath of spring"—is no longer a mere figure of speech, but a substance whose presence is tested and its action measured by philosophers. For ten years past M. Houzeau, a French naturalist, has been engaged in experiments of the greatest delicacy for the purpose of determining the relations to the atmosphere of the difference in amount of animal and vegetable life at the various seasons of the year. He has shown to the eye, by means of peculiar test paper of his own invention, how a potent chemical activity becomes susceptible in March, reaches its maximum in May and June, sensibly and gradually diminishing to quiescence in summer, autumn, and winter. The nature of this mysterious agent and its relation to the known constituents of the atmosphere are still unsettled.

—The fifth and apparently concluding portion of Bishop Colenso's "Critical Examination of the Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua" is just published. It contains three appendices—On the Israelitish origin of the sanctuary at Mecca; on the Psalms; on the Phœnician origin of the name I.A.O. At the last census taken of them, the separate pamphlets and works called forth in reply to Dr. Colenso exceeded one hundred and fifty in number, but none of these has been considered by him of sufficient importance to call for a distinct answer. Distrusting the powers of the pen, his opponents have lately applied themselves to get possession of the purse, or, in other words, the payment of his episcopal stipend is vexatiously suspended, owing to the proceedings of the Bishop of Cape Town, and can only be enforced by a tedious Chancery suit. As a mark of respect for the independence of the man, and their condemnation of so illiberal a mode of annoyance, a committee consisting of most of the foremost men of the liberal party in church and state, has been appointed for the purpose of forming a fund for presentation to Dr. Colenso. The amount raised at the first meeting was £1,500. Among the supporters of the plan are Professors Jowett and Kingsley, Rev. F D. Maurice, George Grote, and other eminent names in science and literature.

THE GAYWORTHYS.*

We look upon this as a remarkable book. It has in it that without which a good novel cannot be, namely, genius; it has in it that without which a good novel may be anything but a good work, namely, much sound morality and pure religion.

We find within its very pretty covers a noble theory of life, fine thoughts concisely expressed, and a peculiar kind of quaint pathos, of which the parting of Jaasaniah Hooys and his wife is a fair example; and as to its humor, the man that can read the very first page through without conducting himself like one who takes Punch, may reasonably flatter himself that nature has forborne to impose upon him that dangerous gift, a sense of the ludicrous.

The heroine, Miss Sarah Gair, is a sweet, modest, good little girl, both spirited and spiritual, and has, moreover, the distinction of being—so far as we can remember—the only lovely bearer of her somewhat homely Christian name in all fiction. She never does anything really to forfeit our regard and interest from the moment when she stands in those "house-boots, haughtily erect, motionless, in a pig's pail," to the climax of her long, trying, and adverse little fates; for we feel a strong assurance, from the rest of her conduct, that her being forced by circumstances to overhear Wealthy's conversation with Captain Vorse and his mother, and to look over the manuscript in Grace Lowder's book, are "exceptions," which, as the sophists logi cally say, only "prove the rule" that nothing will ever make her do so again. Jane is odious, but not more so than she is meant to be and ought to be. We fear—alas for human nature!—that she is a natural character; and the piece of practical justice that falls to her at last is so complete and so awful that the reader must pity and entirely forgive her. Prudence Vorse, withholding the four cents too many a quart, bestowing the valuable plum-cake upon the would-be extortioner, and restoring the single strawberry that has not been paid for, is excellent, not only in herself, but in contrast. Gabriel is as affecting in his long years of self-devotion to his father as in his death-bed offering to his mother; and when his patience has had its perfect work, we rejoice, with a joy that it does the heart good to feel, with him and his Joanna. Gershom and Blackmere are interesting, though too much alike. The author, indeed, repeatedly shows a tendency to call up the characters in pairs. In most instances they are merely twins, but, in this, too nearly doppelgänger. The sweet saint Rebecca's losing the love of her worldly-minded spiritual guide by following to the letter his unworldly doctrines, is a stroke as true as striking. Honest, faithful, shrewd Eben's characterizing of the "man that was livin' a me-more, and keepin' a diary accordin'," ought of itself, if there is any gratitude in novel-readers, to be enough to keep his memory green. And we are as sorry as the lawyers must have been glad to see the last of the worthy witness, Biddy Flynn; for the author scarcely excels more in the setting forth of New English than in that of Irish peculiarities.

We look upon this book as remarkable, again, because, written so soon after one so popular—and by the same pen—as "Faith Gartney's Girlhood," it is so superior to that. "Faith" had her merits; her Aunt Henderson and nurse Sampson were, apart from their "shocking bad manners," pretty sensible women; and she was certainly glorified by Glory McWhirk. But her moral!—we are a moral nation, and must always take the moral into consideration—what was it? In so far as it was: If it is the day of small things with thee, do thy small things "with thy might, etc.," it was a good moral—in so far as it was: If thou dost not love thy lover, do not marry him out of pity, but, for pity's sake, tell him so! But, in so far as it was: Be thine own seamstress, thy father's cook, and thy little brother's nursery-maid, and thy heart shall be turned from thy true-love, a manly man and a gentlemanly gentleman, and to the æsthetic parson who goeth about calling thee "my child," and grasping people by the hand "promiscuously, as it were," it was a terror to well-doers, and what Touchstone, less nice in epithets than we, might have called "a very vile" moral.

The style, however, is not yet such as quite to do justice to the matter. We have heard it censured—and it seems to us, we must own, with reason—for a certain "jerkiness" or "snappiness," which apparently comes, notwithstanding, from the contemplation of bad models as much as from any defect in the intellectual constitution of the writer. The geniuses of our side of the world can hardly keep before their consciences too constantly, or too carefully, the immortal criticism of Lord Byron upon Mrs. Hemans: "A poet, too, but too stiltified and apostrophic, and altogether quite wrong." The forementioned defect is, in the present case, made the more glaring by ungraceful and abrupt punctuation. The sense is too needlessly interrupted and jangled for want of simply good proof-reading.

No publishing establishment is complete without this. A novelist, not "sticking to his last," might write a new novel in the hours he may now spend in vain in to-and-fro endeavors to put a period to his own perplexities, and semi-colonize his semicolons aright, until, with his spirits dashed over his dashes, and his brains turned among his inverted commas, he is driven to curse his stars on account of his asterisks. And as the most brilliant parts by no means involve an intuitive perception of the mysteries of stops, so neither does a thorough acquaintance with the mysteries of stops demand the most brilliant parts. Why does not a little of the superfluous womanhood of "high-scholarly" New England drain itself off into this slough of despond and teach it to blossom like the rose? We see no reason why any number of a class of well chosen, sharp-witted, energetic Yankee girls, who should be drilled in the "Treatise" and under the eye of the accomplished Mr. Wilson, of School Street, Boston, could not be enabled to read proofs as they ought to be read, and to send them up to the writer unquestionably correct in every point, or at least sufficiently so for all common purposes, setting him free to concentrate his own attention on his own errors of thought or word. What an amount of time, trouble, mortification, and money might thus be saved to author, publisher, typographer, and stereotypographer!

In the meanwhile, in saying our au revoir to this author of "The Gayworthys," we can but beseech him or her, at all events, to forbear to abuse his or her deserved popularity by sanctioning the use of such expressions as "would better" for had better, or "the beach"—which means, or ought to mean, some one beach in particular—for the sea-shore, which includes all beaches. Before adopting new graces of deportment, it is safest to look in the glass; before adopting new graces of idiom, it is safest to look in the dictionary.

A WOMAN IN THE PULPIT.*

THAT women should extemporize on the duty of men is natural and inevitable, but that any should formally preach a new gospel of married life, and expose the coarseness and frigidity which have been sanctioned by priestly lips and paternal benedictions, is striking enough to make of every man a point of interrogation. Such a book as Gail Hamilton's "New Atmosphere," written by a maiden lady somewhat advanced in life, is at once a literary and physiological curiosity. It also illustrates the condition of women in New England, and very well serves as the cry of "the twenty-nine thousand girls" who, we are told, in Massachusetts, have no prospect of marriage unless they migrate from their native State. Every great social fact, sooner or later, finds its written expression.

"A New Atmosphere" is a book which New England cannot shelve as a tract. It is the cry of its women. In many respects it is the résumé of the wants and thoughts of all women who are other than passive beings. In diction, in point of view, in wearisome and fluent amplification of simple thoughts, it is the secular supplement of all the sermons that have been preached in Massachusetts from the time of Cotton Mather to Southside Adams.

The striking reproduction of the preacher's style is too obvious and persistent in the writings of Gail Hamilton to escape consideration. All of them, especially "A New Atmosphere," presuppose a parish or a congregation. "A New Atmosphere" is a series of sermons, in which, sermon-like, the exordiums are formal, the statements exact, the perorations vague and moral. Every other sentence is rounded; and even old Dr. Johnson never sought more persistently for sonorous words and formal balance. Her habit of expression is broken with a series of sharp, curt sentences in the language of the street. Thus we have for a result a lusty hybrid style—a style produced by the union of the pulpit and the newspaper, that serves to catch the ear, and often makes sound conceal the absence of thought. Its movement is generated by the modern element; the structure and diction is determined by the pulpit. At the conclusion of certain paragraphs it is impossible not to fancy one hears the increased movement of fans—impossible not to be aware of the unrest of heated ladies, the sensation among anxious mothers—impossible not to see the dry wise smile of old men, while all alike listen to the clever exposition of the new gospel.

How are we to receive this gospel for the women of our country? Are we to laugh it down? Are we to write it down? Are we to sneer it down and cover it with "unclean criticism?" Better that we winnow it, measure the wheat, let the chaff go, and accept the book as a help to higher and sweeter living in the bonds of matrimony. It is fearfully exposed to satire; and whoever wears the cap and bells of the jester may annotate it to make laughter for men. But we will not sit in the seat of the scorner to interrupt her work in the pulpit. As critics, we must regret her style, though at times she is even eloquent; it is muscular, ungraceful, and wants taste, and does not attain the artistic. We deprecate her tone; we know that she is fluent, and saved from the common place only by restlessness and earnestness. But because she pleads for a higher life—because she assails coarseness and brutality in men—because she proclaims to twenty-nine thousand sisters in her native State that they may be happy and useful women, even though destined never to know the happiness of wife and mother—and because she increases strength, we forgive her for being noisy and devoid of art. We forgive her that she shrieks out her thoughts so that they are bizarre and unpersuasive. She wants mellowness, harmony, artistic perception of life. If the wives and mothers of the country want to reform the men, they must address them differently. Womanhood can hardly conquer in this way. But so long as New England women remain as they are, they need the help of a woman in the pulpit, and Gail Hamilton attracts a large crowd, stirs life in stagnant places, and is entitled to the thanks of both men and women, even though she is a Philistine reforming Philistines, and has not herself enjoyed the promised land.

IN MEMORY OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.*

THOSE Americans may be truly commiserated who were compelled to spend the whole, or any considerable part, of the last four years away from their country. They can never bridge over the hiatus in their lives. The history of that period is for them a matter of books, and letters, and hearsay, but is beyond the reach of their personal experience. He was an exile from the times who wandered abroad while the national temper rose from the first overt acts of secession to the white heat of Sumter. The programme of rebellion, having been thoroughly played through once, is not open to calls for a repetition—so the people have decided. Those who missed the sensation of Bull Run, the Peninsula, Antietam, Gettysburg, Atlanta, Charleston, Richmond, have lost some precious knowledge of their fellow-citizens along with the common suffering and common joy for which those landmarks stand. No description will compensate for a forfeited share in the emotions which stirred the face and the depths of the loyal North in the painful striving for national existence. Least of all, perhaps, can the absentee conceive the universal feeling on the assassination of President Lincoln.

Oftener in the late civil war than at any time since the Revolution, the pulpit has given expression to the popular sentiment and been looked to for strength and guidance. The sermons collected by Messrs. Tibbals & Whiting partake of both these functions, having been preached on the Sunday immediately following the murder or at a reasonable interval afterwards, and combining a reflex of the state of men's minds with such lessons of consolation and encouragement as were naturally suggested by the solemn circumstance of grief. The book is therefore a photograph of the spirit of a single community, under the intensest excitement known to the present age, and will afford a correct if not a realizing idea of the general scene from which it is taken. Or perhaps we ought to liken it to a geological specimen, which is an aid to the imagination, but of which a bag-full or a cabinet-full is a paltry substitute for a walk through a mountainous district. Still we have indicated one class of readers who will accept with avidity the nearest approach to reproducing a past in which they did not participate; and many who were on the spot will cherish a memorial volume of this sort to freshen tehir recollection when time shall have dimmed the original impression.

Few men, such was the transparency of his character, have left so little ground for disputing their epitaph as Mr. Lincoln. He bore the dangerous title of "honest" so fittingly that his most unscrupulous political opponents could never turn it to ridicule or shame. A frankness which admitted the world into confidence relieves the biography of the departed of all enquiry into occult motives, and of all defence of questionable deeds. He was thoroughly straightforward and sincere in his utterances, though a quaint habit of displaying the difficulties in the way of a given conclusion, instead of the conclusion itself to which he had arrived, sorely puzzled more than one delegation to the White House when he subsequently acted contrary to their expectation. It is this admirable quality which renders the portrait drawn of him by twenty clergymen less faithful than that from his own hand. The compilations of the American News Company and of the Rev. Edward E. Hale, of Boston, are designed to allow Mr. Lincoln to speak for himself and to build his own monument. The former confines its quotations almost wholly to his career as the Chief Magistrate of the republic, while the latter is unrestricted by dates. The one, again, aims to make its record complete as far as it goes, the other to preserve only the choicest sentences from his speeches and writings, to illustrate his thoughts on political systems, slavery and anti-slavery, faith, and internal improvements—according to Mr. Hale's classification. As books of reference, the two are quite distinct in usefulness, superior each to the other for certain purposes. "The President's Words" commends itself to the public by its convenient size—hardly too large for the pocket—and by the brevity of its contents. The Gettysburg speech and the last inaugural, though printed in full, are still in keeping with the prevailing fragments, and are destined to be the foremost of the household words embalmed in this small volume, of which the attire is unexceptionable, and as simple in its elegance as the martyr in his greatness.

DISCOVERIES AND INVENTIONS.

Some discussion is going on in regard to raising poppy for opium. We have just talked with a former overseer of an opium plantation in Smyrna, and some of his information is worthy of notice. An acre of land set to poppy produces about thirty pounds of opium on the average; some years double this, and a few seasons less. The juice which exudes from slits made in the poppy-heads just before they ripen constitutes the gum opium of commerce. This juice is allowed to collect on the stalk, and scraped off when it becomes nearly dry; it is then put up in cases for market. In this country the heads would have to be cut off at the proper time and the juice expressed, which is a quicker process; and the juice remaining in the heads after pressure could be macerated in alcohol and water, and made into laudanum or morphine. Opium is worth about fifteen dollars a pound. The amount annually sold in the world is estimated at thirty million dollars, while many put it as high as seventy million. In raising poppy little labor is bestowed on it, except in weeding and keeping off insects. Cheap labor answers the purpose, and it may be cultivated for twenty dollars an acre yearly. Allowing fifty dollars an acre for expenses, we should find fifty acres of opium, at thirty pounds to the acre, is fifteen hundred pounds; at fifteen dollars the pound, would be twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars for the fifty acres—less interest and other incidental expenses. The soil required is light sandy loam.

—To make peaches grow without stones, an agriculturist who has tried it with success says: "Turn the top of the tree down, cut off the ends, stick them into the ground, and fasten so with stakes; in a year or two these tops will take root, and when well rooted, cut the branches connecting these reversed and rooted branches with the tree proper, and this reversed peach tree will produce fine peaches without stones." The same experiment may be tried with plums, cherries, and currants.

—Is gun-cotton a good substitute for gunpowder? This question is being debated, and trials made in Russia and France with remarkable results. The objection to its use as heretofore prepared has been that its explosion was too rapid, but a Russian chemist has been preparing it from the cotton rope or twisted fibre, the process being simple, merely taking cotton rope and saturating it with nitric acid four parts, fuming sulphuric acid one part, when it becomes highly explosive, but somewhat safer. One pound gives as much explosive power as five pounds of powder. It has many qualities to recommend it. It burns without leaving residuum or dirt, does not foul the gun, is not affected so easily by dampness, and for torpedoes, fort mining, and also for blasting rocks, it is certainly superior to powder. It may be made by any one though not an expert, and, if a miner be short of powder, he could manufacture enough gun-cotton in one day to last him a year. If the Petersburg mine had been exploded with gun-cotton the result would have been very different. Hell Gate rocks can be broken with far less trouble than one imagines. In an experiment made in Russia, one pound under water burst a rock on which fifty pounds of powder had been tried without effect.

—Meerschaum is made on a large scale in this city by saturating carbonate of magnesia in silicate of soda or soluble glass—care in selecting a good quality of magnesia and silicate being the only requisite for success. The profits are immense, as will be seen. Magnesia costs about twenty-five cents per pound, and silicate of soda even less; a pipe made of the "foam of the sea," as smokers verily believe, costs for material about five cents, leaving the balance for labor.

—Superheated steam has been known to be cheaper than common steam, but no success has been attained heretofore in producing and applying it, from the difficulty of securing sufficient heat. But we notice that some one in Chicago has applied the correct theory to a practical and economical use. In place of the common boiler he heats a sort of retort red hot, and while at this heat the water is forced into the retort or boiler in the form of spray, when it is immediately superheated and expanded with powerful force. It is well known that water thrown on to a red hot iron forms into globules, and does not touch the iron, being held in mid air as it were, while the iron is not cooled unless too large a quantity of water is thrown on. We know but little of the experiment, which has been pronounced a great success, but presume a proper proportion of water is used and that the boiler is not perceptibly cooled by the water thrown on. To make his invention complete, he should decompose this steam and form a gas to heat his retort, when the machine would be perfect. As it is, if we remember, he uses about half the fuel used by engines of the same power in the common boiler.

—Before the war one or two factories for the refining of cotton-seed oil was started, and the article found ready market—dealers being often deceived by the resemblance to olive oil. It brought about two-thirds the price of the finest salad oil; but the war closed the supply of seed and crude oil; but, as the markets are now opened, we may expect this branch to receive some attention. The crude oil from cotton seed is made for about twenty cents a gallon, and for a cheap paint oil it answers a good purpose, while the refined costs but about five cents a gallon more, and its uses are as numerous as olive oil. It may be used for burning, for lubricating, for woollen manufactures, for soap-making, and for all the uses to which olive oil is adapted this oil will answer. We have some before us now as sweet and pure as the celebrated Butti oil, for which four dollars per gallon is paid. The apparatus for refining the oils is very simple and cheap, and the waste of tons of seed at the South can only be explained by ascribing it to the apathy bred by slavery.

—Cream tartar substitute, or superphosphate of lime, the substance used for making flour self-rising, is made from the waste sulphuric acid of the petroleum works on a large scale, and a late process is substantially as follows: To 1,000 lbs. of the acid is added an equal quantity, by weight, of water. The oil soon rises to the top, is taken off, and then 1,400 lbs. of burnt bone is added, stirring meanwhile; it should then be evaporated with gentle heat in a shallow vessel, adding pulverized calcined bones in the proportion of ten pounds to each ten gallons of the solution at 25° Baume. The concentration to continue till the powdered bones cannot be felt between the fingers, and the mass assumes thick, creamy consistence; remove from the fire, and dilute with boiled starch, stirring occasionally for several hours. When it is cold, for each degree of Baume add seven-tenths of a pound of dry potato starch, ground fine, and incorporated thoroughly, adding sufficient water to dissolve and work easy, then spread on a floor to dry for some days in a warm room. When dry it is ready for use. The self-rising flour is made thus: To 190 lbs. of flour add one and a half pounds of carbonate of soda and three and three-quarters pounds of the above prepared superphosphate. The quantity of the superphosphate annually used is several hundred tons. Our refiners are, however, but little engaged in utilizing the waste acid in this manner; the most of it being made in Europe.

Fine Arts.

MULTIPLIED ART.

THE ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF "ENOCH ARDEN."

MULTIPLIED art is broadly divisible into original and copied. The first of these divisions includes all that artistic work which is done by the artist himself in a multipliable form, and is by him intended for indefinite reproduction. The second division includes all that artistic work which is intended to reproduce, or partly represent, previously existing works of art. The distinction should be carefully observed, for fair judgment depends upon it, and it is sometimes hard to see. Thus nearly all copied work somewhat partakes of the nature of original work. If an engraving is made from a picture, the drawing which is first made is thus far an original work, that it translates the color of the picture into black and white. If an engraving is made from a statue or bas-relief, the drawing which copies, on a flat surface, the light and shade of the solid body, is still more nearly an original work. Moreover, there is sometimes some uncertainty about the classification of some particular work of art, as, for instance, in those not rare cases in which the artist has himself reproduced by engraving his own colored work, and in those cases, too, in which pictures in color have been executed with express reference to their being engraved.

Yet, even when obscured, this distinction is marked, and must be observed. In each individual case a little careful enquiry will put to rest any doubt that may arise, except in the few instances in which the facts are unknown. And we must know what we are judging if we wish to judge aright, for the grounds of our judgment of one will not give us footing when we seek to judge of the other division, as the criticism of a poem necessarily differs from the criticism of a poetical translation.

Original art of the multipliable sort is of the very greatest importance to us. It is difficult for us even to estimate the greatness of its influence over past ages. Of its immense value at present we can judge more truly every day, and every day shows some new influence it already exerts, and some new field open to it but not yet occupied. Of its value to the future intellectual life of men, and of the influence it may exert over that life, we can only speculate. But, "judging the future by the past," we cannot doubt of this, that the greatest minds will give their thoughts to the keeping of the steel, the stone and the wooden block, and the manifold impression on white paper. They will not despise or neglect the painted canvass; they will love that and find joy in it, and give thoughts to its keeping not to be given to other keeping than its own; but they will give half their strength and half their love to the black and white print of thousand-fold reproduction. And of this we cannot doubt, that good and wise minds, that are not the greatest, will find their best speech in popular and multiplied forms of art.

Consider this. Our painters have good and bright thoughts and kindly sentiments to express, but their expression of them is not good, is very insufficient. They cannot do themselves justice. They stagger and fall from lack of knowledge of their art. A painting in oil must approach a certain high standard of technical excellence, or it becomes ridiculous in its shortcomings, and unpleasant to see. And whatever our standard is now, it will not be lowered, but raised, as we learn more of art. But to no such standard is the artist's work compared who offers us wood-cuts and etchings of wise or pleasant thoughts of his own. Everybody knows the delightful comic illustrations of Doyle, the author of the well-known "Tour of Brown, Jones, and Robinson." He does not draw the human figure well, it is probable that he cannot draw it well; his mistranslations of the action of the body are extraordinarily bad, even in an age of bad drawing. Suppose his figure drawing were exhibited in oil paintings. It could not be endured, it would be abominable. But in the cheap wood-cut, in book illustrations like those of the works of Mr. Thackeray, in harmless and genial caricature, he is at home, and his work is welcome to the most fastidious lovers of art. American artists—we cannot name them, they are legion—who cannot draw the human figure or animals with accuracy, and have no power over the delineation of movement and action in their exhibited pictures in oil color, may excel in small drawings for publication, may make money and win fame by doing well a thing which is well worth doing well. It will take but a little time to teach the wood-engravers to do their business properly. And let it not be supposed that inferior technical skill is ruinous to an artist, and deprives, or even tends to deprive, his work of value. All ages but our own have asked for and received the work of the lesser artist as well as of the greater. Of the world of sculpture on a cathedral, the highest masters could execute but little; the capitals all about the church were made beautiful by men to whom the statues in the porch were not to be entrusted. Our own age is beginning to accept the work of the lesser artist.

Consider this, too. As we are situated now in America, no means are at our disposal of teaching ourselves or our children anything of art so sufficient or so available as the published engravings and wood-cuts that we can buy. If one has a child to educate in beauty and thought as seen in graphic art, he can find no way so simple, and no simple way so good, as to familiarize his pupil with the best muliplied art he can procure. Here in America we have no masterpieces of painting or sculpture left us from great days gone by. Even in Mr. Jarves' most precious collection, among works of the highest historical value and interest, representing not unworthily some of the greatest schools, there are but five or six pictures of very great, and these not of consummate, artistic excellence. Besides his collection, there is almost nothing; the very little that there is, is in private and hardly accessible galleries. The art of the past must be learned in Europe; except so far as the old artists worked on wood-block or metal plate, instead of canvass or pannel. And as to the art of the present, we do not look to collections of modern American pictures for much teaching for our children or ourselves. We go to the exhibition to pass an hour; perhaps even to exercise our powers of observation agreeably, and to test our memories of form; more probably to renew our acquaintance with the artistic life of the day, having a conviction hardly recognizable that we ought to keep up this acquaintance; at the best, to get a little real enjoyment, not otherwise to be had, but hoping for this from three or four canvasses only, and are too often disappointed even in this hope.

Now it is not to be doubted that the multiplied art within our reach is of more use than this. It is certain that Americans can get more good from the contents of their portfolios than from anything they see of a statelier kind of art. More comfort and instruction can often be got even out of Harper's Weekly, and a few illustrated books such as the English send us, than in the picture galleries.

We propose to speak of modern multiplied art somewhat in detail, describing briefly and criticizing such works of this class as may seem most worthy notice, or from which needed lessons may best be learned. Popular and easily accessible art will be preferred for this purpose, but we shall refer, on occasion, to the great and good work of by-gone times, of foreign countries, or of expensive character.

We begin with a very recent and very popular book the illustrated edition of "Enoch Arden."*

In this little gift-book we count eighteen full-page wood-cuts (and not nineteen, as the table at the beginning would have it), besides a delicate vignette on the title-page, engraved apparently from a photograph, of the poet's house, an engraved portrait-head of Mr. Tennyson, and a very poorly designed head-piece and initial letter. Of the eighteen principal illustrations, eight are by Mr. J. La Farge, four by Mr. Elihu Vedder, four by Mr. W. J. Hennessy, and two by Mr. F. O. C. Darley.

Of Mr. Darley's designs we shall not speak, as this artist is to be more fairly judged by other works of his than by these, which are in his worst and feeblest manner.

Of Mr. La Farge's designs, the first, "The Children," is very pleasing as far as concerns the children themselves. The expression of face in all three is very good and legible, the action childlike and natural. Both the boys are yielding unwillingly to the girl's entreaties; both are very unwilling to make friends again, and the distinction is rather subtle between Enoch's stubborn indifference to anything but Annie's grasp on his wrist and direct command, and Philip's more persuadable and reasonable holding back. The rest of the picture is too slight for serious notice. It is true that we have to complain, here in the first picture as in every other, of the terribly bad cutting; but, through the veil of uncertainty this throws over the scene, it is evident that there has gone no knowledge and no thought to the boats and cabins in the distance. The snow-white beach, or what seems intended for a beach, dividing the children from the distant boats by its entire breadth, deprives the picture of all air of verisimilitude, and makes it seem two pictures—the group below, drawn without background, and a narrow strip of landscape above. The next two designs by Mr. La Farge, "The Lovers" and "Philip and Annie in the Wood," are unfortunate, and disfigure the volume. The former is illegible—the action and sentiment all lost in a grey surface, out of which the forms scarcely evolve themselves, and these forms where seen are formless. The design has not been good; the engraving has been very bad. The latter drawing contains one pleasant bit: Annie's head, with her hand against the cheek; poorly rendered, but with a certain meaning in it. Philip's figure seems to have been intended for a joke. "Blanched with his mill" he was, according to the poem, and blanched he is in the picture; all clothed in white, and sitting on a white ground, from which he seems emergent, though still partly buried. Though so white, his dress cannot be described, for it is not resolvable into its parts; all is vagueness, as if distance and dim light reduced his figure to a monochromatic dot, although he is in the extremest foreground. His hands project from his sleeves like the paws of some animal, nearly twice their proper size, black, rough, knotty, and, from their position, seemingly unmanageable by their owner. To ridicule is not our purpose or wish. We have used the words that seemed to us to be fitting in this singular case of thoughtless work in drawing and cutting. It seems, though, in this case as if the worst of the fault were in the drawing; it is probable that only the level and lifeless general tone were chargeable to the cutting of the block. On the other hand, "The Island Home" (No. X., but lettered XI.) must have been dreadfully handled by the engravers, for there seems to have been a meaning to it, now nearly lost, and we owe to the engravers, certainly, as bad a texture as wood-cut ever had. It does not seem, indeed, that any knowledge of rocks went to this rock-drawing, but the bold use of the steep perspective, which is much ridiculed as "Japanese," and is quite true to the facts whether in Japanese paintings or La Farge wood-cuts, is a happy thought, and the three figures have life in them in spite of the bad drawing. If any one would see what a wood-cut of this subject might have been, he may consult a valuable book, not too common as yet in New York, but to be seen at Scribner's and Appleton's book-stores, "Frost and Fire," by J. F. Campbell, and look at the picture of Achill Head, on page sixty-four of the second volume.—Following this landscape we have again a pair, "Enoch Alone" and "The Solitary." In each of these there is real power and really poetic feeling. In the latter there is a purpose and insight seldom seen in American art; there is something in it very like imagination. But these merits are in the figure of Enoch, his bamboo staff, and his birds. The rest of the picture is made up enough. It is evident from these that the artist can conceive and can draw, and we know of no exhibited painting of his that can show us either fact. There remain two designs by Mr. La Farge: "Enoch's Supplication" and "The Seal of Silence." These are in every way inferior to the two of which we have just spoken. The latter illustrates these lines:

> "Beating it in upon his weary brain,
> As if it were the burden of a song,
> 'Not to tell her, never to let her know,'" and represents, we judge, the angel of silence, the head and bust with the partly seen wings occupying the whole picture. The conception is singularly inappropriate and false, and the figure (as it stands in the wood-cut) a very bad and slovenly drawing.

Mr. Vedder's first design, "The Rescue," is certainly powerful. The sea is rendered with considerable skill. Fault has been found with it because there is no visible movement or direction to the waves, and it is rightly urged that waves are not formless or purposeless, but obey laws and have a very well defined shape. It seems, though, that the spectator is low in the hollow in the waves, close to the surface of the ocean, probably in the boat from which Enoch has sprung to save the drowning man. And, from any such point of view as this, the waves look formless enough—great liquid mounds that suddenly rise up before the swimmer, lift him or break over him, and are gone. We claim nothing for this drawing of the sea than just liquidness and a sense of flow. It is as untransparent as printer's ink can make it. The clutching hands of the drowning man, just seen above the water, are a thought, and a good one. "Building the Canoe" is a better design, and Mr. Vedder's best; it is an effective little picture, and should be carefully painted in oil. The detail there is makes one wish for more, the figures are expressive though so formless and vague, and the serious faults of the design scarcely detract from the natural and simple thought. The "Return" is not very full of meaning, nor very interesting as a picture, nor an illustration at all, certainly not helping the meaning of the poem. "Enoch Passes Away" illustrates these lines:

> "He woke, he rose, he spread his arms abroad,
> Crying with a loud voice 'A sail! a sail!
> I am saved;' and so fell back and spoke no more."

The picture represents Christ upon the Cross, before whom, with outstretched arms, stands the man. The thought is, of course, that the sail which saves him is the crucified Saviour. It is hardly necessary to hint that the dying fancy of the sailor—suggested by the "loud calling of the sea" that wakened him, and finding utterance in the cry, "A sail! a sail! I am saved"—was a vision of his old island home of so many years, and of the white canvass of that ship which "stayed by this isle, not knowing where she lay," and brought him to England at last. So that the thought of this picture must be the general thought that the safety of the dying man is in Christ and Him crucified. But, note the misconception here: the dying man is not one who has long lived in sin, has lately repented, and has doubted of his salvation until this saving "sail" is seen; such an one might indeed be represented with artistic truth, as the artist has understood the poet to have represented and has helped him to represent Enoch Arden. But the dying man is a God-fearing Christian of a lifetime, bowed by sorrow and not by sin. We can imagine him as looking to Christ for release from suffering; we see that he does long for his release; we cannot imagine him doubting of his safety from sin, or, in Latin, of his salvation. We see by the poem that he does not doubt of his safety. He longs for death; he is sure that he shall see his babe in bliss; death dawns upon him, says the poem, and "through that dawning gleams a kindlier hope." It is true that a hope of pardon from sin graces every death-bed; but the fault in the conception of this design is that it would suit any other death better than this. It is clearly not thus that Enoch Arden's vision should be translated. For the rest, the drawing as we see it, distorted by the cutting, is very bad, and the composition, which the wood-engraver has not injured, is as bad as the drawing. It is in every way a discreditable picture.

Mr. Hennessy's first design, "The Babe," illustrates these lines:

> "Forward she started with a happy cry,
> And laid the feeble infant in his arms."

It is very good and true in feeling, the loving group of father, mother, and baby. It is a good design, too, and well drawn; we are speaking of the group only. Why the rest of the room should be slighted and avoided, stool and what seems a fishing-net of some kind, and walls and floor, all reduced to faint scratches and a wavy and nebulous appearance, perhaps there is no good reason to be shown. Mr. Hennessy's designs differ from the others we have been describing in their simplicity and directness of purpose. There is true feeling in them, and love of quiet domestic incident; there is not imagination, nor does there pretend to be. That one of which we have spoken, seems to us the best of all; but the truly natural action of the sad mother in "Preparing the Shop" makes this design also very interesting. But all these four designs of Mr. Hennessy's are studies of detached groups, sketches, such as an artist might make on a leaf of his sketch-book when seeing a pretty incident, with valueless surroundings. A picture, whether painted or drawn on wood, a picture intended for the public, a design—ought never to be so incomplete. Pictured men and women should not be drawn without surroundings—accessories. Any one of these scenes had been of twice their present value with a little of that carefulness of small things which Edouard Frère has shown. All the really great and good painters point the right road. It argues badly for our younger painters that they will not follow it.

It is evident that, in many of these illustrations, the wood-engravers have been entirely at a loss how to render the drawings. It seems hardly possible that these drawings were made upon the wood. But, on the other hand, it seems hardly possible that any ambitious young artist should send out of his keeping, with his name on it, a drawing on paper to be transferred to a block and engraved without his supervision. If the artists know not that this is asking more of our wood-engravers than they can rightly perform, a few more such failures will convince them. For years to come any such undertaking must be done with religious care, and a perfect willingness to throw away every block which is spoiled beyond repairing. We hope the failure of this undertaking will not discourage the publisher or other publishers, but rather spur them to do it again, and to do it very much better.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY A.M.

THE business of the week has been large in the way of importation, and trade is also active in what are called domestic commission goods, such as cotton fabrics and woollens. Cotton goods are held with some firmness because of the continued uncertainty as to the supplies of the raw material from the South. The estimates of the old cotton held in the States recently in rebellion, at the close of the war, are being reduced, and our own latest information from Georgia, Alabama, etc., is against the recent high figures calculated on by a portion of the trade North. It is also unfavorable in the two States named as to the extent of the new planting. Middle and West Tennessee will probably do better, as they had been well cleared of the armies before the regular planting season. The accounts from Texas are very conflicting. The receipts of the week at New York, however, show some increase, and the Government has sold 8,000 bales of Sherman's capture at Savannah at good rates, as for gold, compounding with the purchasers at the rate of 142¼ per cent. currency. The reason why the sales are made for gold is that claims may possibly hereafter be made to a portion of the proceeds by parties claiming to be loyal or neutral (foreign) owners. The Liverpool market shows less firmness for cotton, and has also fallen off for American breadstuffs, owing to improved harvest prospects in England. Our New York exports of domestic produce fell off from $4,000,000 last week to $2,850,000 this week. The demand for U. S. 5-20s is also less active, the Frankfort and London markets being well supplied at latest dates, though the price was still 4 to 6 per cent. relatively higher than our own quotation, the current difference in exchange taken into the calculation.

The price of gold has undergone very little alteration this week. It is supported by speculation and a free demand every day to pay into the Treasury for customs. The receipts for customs last week were $2,844,000, and will reach about $2,500,000 this week. We do not know that the Secretary of the Treasury has disposed of any part of his large gold surplus, but a rumor to this effect had gained currency on Thursday and Friday. There is no export inquiry for gold, although the later trade in the foreign goods now passing through the custom house may require such a movement, unless cotton comes forward more freely and grain and flour should be extensively exported.

The money market worked less easy early in the week, and the change of supply advanced the rates 1 to 2 per cent., say from 4 to 5 up to 5 to 7 per cent. per annum. Yesterday there was less demand, and the rate generally about 6 per cent. among the brokers.

The harvest advices continue cheering from nearly every district of the Middle and Western States. The unsettled labor question in Kentucky is said to have considerably reduced the tobacco crop.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

Nearly all the gold-bearing stocks have fallen off 1 to 1½ per cent. within a few days past, in sympathy with the immediate dulness in 5-20s for Europe. The long 6 per cents of 1881 from 108 to 106¾; and 5-20s of 1882, redeemable after 1867, 106⅛ to 104⅛; new of 1884, 105¼ to 104; 10-40s, 5 per cents of 1894, redeemable after 1874, from 98 to 96¾.

The 7.30 per cent. currency loans, convertible after 3 years into 5-20s, gold-bearing, are steady at 99¾ to par and interest. The popular subscriptions to the third and last series, interest July 15 and January 15, are going on at the rate of $4,500,000 to $6,000,000 per day, and will soon be closed out.

Treasury certificates of indebtedness, twelve months to run, carrying 6 per cent. interest in currency, have declined to 97¾ per cent. and interest for the recent dates. The 1864 dates are 99⅛ to 99¾ per cent. About $30,000,000 of these mature in August. The half-yearly coupons on the 7.30 loan, first series, also mature on the 15th of that month, $11,475,000 currency interest on $300,000,000 principal.

STATE SECURITIES.

These are generally dull, at about last week's prices. A few transactions in this series at 72, and Tennessees 71 to 72 per cent.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A half-yearly dividend of 3 per cent. has been announced on the New York Central stock, and 5 per cent. on the guaranteed stock of the Michigan Southern. No dividend will be paid at present on the common stock of the latter. The Illinois Central shares are now sold with the July dividend of 15 per cent. off. The stock has advanced 8 to 10 per cent. since the dividend, to 128⅛ to 132, ex dividend. There is probably not over two-fifths of the capital now owned at home, and the English people continue to increase their holdings. The consequence is that the bearish speculators in this market who sold short on the depression in May, are severely taxed to make good their deliveries. The variations in Erie since our last report have been from 80⅝ to 82½; New York Central, 95 to 93 to 94½; Reading, 100⅝ to 103; Hudson, 109½ to 108; Michigan Central, 109 to 108; Michigan Southern, 64½ to 62¾, and up to 65¼; Pittsburg, 67½ to 68; Northwest, 28 to 27½; Northwest Preferred, 62½ to 57½, and up to 61½; Fort Wayne, 98 to 97½ to 98; Rock Island, 107 to 104½ and back to 107 to 107¾. Market firmer at close of week.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

Pacific Mail firm at 295 to 300; Atlantic Mail advanced from 158½ to 154; Cumberland ranged 42 to 41, and back to 42; Canton, 39½ to 38½, and up to 40; Brunswick, $11 to $13½, and back to $12; Mariposa, 13 to 12¾.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Gold from 143 to 143⅝, and down to 142¼ to 142¾ per cent. Bills on London for gold were very much depressed for Wednesday's (Boston) steamer, but improved from 108½ to 108⅞ to 109 for Tuesday's packets.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

"THE MAGIC."

MOODY'S PATENT SELF-ADJUSTING HOOP SKIRTS.

It is the only article of the kind manufactured that is never in the way either in the narrow church-pews, on horseback, or in any crowded place.

The new Trail Skirt of this peculiar manufacture is particularly recommended to ladies, as the flexible joints enable her to fold it about her person with much greater ease than a small one of the old style. Ladies are well aware that there is no article of dress which has heretofore caused so much trouble and annoyance as hoop skirts, and they should at least examine "THE MAGIC" before purchasing.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

FINANCIAL REVIEW 158

Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

THE WEEK has been quite featureless. No great events at home or abroad. The news from England is not without interest, but is wholly confined to the elections, of which the result is given by our correspondent. Mr. Gladstone has been defeated at Oxford.

A HIGHLY important bureau has been established in the Adjutant-General's office at Washington, "for the collection," so runs the order, "safe keeping, and publication of rebel archives that have come into the possession of this Government." Dr. Francis Lieber is appointed chief, by a very happy selection. If we were a historian of the times, we should lay down our pen at once, and wait for developments which cannot fail to affect materially our judgment of the acts and leaders of the rebellion. Ford's Theatre has been pronounced on examination by Gen. Meigs to be nearly fire-proof, and will probably receive the precious documents of treason, the Secretary of War having acknowledged Mr. Ford's right to compensation, and rented the building till the 1st of February next, with the privilege of purchasing it for $100,000, if Congress approve. It will be curious if the proof of official Confederate complicity in the assassination of Mr. Lincoln should emanate from the very spot on which the tragedy was enacted.

IT seems that the withdrawal of the privileges of their ports by foreign powers from the Confederate cruisers is likely to be something more than a mere formality. The Shenandoah has been carrying havoc into the North Pacific, and has destroyed already some eight of our whalers. This is only the beginning of her havoc in that quarter. It is said by the vessel that brings this intelligence, along with the destitute crews, that the commander of the Shenandoah was informed of Lee's surrender and the overthrow of the rebellion, which he refused to credit. He was not disposed, however, to doubt Mr. Lincoln's assassination, "for he expected it." He had coaled last at Melbourne, and his crew of English and Irish sailors was swelled by some of the captured whalemen.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL SPEED has rendered his opinion to the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the cotton captured at Savannah, and, incidentally, to all other property which has been made the prize of war on land. Two acts of Congress, those of March 12, 1863, and July 2, 1864, regulate the disposal of "captured property," which the Attorney-General considers all movable property, "actually and hostilely seized and taken on land," to be. In this category also would seem to be included, by the sixth section of the act of 1863, all "cotton, sugar, rice, and tobacco" received by any United States officer or soldier within insurrectionary districts; which is directed to be turned over to an agent of the Treasury Department, and, by section second, sold, the proceeds being paid into the Treasury to await the action of the Court of Claims when duly invoked. There is no choice in the matter: the statute is imperative. Accordingly, the Savannah cotton, which was de jure captured property in Sherman's hands, and de facto when put under Treasury control, must be disposed of by sale for the benefit of the Treasury. Congress having vested the determination of the legality of its seizure, as well as of that of other captured property, in the Court of Claims, neither the President nor any executive officer would be authorized in appointing a special commission for this purpose.

THE standing grievance of this metropolis is dirt, as everybody knows. A complaint against scavengers is always in order. Sundry smaller cities, within ten days, have shown themselves more fortunate, inasmuch as certain disinterested parties, from abroad or in the midst of them, have kindly volunteered to "clean them out." Thus, on the 26th ult., several barge-loads of ruffians from Albany invaded the peaceful town of Hudson with the sanitary intention alluded to, accompanying, being supported by, and apparently forming a part of, the Emmett Guards, who were out on an excursion. If the damage to the town were to be measured by that inflicted on the liquor-shops, which were pretty thoroughly gutted as at Poughkeepsie on the day of the boat-race, there might be a delicate doubt betwixt loss and gain. But when it came to an indiscriminate attack upon the unoffending and helpless populace, with bludgeons and bullets, it was a very dirty broom, indeed, and fit only to be thrown into the river. There seems to have been great boldness in this St. Albany raid, and great feebleness on the part of the authorities of the two cities concerned. Prompt telegraphing ought to have rendered the arrest of the marauders a matter of certainty, albeit of difficulty. On the evening of the same day another "cleaning out" process took place in Concord, New Hampshire, in which, we are sorry to add, returned soldiers were the chief actors. The object of their assault was a clothing establishment, because of a charge of theft, assumed to be false, against one of their number. They were dispersed, without bloodshed apparently on either side, by the civil and military authorities.

THE Richmond Whig was permitted to resume publication on the 24th ult. It was thus enabled to exert what influence it could upon the impending municipal election by the following recommendation:

"In a word, it is the imperative duty of every man to take the prescribed oaths, and then to cast his vote to-morrow, with an eye single to the peace and happiness of the city and the general good of the State. To a notary public first, then, and pay the magnificent sum of five cents for the blessed privilege, and then take all the oaths with an almighty unction, and forthwith you will be made whole—a citizen without spot or blemish, and in whom there is no manner of guile. And then to the polls very early in the morning, and, our word for it, you will feel good all over for a long time."

It may be doubted if the people needed this approval of the doctrine of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, which has never yet elicited protest from the South. The election of the 25th, at all events, made Sturdivant mayor of the city by a majority of quite six hundred votes over Taylor, the self-styled Union candidate. The Commercial Bulletin says boldly enough:

"The election of yesterday simply means that the people of Virginia, so far at least as Richmond can be taken as a representative of that people, turn not with the spirit of the craven and the renegade from opinions which their kith and kin have died for."

And all the Republic can reply is:

"Neither the city of Richmond nor the county of Henrico has ever represented the sentiment of Virginia in the elections. As they voted, so did not the State at large vote."

Gen. Terry is reported to have nullified the election.

THE event of the week which has the widest bearing upon the condition of the freedmen, is an order from the Secretary of War abolishing any system of passes adopted by post, district, or other commanders, which subjects the blacks to restraints or punishments not imposed on other classes. Neither they nor the whites will be hindered from seeking employment elsewhere than at home, if they cannot obtain it there (unless bound to stay by voluntary agreements), nor from travelling from place to place on legitimate business. Major-General Gregg had already, in the spirit of this order, been moved by certain outrages on the blacks at Lynchburg, Va., to extend his industrial regulations to the white population, who have now their choice between work on their own account and a turn at street-sweeping. Gen. Gregg is particular to assert that "the freedmen have precisely the same rights before the law as white men." Nevertheless, the civil courts in that portion of Virginia within the limits of the department of Washington have declined to receive colored testimony, and Major-General Augur has established a Provost Court, to have exclusive jurisdiction in all cases which affect the people of color, who will be allowed to bear witness on the same conditions as the whites. "This order will remain in force until the Virginia courts have brought their practice more into harmony with the existing state of affairs." The question is brought up again by a case in Mississippi, where a planter murdered a negro, and was taken into custody by Col. Thomas, Assistant Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. A writ of habeas corpus was ineffectually served upon this officer, who telegraphed to Washington for instructions. As only the wife of the victim was a witness of the deed, the murderer could not be convicted in a civil court. It is to be hoped the Government will see the necessity of abrogating at a stroke the whole black code of the Southern States. Much of the old brutality is rampant in the lower counties of Maryland, where the officers of the law sustain it; in New Orleans, where the disloyal mayor and his police force let no opportunity slip of harassing colored citizens, the latest outrage being their expulsion from their churches, which were closed upon them; and generally in Missouri and Arkansas, wherever the military arm is shortened. In the last mentioned State, however, in the Little Rock district, the freedmen are prospering and earning good wages, some in the employ of the military authorities, others, of the citizens of the town itself. In Kentucky, Gen. Fisk, Freedmen's Commissioner, reports that the State is stirred to its depths on the slavery question, and the condition of the blacks is thoroughly unsettled. Gen. Palmer has proclaimed emancipation to all slaves who will leave the State, and the exodus is in full operation. Thousands of the colored population have crossed the Ohio for the sake of their freedom. Nor for this alone, since in many places the masters are exhibiting the worst passions of slavery, and equalling the keenest atrocities of other days, their vindictiveness being especially visited upon those families whose heads have enlisted in the armies of the Union. All parties whose safety is thus jeopardized, on making application to Gen. Palmer or his post commandants, are forwarded to Camp Nelson, where large numbers are constantly arriving.

THE question of the proper depository and judicious exercise of the pardoning power is undergoing investigation at the hands of a committee of the New York Prison Association, of which Dr. Lieber is chairman. They address by circular eight enquiries to former chief magistrates of the several States, asking whether the possession of this power by the Executive was esteemed desirable or burdensome—a part of his prerogative, or better entrusted elsewhere; whether this unlimited authority is necessary in our political system, or has even grown out of it; whether it can be employed with prudence and a due regard to the merits of the case when the governor is so liable to personal and party influences; whether justice is subserved or defeated by it; whether juries, and not judges only, should be allowed to recommend for pardon and merciful consideration; whether a council or board of pardon would not be preferable to the present usage, and ought not to be incorporated in the State constitutions whenever altered. We anticipate a wholesome result from this research, and commend it as an example to all our social reformers.

MOST of the Southern States are politically active, and preparing for the conventions which are to frame anew their Constitutions. Gov. Johnson, of Georgia, made a very sensible speech at Macon, on the 15th ult., in which he told the people very plainly what was the shortest and the only way to rid themselves of a protracted military rule. This was to admit that slavery was dead, and to alter their statutes to suit this inevitable fact. He assented, for his part, to the validity of the laws of Congress and the proclamation of the President abolishing the institution, and showed that the State Convention would be required to adopt the same view. He refuted the charge that the negroes will not work, and complimented them for their conduct in the fundamental change of Southern society. "Under the peculiar circumstances by which they were surrounded, no people have ever behaved better than they have done." He depicted the advantages of liberty for the South and her future prosperity, attended by an infusion of new blood and enterprise from the North and from abroad. "We abused mankind," he confessed, "when they differed with us," and this intolerance of opposite opinions almost drove civilization from the land, and suppressed law and order with vigilance committees. He rejoiced that it was now safe and constitutional for everybody to express his mind on the subject of slavery.—Gov. Perry is said to have returned to South Carolina, after offering to co-operate with Gen. Howard in his plans for the freedmen. The Raleigh Standard and Progress are deprecating the withdrawal of the United States troops from North Carolina, and express sincere alarm at indications of a rebel reaction, threatening an overthrow of the civil establishment, and renewed abuse of freedmen and Unionists.—Gov. Bramlette, of Kentucky, is determined rigidly to enforce the State law which expatriates and disfranchises all citizens who have participated in the rebellion in a military or civil capacity, and the oath which affects all who have given voluntary aid and assistance to those in arms against the Government. By this means the August polls may be kept tolerably clear of the chivalry in grey.

THERE is a movement in the Chicago Board of Education to introduce the study of German into the grammar schools of that city. One of the daily press approves the experiment most heartily, and hopes that French will be included in it.

A VERY fine construction has been put by the rebel General Wise upon the terms of his parole, by which he was included in Lee's surrender. He received "permission to go to his home, and there remain undisturbed in every respect." He complains that he is disturbed "by a considerable number of freedmen and others," who have taken advantage of his absence to occupy his former domicile. He respectfully asks that these intruders be ousted, in order that he may enjoy the privileges guaranteed him by his parole. This coolest of cool applications is met by a refusal from Gen. Terry, who reminds him that he abandoned the home which he now claims for another, from which "he might to better advantage engage in rebellion and civil war." The fastidious ex-governor will next be charging the military authorities with perfidy, because he is disturbed at every turn by the sight of black men not one of whom is a slave, nor afraid to sing the John Brown song in his hearing.

THE college regatta at Worcester, on Friday and Saturday, as usual produced only two competitors, Yale and Harvard. The former was the winner in both races, though much doubt exists in regard to the time of the first day—whether it was seventeen minutes and forty-two and a half seconds to eighteen minutes and nine seconds, or whether one minute should be added to each. On the second day the time was nineteen minutes and five and a half seconds to nineteen minutes and twenty and a half seconds. Crew and boat seem to have been in favor of Yale.

General Thomas has his hands full in Tennessee. Without him, Governor Brownlow rests upon the very unstable basis of a loyal white minority, who have not only turned their disloyal brethren out of doors, but have rejected the services of the blacks in keeping them out. As a consequence there is an undisguised conflict between the outs and ins, and the heaviest battalion would carry the day here as upon other fields, if the military power were not on the side of the weaker party. This it is which has arrested Mr. Emerson Etheridge, and held him in spite of the clutchings of civil processes; and which will secure the purity and legality of the approaching election as far as it is possible. A most interesting order has been published this week, in which General Thomas figures as the skilful photographer of certain citizens of Columbus, who had fallen under his just displeasure, and were treated to righteous discipline. Two instances of persecution, the one of colored people, the other of a Union man, showed clearly the unfitness of the magistrates implicated for further continuance in office. For taking plums from a tree on an unenclosed common, which happened to be private property, two colored school girls were committed to solitary confinement in the county jail for lack of the excessive bail of $500. Here the mayor, one Andrews, appeared to be the instigator of the justice, Welch. But this was only one of a long series of attacks on the colored schools of the place, and the same Andrews, last year, had twenty-five lashes inflicted on a black man for teaching a class of his own complexion how to read. Then one Galloway, an active rebel, returns to find his premises occupied by a Unionist, on a lease from the Treasury Department, in the absence of whose agent he frightens the tenant away, sells the store to a third party, and sues for his lost rent. The agent comes back, and is obliged to resort to the military to recover possession. Justice Welch decides in favor of Galloway in the matter of the rent, being persuaded, perhaps, by the eloquence of his counsel, M. S. Frierson, "a malignant rebel," who had vowed not to trim his hair until the Confederacy should be established. This Absalom came to grief by forgetting that he was not yet out of the woods. He and Galloway —whom the General characterizes as bearing "the reputation of a man destitute of principle, honor, and loyalty," a former "note-shaver and negro-trader"—are turned over to the Provost-Marshal General for confinement in the military prison, until it can be determined what shall be done with those who still maintain a defiant attitude and ungrateful heart towards the Government of the United States. The mayor and the justice are suspended from the exercise of their civil functions, until they can make some show of being possessed of humanity and a willingness to obey the laws. Everybody will applaud the action of General Thomas, while regarding it as a fresh proof of the lamentable haste with which the South has been restored to political vitality.

A large portion of the public, we are satisfied, have never understood why the exhibitions of the National Academy begin on the first of May and last till the fifth of July. We believe no better reason can be assigned for it than that the exhibitions of the Royal Academy in London open and close at the same period; and there could hardly be a worse one. The first of May is the beginning of the London season, and the London season, as well as the session of Parliament, is fixed by the habits of the aristocracy. The winter and early spring are spent in fox-hunting and in their country houses. They begin to come to the city in March or April, soon after the opening of Parliament, and by the first of May the tide of gaiety begins to rise rapidly, and continues to flow until the middle of August, when Parliament rises, and the grouse and the Continent become temptations too strong to be resisted. Moreover, during the summer months the heat is never so great as to make the streets and crowded rooms positively uncomfortable. A concert room, or ball room, or picture gallery is never unendurable in London in the month of June, as it is here.

Not one of these reasons, we need hardly say, is of any value here. The New York season begins after New Year's Day, and lasts till the beginning of Lent. January, February, and March are the months in which the greatest number of people are in town, in which social life is most active, in which there is the greatest eagerness for sight-seeing, and in which galleries, theatres, and concerts, and all other kinds of in-door enjoyments, are most in request. By the first of May, the day which the Academy has selected for its opening, two-thirds of the class who love to see pictures are either tired out, or are about to change their houses, or go to the country. They have bought all the pictures they care to buy, and, in most cases, what with artists' receptions, club exhibitions, dealers' exhibitions, and auction sales, have seen all the pictures they care to see, and begin to babble of green fields. In June, if the weather is seasonably warm, the very thought of a gas-lighted room with a crowd in it becomes repulsive, and the fact is that delicate women and fastidious men will not go to such a place, or stay in it more than five minutes. The result is, that the exhibitions of the Academy secure, we venture to say, a third less patronage than they would receive if they opened three months earlier, and, partly owing to the departure of the artists for the country before they close, partly owing to the general weariness and satiety, the sales or commissions which result from them are very much fewer than it would be reasonable to expect. We hope this mistake will not be repeated another year.

Gov. Andrew's suggestion about equalizing the ratio of the sexes in Massachusetts, by providing the surplus women with homes in the West, has taken root, it seems. The Hon. Mr. Mercer, of Washington Territory, having come east upon an errand of this nature, has been co-operating with the Governor. Already he had secured cheap transportation from Aspinwall to San Francisco, and thence to Puget Sound, for three hundred young women. How to get them from New York to Aspinwall was the next question. Government was applied to, on grounds of national utility, for one of its steamers. Good-will everywhere, but no resources. Secretary Stanton refers to General Meigs; General Meigs to Secretary Welles; he to General Howard, who doubts if he have the power. Suppose Mr. Mercer ask the President. The President thought himself powerless if his subordinates could do nothing; but he indorses the project, as a post-office clerk a letter—"Try Gen. Grant;" and Gen. Grant only requires the approval of Gen. Howard to give the necessary orders. So the difficulty was surmounted, and the De Molay sails from this port on the 20th of August.

The Congregational churches of the West are gathering statistics of the number of soldiers furnished by them to the armies of the Union; what proportion of their adult male members remained at home; the number of those who perished; the ministers and sons of ministers who went out; the number of those who have returned, and their religious and moral condition at the present time.

"I always travelled," says General Sherman, who is still a tourist, "with a copy of the census in my saddle-bags. I could tell how many inhabitants, how many cultivated acres, how many head of cattle and horses, how many bushels of grain, each county possessed at that time, and so, approximately, how many there would be now, and how long it would subsist my army." This was fighting the South with her own weapon, for she always manipulated the census to suit herself. Gen. Sherman's genius is as conspicuous in this as in greater incidents of his warfare.

Mr. Potter, American Consul-General for Canada, showed his fitness for a post that has in it something of a diplomatic character, by saying, in the city of Detroit, "in two years from the abrogation of the Reciprocity treaty, the people of Canada themselves will apply for admission to the United States." Possibly; but was it the part of prudence to proclaim the excellence of commercial coercion in so very public a manner, and before so many Canadians, members of the Convention? It may be the "inevitable destiny" of Canada to become a portion of the American Republic, but it is not preparing for a happy marriage when the lady is forced to give her hand without her heart in it; and how could we expect to command Canadian affection? That is to be won, not extorted. Hitherto our annexation work has proceeded on the system of mutual agreement. We have taken possession of no country of which the people were not satisfied to become of our number, leaving Indians aside. But if we should force the Canadians to change themselves into republicans and Americans, the addition of their country to ours would strengthen us much the same as England has been strengthened by her connection with Ireland. We should be weakened by the junction, not strengthened. The Canadians are so angry with Mr. Potter that they are laboring to have him removed from his office, by charging him with being engaged in an attempt to subvert the Government of Canada, and with endeavoring to promote the annexation of that country to the United States. We do not believe that the Consul-General has been engaged in any improper action like that attributed to him; and the very fact that he could talk so imprudently at Detroit goes far to show that he could not have been a conspirator in Montreal. It is a little strange, too, that his actions should not have been brought up against him until he had made himself offensive by his words.

A RECENT article on "Belligerent Rights," published in THE NATION, has excited a good deal of discussion in some Boston papers, and given rise to much studiously diffused misapprehension. It may save many critics some trouble if we say that the article in question was written by one of the contributors in our published list, a gentleman well qualified in every way to discuss questions of diplomacy, and to whose hands we confided them with the same confidence and same freedom from personal responsibility that we confide the trust of criticizing books and pictures to others. For it must not be forgotten that this question of the propriety on the part of European powers of granting or withholding belligerent rights from the rebels, is a question of law. Whether Mr. Bemis in his pamphlet has discussed it in the best manner or not, is a question of taste and expediency. The pamphlet was forwarded to this office, we presume by Mr. Bemis himself, for notice at our hands, and was by us entrusted to a contributor whom we conceived to be well fitted for the task of expressing an educated American opinion on its merits. That opinion was duly expressed, and in our belief the writer, by his position, culture, and attainments, was abundantly qualified to express it, and had a right to do so, even if it differed in some ways from our own, or from that of the general public. Mr. Bemis has rendered excellent service during the last two years by his discussions of questions of international law, but he will hardly himself pretend that he has attained such perfection that it is immoral or "unpatriotic" in one of his educated countrymen to differ with him or to take exception to his method. For ourselves we can freely say that there is hardly a point he has raised during the last two years in which we have not entirely agreed with him, but we confess, with all deference, that we have on various occasions wished that his work had been differently done. Nobody can have followed his controversy with "Historicus" without seeing that on more than one occasion the good cause he defended suffered through the want on his part of the rhetorical skill of his antagonist. The undue stress he laid on the Cassius case, for instance, ended rather unfortunately in enabling "Historicus" to snatch a cheap victory on a side, and really unimportant, issue.

AT last we are likely to reach a settlement of the controversy between Mr. E. N. Dickerson and the Navy Department. The scientific principle in dispute relates to cut-offs, or the economy of using steam under the highest rate of expansion. Most, if not all, of the double-enders in our service are built according to the ideas of Mr. Isherwood, of the Engineering Bureau. The Algonquin alone has been constructed on the principles of his persevering rival, who by a public appeal and challenge to the Navy Department has brought about a trial of the two systems. Mr. Dickerson asked for a race and gets a mere turning of paddle-wheels at a wharf, but if he is half as good as his word, the Algonquin will make more foam with less fuel than the Winooska.

IF it be true that the Pope has excommunicated the Emperor of the Mexicans, that gentleman will have reason to complain of the sort of "backing" which he receives from Europe. This act of excommunication gives one a strange idea of the state of affairs in the Old World. Maximilian was made Mexican Emperor by Napoleon III., the very man who maintains the Pope at Rome. But for the assistance they receive from French soldiers, the Pope would have to leave Rome, and the Austrian prince would not remain a week in Mexico, yet the Pope denounces Maximilian, which must be considered an act of defiance to the French Emperor. Then Austrian influence is great at Rome, and the Pope looks for, and gets, the support of the brother of Maximilian. It is a regular maze, and shows that the Frenchman cannot keep his team under control; and that Pope Pius IX. is disposed to keep the power of the Church at the highest standard. The end of this beginning cannot be very far off.

MR. ROEBUCK'S "defence about America" was lame enough at Sheffield. The United States had a broad and beautiful territory; it would be filled some day by the Anglo-Saxon race; it would govern the world. Such was the ground of his endeavor to "break up that powerful nation into communities that would be less powerful and better behaved." It is a very monstrous species of egoism, however disguised by pretence of patriotism, that assails a foreign and a friendly power for the simple reason that it gives promise of an overshadowing greatness. It were becoming to enquire whether this superiority would be adventitious or well-earned—the result of fraud, and violence, and tyranny, or of high political morality and an admirable form of government. Mr. Roebuck might then estimate the probable effect of a lifelong crusade upon the republic whose growth he so much dreads.

LOUIS BLANC deprecates, in a Continental journal, the outcry of the British press against the President's amnesty and its exceptions, and their false haste to denounce his policy as barbarous before it is known that a single head will fall, or any vengeance be visited upon those excluded from pardon. For himself he is not surprised that the United States choose to remain on their guard, and to exact a guaranty from the leading spirits of rebellion. Southern sympathizers on that side of the Atlantic have all along asserted that the embarrassments of the North would culminate in the hour of victory. It is worth while to take them at their word. To protest against the imprisonment and trial of Davis is to ask the victor to declare his own triumph iniquitous. To accuse, try, and convict him of high treason, is to be faithful to the first and most evident interest of the Republic; to announce that the true seat of government has always been at Washington; to affirm that what the people constituted through the federal compact was the Union.

"It is to declare before the entire world that the legitimacy of an insurrection depends upon its moral worth, upon its principle, and not upon the degree of force it displays. It is to deny that a contract may be violated whenever the violators are powerful and numerous; it is to deny that to give a rebellion a right to claim the immunities of war, it has only to bring about immense calamities and shed torrents of blood."

THE report of the British Commissioners of Emigration for 1864 shows that the drain upon the United Kingdom fell a little short of that of the preceding year, yet amounted to nearly 209,000 souls. Of these 130,165 came over to the United States. It is noteworthy that while 56,618 Englishmen left home to settle in foreign lands, 29,811 (or more than half) preferred this country, and eight came here where one was attracted to the North American colonies. In the four years of the war, not less than £1,636,844 were sent by the emigrants in America to their friends and relatives who had stayed behind. "This," says the London Daily News, "is the real British emigration fund; and while this spontaneous agency continues in operation, nothing but an immense improvement in the lot of the people at home can avert the movement."

IN order to compete with the English steam-service, the French Government has resolved upon a line from Brest to New York, which shall occupy less than ten days in the transit. One steamer, the Europe, has already made the voyage in nine days, seventeen hours. Four others will be employed for this purpose, leaving once a fortnight until business shall warrant greater frequency. An express train will take the passengers to Paris in twelve hours, it is hoped, though sixteen now are required. Freight will continue round by water to Havre.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

WHAT DELAYS THE AMENDMENT.

THE Democratic press is very earnest and emphatic in repudiating the insinuation that the refusal of Delaware, Kentucky, and Maryland to ratify the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery indicates any love of the institution or anything more than an unusual tenderness for States rights. This theory would meet with a better reception if it were not true that during the whole course of the agitation which led to the war, the two things all but invariably went together. It was found with a frequency which, if it does not amount to positive proof, suggests the relation of cause and effect very strongly, that in whatever part of the Union there prevailed great fear of the encroachments of the central power, there prevailed also very strong opinions as to the "nigger's" unfitness for freedom and as to the divine origin of slavery. It was all but impossible to find a man either North or South who held Calhoun's doctrine of the relations of the States to the Union, who did not also hold his doctrines as to the proper relations of the negro to the white man; and, in fact, there was probably no incident of the old anti-slavery agitation more notorious than that "States Rights" had, in the Democratic party, completely lost the character of a bulwark of local liberty and been converted into protection for a particular form of social organization.

What induces Democrats in a free State like New Jersey to refuse at this time of day to concur in abolishing slavery, is probably a compound of the traditional hatred of the negro and traditional reverence for slave society. There is nothing so very preposterous either in the supposition that large numbers of them still believe, that by some hocus-pocus, when Congress meets, slaves will be either restored to their owners or owners allowed to take them back. This belief, as we know, lingers among the less intelligent of the Southern planters, and will probably linger for a good while. There has been nothing in the war harder for the old pro-slavery zealots to swallow than the conclusion that changes effected by the "war power" could either have or acquire any legal validity after the war was over.

The excuse that New Jersey and the other recalcitrants refuse to ratify the amendment on the ground that its object can be better attained by the separate action of the States themselves, has been often answered, and yet it is reproduced still with the old effrontery. It is true the slaves might be freed by the one process as well as by the other; but the latter offers a guarantee for their remaining free which the other does not. A State which abolishes slavery on its own mere motion might restore it; a State which abolishes it under a provision of the United States Constitution becomes bound by "the supreme law of the land;" enters, in short, into a contract with every other State to do nothing of the kind. Nor is there anything extravagant in the supposition that such a thing might be attempted as the wholesale reduction to bondage of men who had once been free. Such a thing was done in the French colonies, and with no compunction. The French National Assembly liberated the colonial slaves, and Napoleon re-enslaved them. The enslavement of free negroes has long been one of the commonest incidents of Southern jurisprudence; and we have no reason to believe that the negroes in any Southern State would, for some time at least, be strong enough, well enough organized, or sufficiently rid of the sentiment of white superiority, to defend their rights successfully, and all interference by the general Government on their behalf would be revolutionary. To be sure, the thing would shock the conscience of the civilized world, but the South is not remarkably sensitive to foreign opinion, and not easily abashed by finding that she does not come up to foreign standards of morality. She is used to that sort of thing, is used to opprobrium of every variety, and has for years waxed fat and kicked under it.

There is in fact, and always was, the same objection to imposing on every State the obligation to maintain a republican form of government that there is now to exacting from each a pledge not to permit slavery. The separate States might have taken such preventives as might be necessary against the establishment of monarchy themselves, without the interference of the general Government. It might be said that the establishment of monarchy in one would endanger the peace and security of the others, and certainly endanger the existence of the Union, and these were doubtless the reasons which led the framers of the Constitution to prohibit it. But the very same thing may be said of slavery. There probably has been no mistake in history greater than that committed by those who at the foundation of the government concluded that free and slave communities could exist peaceably and harmoniously in the same political organization; and certainly it has been grievously atoned for. There can be no duty stronger, therefore, than that of incorporating in the organic law a provision which shall for ever prevent the growth of such differences in the social organization of the two sections as have led to the recent catastrophe. At all events, New Jersey can hardly suffer by agreeing to what the slave States themselves, or the majority of them, agree to. The political force of the doctrine of State rights would not be in the least affected by the passage of the proposed amendment. It was already settled by the Constitution that if two-thirds of the States agree to any change in the law, they can impose it on the other third, so that the exercise of this power even cannot be objected to by the most rigid conservative, as long as it does not involve an invasion of private rights. With anybody who calls the right of slaveholding a private right, with which those armed with discretion in the matter ought to refrain from interfering, there is of course little use in arguing. But any Democrat who does so can hardly wish us to acquit him, as the World does, for a liking for the institution itself, and put it all down to reverence for State sovereignty.

THE REBEL PAROLE.

IT is said the Government has ordered a nol. pros. to be entered in those cases in which indictments have been found against General Lee, and that it is not its intention to proceed against him for treason. We believe that there is little doubt entertained in any quarter as to what the rights of the Government in this matter are. No answer worthy of attention has yet been made to Dr. Lieber's propositions that any cartel or military agreement remains military in its character, and the general to whom an army surrenders cannot go, or be considered to go, in what he grants, beyond his own military power; that he cannot, as a military commander, determine anything regarding the rights, or forfeiture of rights, in a civil point of view, of those who surrender; that so soon as a rebellion is at an end, the power of parole ceases with it, and the paroled person becomes again simply a citizen or subject, with undiminished responsibility to the law of the land; that no immunity results from a military convention beyond the stipulated military points; that prisoners of war remain always responsible for heinous crimes committed before their capture, even in regular war; that all that which, in a rebellion, a formal or stipulated surrender implies, and can imply in good faith, is that the act of appearing in arms against the other party shall not be visited as a crime, so far as the articles of surrender themselves go, and so long as they in their nature can last; and that those who rebelliously have taken up arms, cannot enjoy greater immunities than the civilians who have joined the rebellion.

In so far as any doubt can arise as to the application of these rules to the case of Lee and his army, it was due to Grant's stipulation that they should not be molested as long as they obeyed the laws in force at their place of residence. But it is now clear that the convention between him and Grant was unfortunately and unskilfully worded. We understand that Grant, with his usual modesty, acknowledges this to be the case, and explains it by the fact that he wrote hurriedly and alone. He ought to have stipulated for unconditional surrender. There is no doubt he might have done so. What was still more unfortunate was, that after this convention such haste should have been made in concluding similar ones with the other rebel commanders, so that at last the parole has been made to cover with immunity such persons as Forrest and Semmes; the one guilty of the butchery of Fort Pillow, the other of decoying prizes at sea by burning others in the night —an offence which either does or ought to place him in the category of enemies of the human race.

The ground on which Lee will be allowed to pass harmless doubtless is, that whatever the law be, both Grant and Lee considered the convention in the nature of an amnesty, and that the former surrendered under the impression that, having once done so, he had nothing further to fear, and that the Government, therefore, is unwilling to take advantage of the misconception, more for the sake, however, of its own reputation, than from any other consideration. But if it be really desired to be rid of these men, it is hard to see what objection there could be, either legal or moral, to declaring the stipulation at an end, and giving them thirty or forty days, and free passes, to get out of the way.

CLASS RULE.

It is a favorite stock argument with the European opponents of progress—and probably not a few who would be unjustly stigmatized as opponents of progress have been seduced by it—that democracy is a very fine thing in theory; that it would be the best possible polity if a whole community could be inspired with the requisite intelligence and wisdom; but that it is not adapted to the imperfect condition of our nature, and, until that nature can be changed, must result in an inferior sort of government.

In repelling this charge, we think that the friends of democracy have not always taken the wisest, perhaps not even in reality the boldest, course. They have denied the premises, while virtually almost admitting the conclusion, by asserting that democracy did necessarily, by its own operation, produce a certain preternatural amount of intelligence and knowledge in the whole community, enabling it to comply with the high theoretical demands of the constitutional polity. Now, that democracy does tend in this direction we firmly believe; but the weak point of the case is that, until this mission be fairly worked out, the basis of fact will always be shaky and liable to afford the enemy a triumph.

Our manner of defence would be to reverse the old Tory or obstructive argument. We admit that in theory an aristocratic government is better than a democracy, but maintain that the infirmities inseparable from human nature make it much inferior in practice.

The folly of the multitude, as contrasted with the wisdom of the few, has always been a favorite topic with both real and pseudo philosophers, nor can we say that it is altogether a flattering self-delusion on their part. To say that "the majority are fools" is a great deal more uncivil than untrue. The quack who, according to the well known story, explained his success on this principle, was only the type of a multitude of charlatans, private and public, in all ages and all countries.

Why not then entrust the government of a country to its aristocracy, in the original sense of the term, its best men, born and educated for the task, and removed by their education from the influence of the numerous errors which beset and pervade the masses? To be sure, mere closet philosophers, from Plato downward, have usually made a frightful mess of it whenever they abandoned their sphere of contemplative criticism and tried their hand at legislation; but this is because they are closet philosophers. A real working aristocracy, composed of men of the world and first-class professional men as well as scholars—why is it not the very model of a governing body?

Because, in thus presenting the case, a most important practical element has been omitted. Intellect and culture are not all that is required. If we could adopt the Greek definition of the all-sufficient wisdom as the product of natural cleverness and acquired knowledge; if we incorporated with this the doctrine of the Platonic Protagoras, that virtue is one of the teachable sciences, then we might assent to the government of the few as a matter of course. If we agree with Tacitus that all historical events are the result of deliberate calculation and plan, we might prefer to have our history made for us by a select minority. Or if, to come down to our day, we accepted without reserve Buckle's dogma; if we believed that intellectual causes were the only civilizing agents, we might admit that the superiority of cultivated intellect afforded the best chance for good government. But the whole course of human experience teaches us that the most accomplished gentlemen, the most learned specialists, the wisest statesmen, are not free from human infirmity. Your charientes and calocagathœ (to borrow the fashionable slang of Athens) may be very superior men, but they are only men after all; and when they have things altogether their own way, they will be tempted to act for their own special benefit at the expense of society. Let the members of one class monopolize the power of government, and they will be pretty certain to ill-use the other classes, either positively by oppressing them, or at least negatively by not looking properly after their interests. Various passions and prejudices operate as strongly to bias men's minds from truth and justice as sheer ignorance does. The late financial crudities of some of our legislators may well move the pity of the political economist, but what shall we say to the corn-laws so long and strenuously maintained by the collective wisdom of England?

In short, the only way in which every class can be secured in the enjoyment of its liberty, is for every class to have its share in the government.

If it be objected that this principle would require the extension of the suffrage to women and minors, we reply, first, that women or children do not constitute a distinct class of society: their interests are combined with and distributed among those of all classes; secondly, that they have a strong natural protection in the love of their husbands and parents; thirdly, that, notwithstanding this natural protection, they are not always free from oppression even in the most civilized countries, and their proper treatment now presents some of the most difficult social and legislative problems.

A democratic government, the government of the people, the whole people, as opposed to that of any class, is really the most practical and the most practicable, because, by representing every class, it affords the strongest safeguard against that abuse of power to which human nature is liable. And this conclusion has immediate application to the question of negro suffrage at the South—a question which is assuming grave proportions. The arguments against giving the blacks a franchise are plausible enough by themselves in theory, but leave the main matter of fact untouched. That the negroes are too ignorant, or too likely to be influenced by their late masters on the one hand, or by demagogues on the other; that they will not vote as we may wish them, or as they ought to—admitting all this, none of the objectors have shown by what means these new citizens can be protected in their "life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness," unless they have a share of political power. True, there is a way. It might be done by perpetual interference of the Federal authority, by prolonging military rule, by making an abnormal and temporary condition of things permanent. But this would be de-construction, not reconstruction; it would be adjourning all government indefinitely.

Democracy and universal suffrage are popularly supposed to be all but synonymous, because they are found together here. In reality there is no necessary connection between them. A democracy much more radical than our own coexisted with a very limited suffrage in the case of the ancient Athenians; universal suffrage coexists with a pure autocracy in the case of the French at this day. Our older States generally began with some qualification; most of them have done away with it, but it does not follow that we are bound to carry out the principle on all new occasions, nay, that we may not recede from it in old localities, if circumstances shall render the movement necessary. All we say is, If we are thus compelled to take the back track, let our change of base be conducted in an equitable and consistent manner. Let exclusion be founded on ignorance, not on color; let us not, under the plea of self-preservation, perpetuate that spirit of caste which so nearly proved our destruction.

Correspondence.

THE TARIFF.

To the Editor of The Nation:

It is well known that a Commission is now in session in New York, engaged in the revision of the tax and tariff systems of the country. The members of the Commission will without doubt adopt the policy "to hear all and say nothing;" but as I have great confidence that all honest discussion among the people results in a concentration of opinion in favor of such legislation as in the long run proves to have been as nearly right as the circumstances of the time would permit, it seems to me that the principles on which tax and tariff bills should be founded should now be under discussion among the people, in order that the report of the Commission may be intelligently considered, and either accepted and embodied in well considered laws, or rejected because not in harmony with well digested public opinion.

Such discussion is the more desirable at the present time, because it is quite evident that a great change is taking place in the relative opinions of the East and the West upon the subject of free trade and protection.

It is currently believed in the West that the people of New England are almost a unit in favor of what has been called by politicians "the American system of protection to home industry;" but if Western men could by correspondence or other methods get at the real opinions of New England men, especially of the manufacturers, they would find that very few of them would advocate protection as a system upon which laws should be framed ab initio. It would be said by intelligent manufacturers: We should not now advocate the principle or policy of fostering manufactures by protective duties, but we by no means intend to say that in that admission we also intend to advocate the repeal of all the protective laws now in existence. Our manufactures have got established partly by means of a protective system, and such being the fact, they are in a different relation to each other and to the people from that which they would have held had there been no protection, and therefore any sudden change would be disastrous. We claim that because we have had protection in the past, the change to a system of free trade must be gradual. The most ardent free trader should advocate such a gradual change, in order that the disaster which would follow an abrupt one might not create a reaction in favor of high protection.

It is probable that the very great increase of woollen machinery caused by the excessive war demand, and the excessive protection involved in very high rates of exchange, may furnish sound reasons for protecting that interest until the increase of population shall have equalled the increase of machinery, and in this the Western wool-grower has as much interest as the Eastern spinner; but in the very fact is involved an argument against a permanent system of high protection, in that the excessive protection of high rates of exchange having over-stimulated production, a temporary treatment is called for which a healthy body politic would not require.

Yet many of those who would make this claim would entirely agree with the writer that the active, intelligent, handy people of New England would number as many, be as well employed and as well paid as they are now, had there never been a protective duty imposed since the foundation of the country. Their industry would doubtless be exerted in different channels, but it would be an insult to suppose that New England men could ever have been reduced to poverty or idleness by a system which left their native shrewdness absolutely free in its intercourse with all other men.

On the other hand, it has been generally supposed by New England men that the West is a unit in favor of absolute free trade, and it is somewhat amusing to a looker-on to observe the suspicion with which the advocacy of a protective system by Western men is being viewed. It is becoming known in New England that, partly because the time has actually come when a part of the labor of the West ought to be turned from farming to manufacturing, and partly because of the excessive protection involved in the high rates of exchange during the war, certain iron works, machine shops, woollen mills, nail factories, etc., etc., have become well established in the West, and that Western farmers, having paid off the debts which they incurred in improving so much land that they brought corn down to ten cents a bushel, have now a surplus capital, and are beginning to think that they had better diversify their industry, and are actually asking to be protected at the outset in order that they may safely embark in manufacturing upon a large scale.

It may here be noticed that quite as sound an argument could now be made in favor of protecting Western manufactures against New England as was formerly made for protecting American manufactures against Old England; but it is not upon this ground that the Eastern man now views with distrust the spread of protective ideas in the West. One New England man says, "By means of protection"—another says, "In spite of protection—we have at length established all our various manufactures upon a firm basis. We have capital, industry, and skill, and by means of these we can maintain our supremacy against any free competition. But if the protective system is adopted, so that for a time unskilful beginners in the West can gain an apparent success in competition with us, we shall have only fluctuation, with possible great fortune to the few, but ultimate disaster to the many, both East and West."

This growing conviction of New England in favor of moderate tariffs and a gradual tendency to free trade does not yet find public advocates to any extent. If an officer of a large corporation were to avow these views, it might still cost him his office; yet nine-tenths of the stockholders would probably agree with him in private.

It needs but little more growth, however, of protective ideas in the West to cause the East to cry free trade; and yet the two sections are practically very near. The New England manufacturer, still calling himself a protectionist, desires to be relieved, as far as may be, from what he has found to be the trammels of high protection, by the establishment of such a moderate tariff as will yield to the country the largest revenue; and the Western man, yielding his old views of absolute free trade, but still calling himself a free trader, desires the establishment of precisely the same tariff, for the sake of the moderate protection incidentally arising from a well devised revenue system of duties.

It is one of the compensations for the war that men have been brought together in our armies from the most remote sections, and have learned to respect each other, and to lay aside petty sectional jealousies; and even in conflict with Southern rebels, new ideas of the character of Northern and Southern men have been gained by each respectively; and it is not to be doubted that from the turmoil of civil war will be developed a homogeneous nation, where before existed only an aggregation of States.

Both from the visit of the Western Boards of Trade to Boston, and from the great gathering of business men at Detroit, and from other similar meetings which we hope may follow, there cannot fail to result a similar removal of misconceptions and a harmonizing of ideas upon the great practical questions of finance and trade, on which the East and the West and also the South are in fact more in harmony than the misuse of terms has yet allowed them to discover; in fact, these terms, "protection and free trade," which used to represent fundamentally different ideas, have come to be mere catchwords, used by politicians to keep sections divided on which the mass of the people are practically agreed. The East and the West were never so near in fact and in theory as they are now; and although the debates in Trade Conventions may seem to indicate great diversity, yet the private meeting and intercourse of the members will bring unanimity. The talking members may appear to be wide apart, the great mass of silent members will find themselves united.

It is to be hoped that the Commission now in session upon the tax and tariff may be able to report in favor of the English, or, as it has been called, the concrete system of raising revenue; that is, to secure the larger part of the necessary revenue from a few imposts which shall not interfere with the industry of the country, such as upon whiskey, tobacco, tea, coffee, and stamp duties.

If such a system can be made practicable in this country, the necessary but complicated and dangerous legislation required to adjust the tax and the tariff bills to each other may be mainly avoided, and the tariff may be permanently regulated by itself. If it shall be found that the different sections of the country are now practically agreed upon what they want, and are only separated by a misuse or different use of terms, then the legislation of the next session of Congress will be much simplified, and the laws which it shall pass will stand unchanged for a much longer period.

On the other hand, if the Commission shall not be able to report in favor of the concrete system of revenue, and it shall continue to be necessary to impose heavy taxes upon the industry of the country, there will be still greater need of harmonizing the opinions of different sections.

In such case, the internal revenue bill should first be substantially agreed upon, and the excise taxes on manufactures and home productions settled; the tariff bill should then be taken up in two divisions.

1st, A schedule of duties on imports should be made upon such articles as are subject to an excise tax in the internal revenue bill, exactly adjusted to the rate of such excise tax; these duties should be specific, and should never be changed, except as the internal taxes may be changed. Coupled with this schedule should be provisions entitling exporters of domestic commodities to a drawback equal to the internal revenue tax. By this division of the tariff bill, the domestic manufacturer or producer will be put exactly on a par with the foreign manufacturer or producer, both at home and abroad.

2d, The home manufacturer having been protected by the foregoing schedule against any discrimination against him, the second schedule of duties may be adjusted upon the principle of moderate revenue, or upon any other basis, the same as if there were no internal revenue tax or first schedule of duties.

If the endeavor should be made to adjust these distinct points in the tariff in a single schedule, there will be great danger of an unequal adjustment and of constant attempts to change, until the tax and tariff bills will become even more difficult to interpret than the existing laws, if such a thing be possible.

EMIGRATION TO THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of The Nation:

On this subject, which we hear so much of, there is one most important thing quite overlooked, viz., that the movement, if it ever takes place, will bring the Anglo-Saxon and the kindred races of Northern Europe into circumstances entirely new. There is no case in history of their being found in the tropics or semi-tropics under these two conditions: 1st, Without slavery; 2d, In sufficient numbers to develop their own institutions. In such climates we can find great numbers of them with slavery, and a few without; but nowhere the two conditions.

In Southern Brazil there is a colony of Germans, some sixty thousand, doing well; they are industrious and healthy, and growing rich; but they live under a Portuguese government. In Texas there are thirty or forty thousand Germans; but they have always been subject to the slaveholders of that State. In New Guinea there is a considerable colony of Hollanders; here the first condition is wanting; Holland has always burdened her colonies with restrictions so oppressive as to amount to an enslaving of the whole population. In the British East and West Indies, and at the Cape of Good Hope, we find a few Englishmen and Scotchmen controlling large populations of other races; but this does not answer the second condition. There are also in South Africa two independent republics of Dutch Boers; but they also fall short of the second condition, because they are so very sparsely settled. Look where we will, we cannot find the two conditions together.

The question is, Can our race settle in warm climates and retain its great qualities? Does the vigor and does the perpetuity of these qualities depend on snow and ice? The common, the almost universal, answer is, yes. I venture to say no. Has the reader ever considered the fact that there has never been an opportunity to try the experiment? The whole of South America, of Central America, and Mexico was settled by Spanish hidalgos or petty nobles, too proud to work. Our Southern States were settled by the cavaliers and convicts of King James and King Charles, also ashamed to work; slaves were brought to them soon after, so that all the warm regions on this continent were occupied by labor-hating colonists. Not a case has ever occurred among them of the higher classes setting an example of labor with their own hands or holding labor in honor; not a single community (a few individuals excepted) where those classes generally have not regarded idleness, high living, and sensual indulgence as the chief good of life. Hence the inference that a warm climate must always produce these fruits. The tendency of the unthinking mass of mankind is to believe that any two things which they have always seen conjoined belong together by necessity.

Are we really shut up to the conclusion that those charming regions must be for ever given up to lounging and licentiousness? Does the Christian reader seriously believe that our heaven-descended religion cannot produce a change? Can the Anglo-Saxon race do all manner of wonderful things except this—to bring about a happy union between a fair climate and good morals? I maintain not only that this can be done, but even that a civilization can be created superior to anything now known in our country, and in no very long time. A principal obstacle to intellectual improvement in the best parts in the North where good morals prevail is this, that the severe climate consumes the time of the people both in summer to provide for winter, and in winter to keep themselves warm; the whole year is occupied in a contest to preserve life. Only a few professional men can find time to study, and even they only in a few intervals of professional labor. But let a colony settle in a climate where five or six hours of work would produce what twelve do here, and you presently begin to achieve a general intelligence which no country has yet seen, provided you have a sufficient number of picked families, and they unite to realize the idea. A few years must be spent in "roughing it;" but when their lands are fenced and subdued, and their houses built, more leisure follows. It would be just as easy to realize this idea as the Puritan idea of New England, or the "blissful ignorance" idea of the French Catholics of Lower Canada, or any other. And surely there would be no lack of attractiveness in the object proposed: To create that unheard-of thing, good morals in a mild climate, and to redeem the largest and fairest parts of God's earth from the reproach of all ages. Such a colony must have a Columbus sort of feeling, which would richly repay them for their enterprise. Nor would their children in the main disappoint them.

For some time my mind had been running on such thoughts, when I fell in with a small volume lately published in New York City, entitled "In the Tropics." The writer had been a clerk in the crowded misery of the city, when he went to Hayti and commenced cultivating a few cheap acres of land with his own hands and American implements. The book is a record of his first year's experiments and results; his luscious vegetables, piles of potatoes for sale, and good food; his orange avenue, mango avenue, cocoanut avenue, and so on. It is a book of wonderful interest. One remark he makes is this: "Under the warm sun of the tropics, white working men and their machinery will yet open the grandest field for civilization ever seen." He speaks of a crop of some sort every month; of being liberated from the slavery of providing for winter; and of being enabled to spend several hours of the warm part of the day in reading, or, if he chose, in light work in the shade.

The objection will no doubt be made by some that they could never endure the dreadful heat. This is a vulgar error, as I know by a dozen years' residence in different parts of the tropics. There is no such dreadful heat. The deception arises from the discomfort of coming into our hot Northern weather suddenly from our cold spring months. Scarcely any are so much annoyed by the heat of August or September as by that of June. Where the heat continues the year round, it ceases to be felt. Take away the vices, the ignorance, and foolish exposures of warm climates, and the average of life would be longer.

N.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

III.

Richmond, July 17, 1865.

Since Richmond was evacuated, more than half of its inhabitants have been compelled to seek a part or all of their sustenance at the hands of charity. And this relief is received not only by those classes of the population that always were poor, but, in many instances, by families that a few weeks ago were affluent. On the first of March last the head of the family may have owned a great warehouse filled with goods, containing perhaps many hundred hogsheads of the highest priced tobacco, the gradual accumulation of the last two or three years. Tobacco of the cheaper kinds soon becomes spoiled if kept for a long time in the original packages. But the warehouse with all its stores perished in the great conflagration, business is at a standstill, and the merchant finds himself upon the world absolutely a beggar without bread. He lives, perhaps, in a fine house; but nobody will buy it, nobody will take a mortgage upon it, until it can be known whether or not the owner's treason is to be pardoned, and his property left at his own disposal.

So great and wide-spread is the destitution that the military authorities have divided the city into districts, and soldiers detailed for the purpose go about from house to house, finding out whoever may be in need of aid, and giving them orders on the commissariat for stores. Besides the provisions thus distributed by the Government, the American Union Commission is engaged in ministering to the necessities of the people. One of the very few national flags to be seen in Richmond waves over the tent of its agency in the Capitol Square. There, since a week after the evacuation, tickets have every day been issued, which secured to their holders a dinner of soup from the Commission's soup-house, or flour—of which several hundred barrels have been distributed—or meal and rice. Sometimes as many as fifteen hundred soup tickets have been given away in a day. The charities of the Government are of course upon a much more extended scale. In addition to its labors in relieving these more immediate wants, the Commission has furnished garden seeds, and farming utensils of various kinds, to such cultivators of land as could bring satisfactory evidence of honesty and poverty. Certificates of loyalty are not required. No public announcement of this latter distribution was made, and the persons benefited since the first of this month, at which time it commenced, are not more than twenty in number, and are, for the most part, residents of Henrico County. From the account books of the Commission I am allowed to copy two or three returns, which are of interest as showing the unfortunate condition in which the ravages of war have placed very many farmers in the tide-water section of Virginia:

"Mrs. N. N. owns a hundred and twenty acres of land, of which there are thirty under cultivation; she has one horse and a small cart, but no farming implements, nor money to get them; her house is occupied by Federal troops.

"G. M. has a wife and nine children; owns and cultivates six acres of land; has now a borrowed horse and plough, and no farming implements of his own.

"W. C. owns a hundred acres, and cultivates forty-five; borrows a horse; all the implements on his place destroyed by General Butler's army; and he has nothing left but his farm.

"Mrs. M. C. owns a hundred and fifty acres of land, has twenty-five acres under cultivation; hires a horse and cart from negroes; has no implements left that can be used; has not a dollar."

No one not quite destitute of means was allowed to procure seeds or tools; but people in the condition set forth by the extracts given above received spades, shovels, rakes, hoes, and ploughs. In one or two instances a bill was taken with the articles, and the recipient hoped soon to pay for them, but most of the parties were content to take them as a gift. Now that the new crop is coming in, the Commission proposes, I believe, to suspend operations for a time, and not recommence its labor until the fall, when the inclement season will make more imperative demands upon its resources, and for clothing and fuel as well as for food.

So much has been said of late about the lofty hopes which the emancipated slave entertains in reference to his future, of the insolence of his demeanor, of the certainty that in his hands freedom will become license, that I have looked with care to find indications of these things. So far as concerns the negro's manners, it seems to me that he has by no means removed all traces of his former servility of demeanor. My observation has, of course, been confined within narrow limits of time and space, but as far as I have seen, in the hotels, at barber shops, in public conveyances, in the streets, the colored people appear good-natured, well behaved, and certainly far more respectful and deferential than one ever expects to find white Americans. At Norfolk and Portsmouth, towns where, a short time previous to my visit and a short time after, whites and blacks were engaged in savage party fights, I met some negroes who might be classed as exceptions to this general description; but even in those towns, though there was little visible good humor, there was no insolence. How long the deportment of the blacks will retain the characteristic marks of their servitude, and how long a time will elapse before white people cease to be more angry at a negro's impudence than at a white man's, are questions only to be decided by future experience.

The colored people, at the instance of negroes resident in Alexandria, will shortly hold a convention at that city, and take into consideration the prospects of their race in Virginia. The public generally will then be informed as to the nature of their demands, and in my opinion these will not be so extravagant as many people now suppose and declare.

Not long since I availed myself of a favorable opportunity to converse with two Richmond negroes who had been members of the delegation that recently visited President Johnson, and who expected to be in the Alexandria Convention. Both were mulattoes. One had long been free; the other was a slave up to the evacuation of the city. They were men of respectable appearance and of intelligence, speaking with propriety, and evidently not unaccustomed to reflection.

They thought a good many of their people in the more remote and secluded parts of Virginia were hardly aware as yet that they were free. But the great majority not only had a knowledge of the fact, but also knew pretty well in what respects their present differed from their former situation. They all knew they were their own men, and had got themselves to work for. There was great need for some law to regulate the price of labor, so that the people might be able to stay at their own homes and yet not be forced to take less wages than they ought to receive. They thought the relations between capital and labor could not safely be left to natural laws at present, and that they would not be at any rate. Legislation, if not used in behalf of the colored laborer, would be used against him. While the better class of planters would use the people fairly and well, there were many to whose good-will the negro could not trust, and these would join with the worst classes of voters to oppress him. It was not the slaveholders that were most to be feared; it was the rabble—the same people that were beating the negroes at Norfolk. Both took it for granted that the colored population was to form a class of hired laborers. Very few of them would be able to buy land now, and they had no expectation that land would be given them.

I asked them what they thought of the immediate enfranchisement of the negro. One of the two men was in favor of it, and urged all the ordinary arguments in support of it. Unless his people obtained a share of political power, they would have no protection against rapacity and oppression. They would always be kept in poverty and ignorance. They would become a class most dangerous to the peace of society. Nor should rebels be allowed to make laws for Union men. His friend did not think the negroes in Virginia were fit to exercise the right of suffrage immediately, nor that they would be for some years. Most of them knew nothing about the country. Virginian politics had done nothing but get worse and worse ever since the State, some fifteen or twenty years ago, adopted a more democratic constitution, and let every man cast a vote who was able to bear arms. The gentlemen couldn't get anywhere near the polls on election day, and the men who knew nothing and were worth nothing had everything their own way. The other replied that, unless such men had the right of voting, they never would know anything or be worth anything, and that, at any rate, they had taxes to pay. It would be the same, he said, with the negroes. The convention, both thought, would go no further than to ask that, if ignorant white men were allowed to vote, ignorant black men should have the same privilege. On that point the two men were at one, but they differed still as to the question whether all men, without distinction of color, should have the right of suffrage, or only the intelligent men of both races. They agreed, too, that there was very faint hope of the convention's being able to effect anything in reference to that matter, whatever good might flow from its efforts to obtain a system of laws regulating the price of labor.

Unlike the negro population with which I have been best acquainted, these men, as well as others of their race whom I have met in Virginia, seem to look for an improvement in their condition more to their own exertions and to local action, and less to the general Government and the people of the North. They are decidedly more intelligent than the negroes of Southern Georgia and South Carolina, and evince their superiority by their language dress, and alertness of demeanor.

As one sits in the hotel parlor or in the cool piazza after tea, it is probable that the group surrounding him consists of men from all parts of the South. Military titles are frequent, and the majority have on, if not a full suit, at least some article of clothing made of Confederate gray cloth, or of butternut brown. Few are without a pipe and a tobacco pouch. Among themselves they are very frank in manners and speech, nor do I observe that a Northerner is treated with particular coldness. The old gentleman from Columbia whose property has all been destroyed, and who is on his way North to make a composition with creditors whom he will never be able to pay in full; the man from Louisiana who thinks he has as good a right to live in this country as any other man, who is going to stay and live easy if they leave him his property, and stay and take it rough-and-tumble if they don't; the gentleman who was born and raised in East Tennessee, and who has left his native State because he considers it unsafe for any man that has been a Southern sympathizer to try and live there, and who is now looking for a place to locate; the young man from North Carolina who deserted from Lee's army after Gettysburg and worked as a farm-laborer in Maryland—all furnish a share of the smoke and the talk. The last named person, however, does not, like the rest, confide his past history to the company in general. He tells it to me, knowing that I am from the North, and adds that he reckons "they'll be pretty hard on a man round here if they knew he didn't go plum through to the surrender. Down in Moore Co. he has two brothers that were just as strong for the war as any two fellows could be. He don't know what they'll say to him. He reckons they stuck it out. He'd like to get a good mule and carry on with him when he goes."

The conversation relates to the crops, the condition of the negroes, the behavior of the Yankees in each man's neighborhood, the probable action of the Federal Government, Southern prospects in business and politics, the state of public opinion in the North, all mingled with stories of the war—perhaps an anecdote of "Prince" John Magruder, an adventure with bushwhackers, a description of the wholesale destruction caused by Sherman's march, or of midnight robbery of a rebel family in Tennessee.

A remark made by the Tennesseean attracts the attention of his neighbor, who says: "Ah, doctor, have you been North recently?" "Yes, sir, I had to leave my home in Tennessee. My wife is a New England woman, and I've been staying with her folks. In fact, I hadn't any other place to stay at, and was very thankful to stay there."

"Oh, we're all poor together, sir; and no Southern man need be ashamed to confess it. How did you find the people up there?"

"Well, of course, they think they were right, and they're mighty well pleased to think that we're subjugated, but everybody was kind and pleasant. The business men were all glad to see Southern men coming back. You see they never liked the Western men so well as us. Westerners would often buy when they meant to fail and smash up, but we Southerners never had the name of doing that, and they like to see us again."

Here the gentlemen from South Carolina interrupts. He is a short, small man, quite sixty years old, slow of speech but emphatic, and with a careworn expression of face.

"Were you owing much, sir, at the North?"

"Well, yes, sir; I owed near forty thousand dollars when the war broke out."

"What did they do with you? I am expecting in a few days to meet creditors of my own, and I would like to know how they feel up there."

"They'll treat you well. Very likely you'll find that your creditors are not the men that you think. Some of my paper had passed into second and third hands. The original holders had failed, been smashed up by the war, and my notes were sold at auction. I got them back cheap. I heard of one Norfolk house whose paper had been sold in that way, and they got it again for ten cents on a dollar. Others of my creditors asked me for a full statement, made on my honor, of what my debts were, and the amount of property that I had saved. I gave it, and they dealt very fairly with me. I couldn't pay fifty cents. Oh, they leave a man a little. Of course it depends a good deal on the kind of a man the creditor is, and a good deal on your own character."

"Will they let a man have more goods?"

"On credit?—no, sir. Won't do that. You may get them to fix it up in the way of consignment."

"Well, sir, is it reasonable for them to expect us to pay our debts? Now here am I. I may say that I haven't a cent in the world. Sherman's army burnt my store and my house."

"Sherman says he didn't."

"He did, sir. There can be no doubt of it. One of the Yankee officers told my wife not two hours before the fire began, 'Columbia is a doomed city.' I cannot but think that the moral obligation resting upon me to fulfil my contracts with my Northern creditor is neutralized. That was not civilized warfare. May be it was not my creditors who were responsible for that devastation. But some of us down here were innocent of the sin of secession, yet we had to suffer with the guilty. Why should not the innocent and the guilty at the North suffer together in the same way? I do not believe that I am morally bound to spend my old age in toiling to repay my Northern creditors. I ought to be legally released from my indebtedness, and not feel that there is a burden upon me which I can never shake off."

Thereupon followed an animated discussion. The question, considered as one of pure abstract morality, was decided against the old man; but it seemed to be the general opinion that he would have little practical difficulty in settling his affairs with his creditors. The company seemed to think that whatever might be abstractly right, they, individually, if they could not discharge all their obligations, would prefer paying a Southern creditor in full to making a division amongst Southern and Northern creditors.

"Well, doctor, how do the people up there feel about negro suffrage?"

"I think they're in favor of it. In New England they are, at any rate. In the first place, there's a class that think if the nigger gets a vote, they'll come down here and ride into office right away. Always been friends of the black man, philanthropic, and that sort of thing, you know. They all go in for it. Then there's a very large class who think that the South will always be raising the devil, seceding or something, if they don't give a vote to the niggers. 'The niggers have all been loyal,' they say. They all go in for it. Then a good many think that we, at the South, if we are left to ourselves, won't treat the niggers well; and that class goes in for it. I wish all our people could see it as I do, and they'd go in for it, too."

"How's that? Do you believe in negro suffrage?"

"Yes, I do; and I'll tell you why I do. It will work just the same here as it does there. The class of people there that represent our niggers, the laborers, have a right to vote. My father-in-law employs thirty-five Irishmen. They always vote the right ticket, and he tells them which is the right one. Now, major, if you hire thirty-five niggers, work 'em well, pay 'em well, and feed 'em well—they don't know Wm. H. Seward from a foreign war, they care nothing about the country (we all know what their 'loyalty' amounted to—Cuffee struck out for himself)—now how are they going to vote?"

"Why, they're going to vote as you say."

"Vote themselves white wives more likely," said a young man from Charlotte county. "No, no, sir; you are mistaken," said another, and there was a general expression of dissent. Some other way than that must be discovered for the South to obtain political power in the Union.

"The Northern friends of the negro," said the major, "if they want to benefit their protegé, had better abstain from any interference in that matter, for the Southern people will not be apt to stand it. Everybody admits that the negro is incapable of intelligently exercising the right of suffrage. Why give it to him, then? No people every fought more bravely than ours have fought for the last four years. We have been obliged to succumb. With how small forces we carried on the war has never yet been told. General Lee could tell, and some time may. We were outnumbered five to one, and here we are subjugated. History records no example of such a war, followed by such a peace. Our people are quiet. No one talks of insurrection. We go peaceably about our business. Every difficulty that has arisen in our streets is directly traceable to Yankee soldiers and the teachings of Yankee negroes. Why should the North profess to fear that we are not yet conquered, or are not honest when we say so? We are conquered, and all our actions acknowledge it. We may not love the Yankees; I don't think we pretend to do that, do we, captain? but we have made up our minds to behave as peaceable citizens. We can keep these States in the Union, and we mean to do it. We have tried our best to take them out, and we admit that we can't." This, in substance, the major delivered in an oratorical style, and seemingly with the approbation of all present. He then continued, "But, of course, doctor, the North is not unanimous on this question? I am given to understand that Mr. Johnson is opposed to negro suffrage."

"Yes, he is. He takes the same view of the thing that I do, and you may be sure that he'll be like a flint. They won't turn him."

"You know Mr. Johnson?"

"Yes, sir, I saw him when I was on there."

The conversation continued, and it seemed the conviction of all present that nothing could be more preposterous, and nothing was more improbable, than that Virginia should grant the right of suffrage to her negro population. If such a thing should happen, nothing but calamity could be reasonably expected. The national debt would be repudiated. What negro would deny himself a pound of sugar in order that he might honorably pay his share of the interest on it? The negroes could vote us into a war at any time. Anything would serve as a pretext. Cuba was full of slaves, make war on Spain and free them.

Every demagogue would do with them precisely as he chose. The doctor might talk of laborers voting as the capitalist directed, but if the laborer could vote he'd soon vote himself a living out of the capitalist's property. And even if he should obey the directions of his employer, that would be of little good, as the great majority of them would never have a regular employer.

A young man residing near Fort Monroe thought that a great many niggers would find employment in the Federal army, as he had been told by an officer whom he met there that the Government intended to distribute nigger regiments here and there throughout the South to keep the people quiet.

This statement provoked a good deal of indignant comment. Nothing would make the people angrier than that. It was said the people would universally regard it as an insult. They had borne a good deal, and were ready to bear more; but to have negro troops put over them was not a natural consequence of their defeat, and they would not bear that. There was a point at which forbearance ceased to be a virtue.

These remarks were made by the younger men of the little circle. The major enquired if the Federal officer who had made the remarks reported had seen service, for, said he, "he does n't talk like an old soldier. Did you find out how many fights he'd been in?"

The young man replied that the officer was a surgeon, who had entered the service with a view of improving himself in his business, and who, when asked about his battles, replied that he had never seen so much of the active operations as he would have liked. The young man found him in his mother's house. His mother, much against her will, had taken him as a boarder, because the surgeon very much wished it, and offered to have a guard put on the property if the lady would consent to receive him.

"You are not likely to hear such talk from the old soldiers on either side," said the major, who seemed to fill the position of mentor in the party. "I do not believe the War Department proposes to follow any such plan. If Mr. Stanton does adopt that policy, it will produce great evil, and postpone the day of peace. He need not put the negro on top of us. We will stay down without that."

ENGLAND.—THE RESULT OF THE ELECTIONS.

London, July 15, 1865.

Whig and Tory are terms gone out of fashion except in remote rural districts. Throughout all the recent elections, what has struck me most has been the sedulous care with which either party has avoided identifying itself with the old historic appellations. There are few candidates bold enough to call themselves Tories, fewer still old fashioned enough to call themselves Whigs. We are all now-a-days Liberals or Conservatives; indeed, most of us profess to be a compound of both, and are either Liberal Conservatives or Conservative Liberals. Thus, as I foretold, the elections have had throughout a hybrid and indecisive character. If, according to the fashionable doctrine, the issue submitted to the country is simply whether Lord Derby or Lord Palmerston ought to be the Premier, it is clear that the country has no very decided opinion on the matter. It now seems pretty certain that the relative proportions of the members who will take their seats on the opening of Parliament on the right hand or the left of the Speaker, will not be materially affected by the elections. The English boroughs were the uncertain element in the electoral problem; and the issue of these borough elections has left the Ministry and the opposition very much where they were, as far as mere numbers are concerned.

Some American friends of mine, who were present at our metropolitan elections, expressed great surprise at the apparent tameness of the whole proceedings. Certainly with you, I suspect, the practice of voting must be far more general than it is with us. The extraordinary anomalies of our electoral system have a good deal to do with this apathy as to the exercise of the franchise. Let me cite my own case as an illustration of how the system works or fails to work. I am, I regret to say, considerably past thirty. I am in possession of sufficient income to be persecuted by tax collectors. I have been for years connected with newspapers. I have been editor, proprietor, correspondent, contributor, anything, in fact, except compositor. I have had some experience in election matters; and may say, without any inordinate vanity, that I have contributed to the rejection or return of more than one candidate; and yet, till this week, I have never voted at a parliamentary election in my life, simply and solely because I had not a vote, and was what Mr. Bright delights to call "a political serf." At last I have acquired the privilege of a freeman, not because my present abode is more expensive than my former ones—the rental, I am glad to say, is decidedly lower—but because the staircase, on which my chambers are situated, happens to have no outer door, so that my rooms count as a single residence. Thus, with our well-to-do and educated classes, it is a matter of complete uncertainty whether you have a vote or not; and this fact tends, I think, to destroy, or at any rate impair, the feeling that the discharge of your electoral functions is in any sense a moral duty. It is quite surprising how small a proportion of the electors vote in our large constituencies. At Westminster and Lambeth the contest this year was unusually keen, and excited very general interest; but in either borough little more than half the constituents went to the poll. In large cities, the reasons which render many country voters unwilling to vote at all are entirely inoperative. There is no more trouble in voting in London than there is in taking a railway ticket, and infinitely less danger of being hustled or annoyed. Yet, somehow or other, electors will not bestir themselves enough to vote. The explanation I take to be, not that the public are indifferent about political questions, but that the class to which the vast majority of voters belongs under our present system is so well represented, that it cares very little about swelling the numbers of the majority by which members are returned. A poorer class, which would be admitted by any important extension of the suffrage, would probably vote much more energetically, simply because it would not be so adequately represented in Parliament.

However, if things were too quiet in London, they have been lively enough at some of our provincial towns. In Nottingham the military had to be called out, in order to protect the voters on their way to the poll. At Grantham the hustings were torn down by the mob, and the election had to be suspended till order could be restored. At Chippenham there was a riot after the result of the poll was announced, during which the vicarage was attacked, and the windows smashed in with the tombstones torn up from the graves of the neighboring church-yard. At Tavistock the successful candidate had to bolt for his life, and, it is said, escaped from his constituents in disguise; and at many other boroughs the war of eggs and brickbats was waged with a fury worthy of the good old times. Of course in Ireland we are used to such occurrences, and look upon them as the normal rule of election days. At Belfast the court-house, where the nomination of members takes place, was occupied by a mob of Protestant factory hands, who, according to a local account, "rushed in with yells of triumph, each flourishing a bludgeon or 'skull cracker,' not round, but square, except the handle"—and, armed with these moral persuaders, evinced a determination to hear nobody except Sir Hugh Cairns, the Orange candidate, and the future Chancellor, by the way, of the next Tory administration. "If," we are told, "an unfortunate Liberal, Presbyterian or Catholic, had fallen into the hands of the mob, his life would have unquestionably been sacrificed, for the police could not get in to the rescue, and the Orangemen were absolutely frantic." At Belfast, however, and other Irish boroughs, which have been disgraced by similar outrages, there is at least the excuse of strong sectarian and political prejudices to justify the excitement. In England the election riots have almost universally been created by one of those local squabbles which appear unintelligible to outsiders. At Nottingham the real contest lay between three Liberals, and the partizans of one candidate broke the heads of the other's supporters with a sublime indifference to all political considerations. Indeed, this Nottingham election was eminently characteristic of our English social life. The candidates were Samuel Morley, the chairman of the defunct Administrative Reform Association, a radical manufacturer of the most advanced Manchester school; Mr. Paget, an eminently respectable Whig banker, of great local influence; and Sir Robert Clifton, or "Bobby Clifton," as his constituents delighted to call him. This gentleman's position cannot well be made intelligible to you without a lengthy disquisition. I suppose, however, most of you have read "Pendennis," and remember Sir Francis Clavering. Well, if you suppose Miss Amory's step-father to have been endowed with dauntless pluck, a sort of devil-may-care wit, and a rough power of slap-dash speaking, you will form some conception of the social position of the man whom the electors of one of the most radical boroughs in the country have returned as their representative. His Liberalism, such as it is, was of the most doubtful order; he had been, throughout the war, one of the most ardent supporters of the Confederate cause; he had taken an active part in hustling Mr. Stansfeld out of office, and in showing subserviency to the French Government—a sin of all others the most unpardonable in ordinary English eyes; he had no money to bribe; his impecuniosity was a matter of notoriety in the town near which he lived, and for which he has been returned. But, in spite of all, the electors could not overlook the fact that he was the last of the Cliftons—of a race of baronets whose family had held property near Nottingham for centuries; whose ancestors had represented the borough scores and scores of times. A "born gentleman" who will consent to be "hail fellow well met" with any tradesman and mechanic he happens to encounter, has a sort of hold on popular respect and liking, even in our most democratic constituencies, whose power cannot easily be over-estimated. As long as a man is young, and good-looking, and plucky, "our people," as Thackeray observed, "hardly think the worse of him for sowing his wild oats plentifully." And so, the old Liberal member, Mr. Paget, was turned out; and Sir Robert Clifton was returned to Parliament as the free choice of a borough which has always been the especial home of Chartism and ultra Radicalism.

However, now that I have spoken of the unpleasing side of the recent elections, let me turn to their brighter aspect. Few events can be more gratifying to thoughtful English Liberals than the result of the metropolitan contests this week. The great London boroughs approximate very closely to what all our constituencies must be whenever any large electoral reform is inaugurated in England. It is clear that with an extended suffrage we cannot maintain our present system, under which Milton, with a couple of hundred voters, returns as many members at the orders of the Fitz William family as Manchester with its half a million inhabitants. In some form or other, we shall be compelled to have large electoral districts, closely resembling the London boroughs both in their extent and in the absence of any distinct local characteristics. Now, hitherto, the experiment of such districts, as exhibited in London, had not been satisfactory. The name of a "metropolitan member" had become almost a term of reproach. That no gentleman or man of education had any chance of contesting these constituencies, that the election lay in the hands of pot-house cliques, that vulgar demagoguism of the lowest order was the only description of talent which would be recognized by such constituencies, were assertions made habitually by the opponents of reform, and to which it was not easy to find an honest answer. In the last Parliament Mr. Edwin James was returned for Marylebone, and Mr. William Roupell, now of Her Majesty's Penitentiary, was the elect of Lambeth. The colleagues of these gentlemen in the representation of the metropolis, though less notorious, were hardly more promising specimens of advanced Liberalism. Mr. Cox, the "Pet of Finsbury," as he used to be called, was a second-rate attorney, whose blunders rendered him the laughing-stock of the House of Commons. Williams, of Lambeth, was a poor caricature of the late Joseph Hume. Messrs. Ayrton Butler, Peto Shelley, Locke, and Doulton were all respectable mediocrities, who carried no weight in the House. The only two metropolitan members of political or general repute were Mr. Layard and Sir De Lacy Evans. The metropolis had come to be looked upon as a sort of Tom Tiddler's ground for political adventurers. Pushing barristers of doubtful Old Bailey repute, advertising tradesmen of the Barnum order, vestry celebrities, and debating club orators, had learned to consider themselves the class from which our metropolitan representatives ought to be selected.

The abuse had grown to be so great that, like most abuses in this country, it worked out its own remedy. A determination was come to by the leading men at these boroughs to see if their character for incompetency in the choice of representatives was really deserved. It was resolved to bring men of sterling repute before the electors, and to see whether they would know how to distinguish true merit from its pinchbeck counterfeit. It was owing to this resolution that Mr. Mill was brought forward for Westminster,

Mr. Hughes for Lambeth, and Mr. McCullagh Torrens for Finsbury. All these gentlemen proceeded on one principle. They relied solely upon their reputation as writers or men of thought; they discarded all the ordinary mechanism of electioneering. They had no public houses as committee rooms; no local solicitors in their hire as "confidential advisers;" no paid canvassers; no system of "sensation" placards or broadcast advertising. Every electioneering authority declared beforehand, and I believe sincerely, that without puffing, placarding, canvassing, and treating, it was impossible for any man to get in for a London constituency, unless he had that sort of popular notoriety enjoyed by old "Charley Napier," Lord Dudley Stuart, or poor "Tom Duncombe." Now most assuredly neither Mr. Mill, nor Mr. Torrens, nor even Mr. Hughes, had anything of this peculiar popularity. Their names are not "household words" amongst Englishmen. Yet on strict purity principles they were returned one and all by very large majorities. No doubt they owed their election mainly to an agency novel in electioneering affairs. The cheap penny press has virtually become a power in the state since the last elections; and by means of a paper whose circulation is as large as that of the Daily Telegraph, the electors of London can be canvassed to an extent to which personal solicitations could afford no parallel. Still the press could have effected nothing if the electors had not been sincerely anxious to choose the best men they could find. Money and elaborate canvassing, and even local popularity, were powerless against the resolution of the constituencies to return somebody who should be a credit to them. Since the event the Tory papers have endeavored to account for the return of Mill and Hughes by saying that their success was due to the zeal with which the electors were canvassed by their friends. I can only say that I saw a good deal of the working of both these gentlemen's committees, and that I never knew a contest carried on with a less display of activity on the part of the successful candidates. I should think there never was an election at which so many votes were given unsolicited. The success of Mill, Hughes, and Torrens was, I think, really due to two facts. In the first place, a large number of electors, who had never taken part previously in metropolitan elections, came to the polls as soon as they found they had a chance of returning a creditable candidate. In the second place, the working-men took a keen interest in the return of men whose names were known as champions of their cause, and showed a power of volunteer organization for which, I candidly confess, I should not have given them credit. When the reform question is discussed in the next Parliament, we shall, at any rate, hear no more about the degraded condition of the metropolitan constituencies.

Throughout the elections, the Times has maintained a most unusual silence about the whole contest. Having once assured its readers that nobody cared anything about political issues, and that the only issue to be tried at the hustings was whether Lord Derby should succeed Lord Palmerston, it has systematically ignored the elections. The only reason I can assign for this is that the "leading journal," with the strange absence of political insight which has recently signalized its management, had a half belief in the truth of the "conservative reaction," and fancying that the next Parliament might possibly inaugurate a Tory régime, was anxious to leave itself unpledged to either side in the contest. But the real truth is, that though the elections will effect very little change in what Mr. Disraeli termed the other day "the distribution of political power," they will produce a marked change in the constitution of Parliament. The Ministerial party—if we count Liberals of every shade as supporters of the Government—has gained some half dozen votes in the boroughs, and will certainly not lose in the counties. If, therefore, a vote of want of confidence in the Ministry should be proposed when the House next assembles, it will be rejected by a larger majority than in the late Parliament. But, on the other hand, the terms Ministerialist and Liberal will be far less identical in the newly elected legislature than they were in the old. There was not, as I anticipated, a signal increase in the number of independent Liberals returned to Westminster. Now Mr. Mill, in his last address to his constituents, defined clearly enough the policy of the party to which he has brought such an accession of strength. As between Tory and Whig administration, they will always vote for the latter. "We could not conceive," he said, "the circumstances under which any Liberal Ministry would not be preferable to any Conservative one." There is, therefore, no risk of any Tory-Radical coalition. But, at the same time, no Whig Ministry can continue in power without the aid of the advanced section, which will number some forty to seventy votes. And, therefore, the future policy of the Government will inevitably be moulded to a great degree in accordance with the principles of which Mr. Bright is the most distinguished advocate. I do not mean that the Government will be under the control of the Manchester party, but it will be unable to disregard their wishes with the same sublime indifference it manifested during the crisis of the American war, when the adherence of the moderate Conservatives enabled Lord Palmerston to defy the hostility of the Radicals. It is a significant fact that not one of this section of the Liberals has lost his seat as yet at the hustings.

Lord Amberley has failed at Leeds, partly because he traded too much on Earl Russell's somewhat tarnished popularity—and a great town never likes to elect a man simply because he is the son of a living father—partly because Punch invented for him the nickname of "Namberley Pamberley." Mr. Gladstone will have a hard fight for the University of Oxford, though his son, more happy than the youthful Russell, has been returned for Chester. Professor Fawcett has got in at Brighton, and will be the first blind man who has ever been elected a member of Parliament. We have had every other description of physical invalid cases. We have had lame, deaf, and one-armed members. Happily, we have had many dumb ones—by choice, however, rather than necessity—but, till now, we have never had a representative who could not employ the time-honored phrase of "catching the Speaker's eye." Mr. Trevelyan, the nephew of Lord Macaulay, and the author of some smartish Indian sketches in "Macmillan's Magazine," has been elected at Tynemouth, and Sir Wentworth Dyke, proprietor of the Athenæum newspaper, is now a member for Wallingford.

Other than election news we have none this week whatever. The harvest is getting on rapidly, and will be gathered in the moment that the county elections are over.

MEMS FROM WESTMINSTER HALL.

THE legal world of London is undergoing its annual process of disintegration. The circuits have commenced, and the Guildhall sittings end to-day. The general elections, combined with these disturbing causes, have placed everything legal in the condition known familiarly as "sixes and sevens." The new Parliament is to be very strong in the forensic element. Nearly all the most distinguished Queen's counsel have seats, but as the numbers elected bear but a small proportion to the competitors, silk and stuff within and without the bar, who have been disappointed, the excitement among the denizens of Westminster Hall, till results were known, and during the early part of the week, was enormous. Every second man we met was a candidate, or the proposer or seconder of a candidate, for a provincial borough. Stuff was backing silk, and silk was seeking preferment, in anything but Hamlet's vein, by that near cut to the bench which lies across the hustings. Monday and Tuesday were the nomination and polling days in the city, and your correspondent, who was unlucky enough to be engaged at the Guildhall, wandered up and down like a lamb in search of its dam, or, to be more classical, like Æneas in Hades seeking his leaders, but never finding them. One had gone to Canterbury, a second to Exeter, a third to Manchester. Nervous attorneys ran hither and thither, jostled by poll-clerks, freemen-voters, spectacle-makers, breeches-makers, and merchant tailors, in hope that the errant Q.C. or his clerk might be discovered, even in wreck, amid the turbulent and noisy crowd. At last, after long delay, the great man's clerk appears, breathless and hot. He has just arrived by train, and Mr. Silk is at Stoke Pogis addressing the electors; so there is no hope. Among the leaders best known to fame thus absent were Mr. J. Coleridge, the son of the ex-judge, who has been returned for Exeter; Mr. Edward James, the leader of the Northern circuit, who is now member for Manchester; Mr. Digby Seymour, who has failed at Southampton; Mr. Bovill, Q.C., returned for Guilford; Mr. Roebuck for Sheffield; Mr. Huddleston for Canterbury; Mr. Thomas Chambers, the Common Sergeant, for Marylebone; Mr. Hawkins, and many others.

But in spite of general elections the law business of the realm must go on, and the sittings of the Central Criminal Court at the Old Bailey and the assizes have already commenced, and I proceed to record some few of the more notable decisions which have marked the close of the sittings after term at Westminster.

One of these is reported for the first time during the current week, although decided nearly a month since, and determines for the first time the long and much vexed question, whether a master can maintain an action for such an injury to his servant as prejudices or hinders the affairs of the employer. The action was brought against a railway company by a firm of brewers. Their traveller, while journeying on their business, was injured by a collision, or in some manner through the negligence of the company. The proceedings were to recover damages by the masters for the alleged injury which they had sustained, the servant being unable to perform his duties. The decision was in effect that the service performed by the railway company was a duty based on contract, and that by a well-known rule of law the only persons who can sue on a contract are the parties to it. The judgments of Erle C. J. Willes, Byles, and Montague

Smith, J. J., were given at great length, and are full of legal erudition, the Common Pleas being at present one of the strongest of the superior courts.

Of less legal importance, but involving a question of some legal difficulty, was another railway case, Stewart v. the South-Western Railway Company and Sanders, decided in Chancery on the 1st of July. The facts were simple. A man and his wife travelling by the company mentioned were injured by a collision. The surgeon of the company "fraudulently" and by misrepresentation induced them to take fifteen pounds in compensation for the injuries inflicted, and to give a receipt in full for all claims. The injured man, after signing the receipt, became worse, had a long illness, and found the money paid altogether inadequate. He commenced an action at law, and the company pleaded the receipt in full as bar to the action. The plaintiffs now applied to Chancery for an injunction to restrain the defendants, the railway company, from putting in such receipt, as it had been obtained by fraud. The Lord Chancellor Westbury granted the injunction. He said: "He considered the bill asking the injunction sought relief upon an old and well established ground of equitable jurisdiction. The court was asked to stay its hand, because the bill was for an injunction merely, when it should have asked also for relief by compensation. It was not necessary that the plaintiffs should extend their claim. It would have been an inconvenient course. The prayer was properly limited to such relief as the court could not refuse without repudiating its own jurisdiction, and the bill would have been wrong, if extended, it had asked relief, which probably the court would have refused to grant."

The past week has seen the first trial at the Central Criminal Court of the Old Bailey of the working of the Hon. J. Denman's act of Parliament, which gives to criminal advocates a right to sum up the evidence before the reply of the prosecution. In other words, the act, which came into operation on the 1st of July, assimilates the procedure in criminal to that in civil cases, and allows a prisoner or his defender to make two speeches. The rights of prisoners on trial have been, in spite of the boasted justice and liberality of antique law, a matter of gradual concession and enlargement, extending over the entire annals of criminal jurisprudence. Till very recently, the prisoner or his defender was not permitted to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution; and it was not till the year 1836 that the persons on trial for felonies were allowed personally or by counsel to address juries in defence. The state trials of Throgmorton, Udale, Parsons, Raleigh, and of the Stuart reigns generally, were full of acts of injustice and hardship. The present act is a further concession to justice and humanity. For if it is found an advantage in the elimination of truth, when the question to be adjudicated on is a piece of goods, that counsel should sum up, it can hardly be denied to be a gain when life and liberty are at stake.

A peer, Lord Winchilsea and Nottingham, a man some fifty years of age, and in that sense old enough to be wiser, refused to appear before a magistrate the other day, on the ground that he possessed or believed he possessed as a peer some fancied privilege of Parliament. He wrote a note to this effect in answer to the magistrate's summons, but on advice appeared in answer to a second and peremptory summons, and then alleged another excuse. The charge was for smoking in a railway station, and the noble peer was fined. Peers, like barristers, pilots, and other specified classes, are exempt from serving on juries, but their privileges are limited, and, save as to legislation, do not go greatly beyond this. They are not liable to arrest for debt; but their legislative powers are their chief possession, and the only one which may be considered dangerous or inimical to the interests of the community. They of course enjoy privileges of an indirect and even of an illegal kind, but these have no constitutional importance, and are due rather to the frivolity of citizens than the frailty of legislation.

The new act conferring on county courts a limited equity jurisdiction, one of the chief of the late Lord Chancellor's reforms, has just been printed. It comes into operation on the 1st of October, but it has immediate effect as to the rules and costs to be reframed. It bestows on county courts power and authority to administer equity, as they have hitherto administered common law, in all suits in which the real or personal estate does not exceed £500, and generally in all suits over which equity alone has jurisdiction to the same amount. The act contains twenty-three sections, and these generally enforce the relationship of county courts to the existing courts of Chancery that has heretofore subsisted between the county courts and the superior common law courts. The Lord Chancellor Westbury, in his scheme of legal education, insisted on a general acquisition of equity by students for legal honors, and the new jurisdiction will turn this branch of education to account. Trust accounts, suits for foreclosure and redemption, for specific performance, proceedings relative to wards and infants, to the trustee relief acts and bankruptcy, can all in future be administered in the county courts, where the sums in issue do not exceed five hundred pounds. The act was printed, and bears date the 5th of July, and may be quoted as the 28 and 29 Vict., c. 99. On the same day the new act to amend the law of partnership was also issued. At one stroke this act is to remodel the law of partnership, as it has existed since the end of the last century, when settled by Lord Chief-Justice Eyre, 34 G. III., and Gould and Heath in the Common Pleas, in the case of Waugh and Carver. It was then decided that a share of profits made a share of losses, and that that in point of fact created a partnership—or, in the words of Tindal, J., that a "partnership is a mutual participation in profit and loss." The present act revokes that decision. The advance of money on contract to receive a share of profits does not now necessarily constitute the lender a partner. The mere fact of such a loan shall not of itself constitute such a partner—that is the purport of the first section. The second determines that if a servant or agent is paid by share of profits, he will not be necessarily a partner. The third, that an annuity out of profits, by the widow or child of a deceased partner, will not constitute the annuitant a partner. The act contains two other clauses, excepting a receipt of profits in consideration of a sale of good will, or any such lender of money as has been referred to, in the event of bankruptcy, from the incidents of partnership. This act, it cannot be doubted, will still further revolutionize the commercial resources of the country, and enlarge the operations of the trading community much beyond the limits reached even by the operations of the joint stock companies.

By Lord Westbury's retirement the digest of the statute law will doubtless be retarded. The pious hopes of Edward the Sixth, "when time shall serve, that the tedious and superfluous statutes were brought into one form together and made more plain and short, to the intent that men might better understand them," are not yet to be fulfilled. Reforms grow slowly in England. James the First cavilled at "the cross and cuffing statutes." Sir Nicholas Bacon mapped out a digest, and his son, the great chancellor, Sir Francis, put that digest into shape. There was a committee of law reform sitting during the great fire of 1666, another in 1816, then in 1826, '33, and '55, but still there is no digest, and the retirement of the chancellor virtually postpones it sine die. The resignation of Lord Westbury under conservative pressure and the animosity of his personal enemies is felt to be legally a great loss. He was active and unremitting in the pursuit of his professional duties. The business of Chancery was wholly cleared up. His decisions were esteemed sound and unimpeachable, and his reforms have been, if not always successful, well conceived, and of a high class. The testimony of the supporters of the Government is uniform to his innocence of the charges laid against him and to his freedom from reproach, but it was felt by the country that patronage had been unwisely bestowed, if not corruptly, and that it was desirable to vindicate the honor of the public service even by the sacrifice of so illustrious and dignified a victim.

The trial of the Mercantile Bank of New York v. Windsor took place on Thursday in the Queen's Bench, to recover the sum of £36,000 from the man Windsor, the amount of his alleged deficiencies or defalcations. It resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs, a conclusion which had been foreseen by the counsel on both sides, as a more hopeless case could not have been submitted to the jury than that for the defence. The two leaders were away on election business, and the defence rested on Mr. Edward Clarke, a young man of two or three and twenty, recently called to the bar, who displayed considerable acumen and energy in his address to the jury on behalf of his client. His argument was, in effect, that some one else other than Windsor had been the real culprit, that great irregularity had existed in the manner in which affairs were conducted, "the cash of the bank had not been counted for two years," that the vault-banks were unsafe, and that it was impossible with any degree of certainty to fix the alleged losses on the defendant. This was undoubtedly a judicious line of defence, and the jury for some time refused to find a verdict for the plaintiff, on the ground that the case had not been made out, but ultimately, when sent back by the Chief-Justice, gave a verdict as described. The case was in no wise remarkable, other than that Windsor had been applied for under the Extradition Treaty, and that the application had been found untenable. TEMPLAR.

LONDON, July 18, 1865.

THE HUMORS OF THE ANTHROPOLOGISTS.

BEFORE the rebellion there were few European writers on ethnology or anthropology who did not assert that the white race in America had already begun to decay, and that but for the new blood continually infused into it by the hordes of emigrants who flocked to our shores in the hope of bettering their condition, it would very soon become extinct. As it was, even with all the advantages of a constant regeneration, its identity could not possibly be maintained for more than a few centuries, and then the people who had civilized a continent, enriched the world with their contributions to science, literature, and art, and founded an empire based upon the principles of human liberty, would take their place in history by the side of the Egyptians, the Aztecs, and the other nations which have either disappeared or else live only in a few scattered fragments sunk in the lowest depths of effeteness and barbarism. Before proceeding to adduce the evidence which effectually dissipates all these apprehensions, we propose to cite a few extracts from late authorities, which will show how superficially we have been studied by the scientific men of Europe, and which, if they do not instruct, will certainly amuse, our readers.

Some ten years ago, M. Desor, a German anthropologist, visited this country, and soon afterwards published the results of his observations in a journal devoted to the science he represented. There are few persons pretending to a scientific status who would in so short an article make so many erroneous assertions and deductions. For instance, he says:

"A chief characteristic of the American is the length of the neck, not that it is absolutely longer than amongst us, but appears longer on account of leanness. The Americans again soon recognize the European by the opposite characters. 'He is a stranger,' they will say, 'look at his neck; an American has no such neck.'"

Certainly, the longest necked persons we ever saw were in Germany and Switzerland. We are, undoubtedly, a sharp and discriminating people, but we question if there are many amongst us who are able to tell a foreigner by the length of his neck. It is only necessary for a person to open his eyes and walk down Broadway to lead him to doubt M. Desor's authority on the neck question. Again, he says;

"The most intelligent Americans clearly perceive that the increasing delicacy of form (especially in the women) ought, if possible, to be arrested. Despite of their instinctive aversion to the Irish (forming the largest contingent of immigrants), they are aware that the development of the glandual system of that race is well calculated to neutralize the influences of the climate for a considerable time. It has been observed that the finest women are descended from European parents."

Hence, to save ourselves from destruction, our women are on the lookout for Irish husbands, and our men seek their wives in preference from the daughters of Erin! That "the finest women are descended from European parents," admits of no doubt in our opinion. We have met persons, however, who give the palm to those of Asiatic, African, or aboriginal origin. But to continue:

"The influence of the climate is not merely shown in the descendants, but in the parents. There are few Europeans who get fat in the United States; the Americans, on the contrary, who reside a considerable time in Europe, become more healthy and portly. What still more characterizes the North American is his stiff lank hair. There is a striking contrast in this respect between the Englishman and the American. We look in vain among American children, despite of all the care taken by their mothers, for curly-headed children, so frequently seen in England.

"This influence on the hair is probably owing to the dryness of the climate. Hair, as is well known, curls when moist; we are, therefore, not surprised that in England the hair is inclined to curl, whilst it remains lank in America. The hair of the European becomes in America drier, and requires pomatum, etc., to keep it glossy and soft; hence also there is a very large number of hair-dressers in America.

"Every European who arrives in New York, Boston, or Baltimore, will also be struck with that feverish activity the American displays. Every one is in a hurry; the people don't walk, they run. Something like it is no doubt seen in the larger commercial towns of England, but the activity of the Englishman seems more under the control of reason; that of the Yankee is instinctive—at any rate, the result of habit or of an innate restlessness. They even exhibit this accelerated activity during their meals, which, even if they have nothing important to do, are despatched in less than no time.

"One of the first physiological characteristics of the American type is an absence of corpulence. On travelling the streets of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, etc., you will among one hundred persons scarcely see a portly one, who, moreover, will frequently be found to be a foreigner."

There are only two or three of these absurdities which require notice. In the first place, if M. Desor speaks the truth, the United States would be the sanatorium for all those unhappy persons who, like Mr. Banting, have more adipose tissue than they can conveniently carry. Instead of undergoing torture as did this poor gentleman, by restricting themselves for many months to a non-saccharine and non-amylaceous diet, they would only have to pass a short time in this country, stuff themselves to their hearts' content on sugar and starch, and then return to their own land reduced to the coveted dimensions. The circumstance, however, that more copies of Mr. Banting's little book were sold in this country than in England is perhaps an indication that there are still some fat persons left among us, and if any one desires further evidence of the fact, we would suggest that he make a tour of the banks, insurance and railway companies' offices, and examine into the physical condition of the presidents and directors of these institutions. Then let him go to the mercantile and manufacturing establishments, and inquire for the senior partners, and subject these gentlemen to a like inspection. This done, he will probably arrive at the conclusion that nine out of ten of those whom he has looked upon are as portly in appearance as any he has ever seen in any quarter of the globe. There is no doubt, however, that Americans begin to get fat a year or two later than the people of other countries. This is due to the fact that they continue longer in active business habits. After the age of fifty, there are as many stout Americans to be met with as Englishmen, Germans, Frenchmen, or representatives of any other nation.

But is obesity a sign of high physical and mental development? By no means. If it were, we should look for perfection in these respects among the Daniel Lamberts and the fat girls who have at various times astonished the world with their amplitude. The reason why the obese period is a little postponed with us is, as we have said, the fact that we labor longer and more energetically with our bodies and minds than the people of any other nation of the world. We have work to do, and we do it with a will. Under these circumstances we cannot get fat. We have the alternative of torpor and obesity or activity and leanness. In the early part of our lives we take the latter; as we get older we choose repose, and then we grow in width and depth. When we wish to fatten hogs, we subject them to a certain regimen. We restrict their bodily exercise, give them as much as they can eat, and keep their minds in as tranquil a state as possible. The same process carried out on the human subject would be just as effectual. Whether it is worth while for one to try it who has other objects in life than obtaining a protuberant abdomen, is a question which we in this country have long ago decided for ourselves.

In regard to the hair, M. Desor is even more absurdly wrong. In the first place, every young woman who has ever curled her hair knows that the effect of the weather is just the opposite of that he asserts it to be. In dry seasons the curl is tight; in wet ones it is almost impossible to retain the semblance of a twist. The curliness or straightness of the hair is not a matter of climate at all, but one of race or of individual peculiarity. In the Caucasian or white race, it is generally slightly inclined to wave, but may be either very straight or very curly; in the Mongolian, or red and yellow race, it is always straight; and in the negro, or black race, it is always crisp and tightly curled. We have only to consider the facts connected with the climates of the regions inhabited by these races to see that the amount of moisture in the atmosphere has nothing to do with the character of the hair as to curliness or straightness.

In regard to the rarity of curly hair among Americans, M. Desor's assertions are altogether erroneous. As many curly-haired boys and girls and men and women are to be met with here as in any European country, and a great many more than in several we have visited. The Irish, the Hollanders, the Spaniards, the Italians, the Hungarians, and the Scandinavian nations, generally have straight hair. In the Germans, the French, the English, and the Scotch, there is no marked predominance of either curly or straight haired people. In the United States, the two classes appear to be about equally numerous.

There are other points of M. Desor's remarks which we might touch upon but for the fact that there are more important personages awaiting our notice, whose eccentricities in anthropological science bear about the same relationship to his that a Fresnel light does to a tallow candle. To these gentlemen we therefore ask the reader's attention.

Within the last two or three years a number of British gentlemen, actuated doubtless by the most praiseworthy and disinterested motives, met together and organized the "Anthropological Society" of London.

As the name of the association indicates, the object of its founders was the cultivation of all knowledge bearing, however remotely, upon the natural history of mankind. They and their associates were to institute enquiries relative to the anatomical structure, the origin, the habits, the customs, the ceremonies, the modes of life, etc., of man in all parts of the globe. They were to search out the causes which had led or were supposed to have led to the extinction of races, and to suggest means for obviating their effects in future. The laws which govern man's development, which relate to his fitness or unfitness for particular avocations, which bear upon his food, his clothing, his habitations, or the thousand other circumstances which affect his well-being, were all to be considered, and his relations to the inferior animals were indicated as a special subject deserving of the most thorough and persistent thought and research.

Among the members were several gentlemen who had already achieved deservedly high reputations in science, but, as is always the case with young societies, the great majority were either altogether ignorant of anthropology, or else just possessed of that modicum of learning which, when acquired by a weak or shallow mind, leads its possessor to think himself almost omniscient.

At the second meeting of the society of which any record was published, a paper was read by a Mr. Bollaert, on the past and present populations of the New World. In this production it is said that true liberty belongs to the white races of Europe, that the whites in the United States are becoming extinct, that they are lawless and ungovernable, and that the people of that "late lamented institution, the United States of America," might do something better than slaughter each other in a sanguinary civil war. This paper was the text for the following most extraordinary debate. If there is anything like it in the annals of any other learned society, we should like to see it.

"Dr. Berthold Seemann said that he could, from his own experience, confirm Mr. Bollaert's observations respecting the comparative infertility both of the descendants of Europeans living in America, and of the offspring of mixed marriages. He had generally found that Americans have only two or three children. In Panama the mulattoes often have many children, but they die early. Dr. Seemann stated that he fully believed that the present population of the United States would die out if it were not constantly recruited from Europe. The Americans seem, too, to be assuming the characteristics, both mental and physical, of the aboriginal Indians. They are moody, often sitting for long together without saying a word, but when excited talking with extraordinary vehemence; they are very lean, have no calves, and their hair is long and straight, very seldom curly. In some parts of the United States, however, very fine men are found, especially in Kentucky. Dr. Seemann thought they were of German origin—he had himself conversed with a Kentuckian seven feet nine inches high who spoke German.

"Mr. Bendyshe enquired whether there is anything on record about the prolificness of the Indian women before the conquest. As an instance of the deleterious effect of the climate of North America, he mentioned the case of a gentleman who after ten years of married life in Canada was childless and almost imbecile, but who on returning to Europe was restored to health and had a child. Mr. Bendyshe also ventured to express an opinion that the gigantic Kentuckyman had come from Yorkshire."

There was some other conversation to the same effect, in which the present degradation and ultimate extinction of the whites of America were asserted to be beyond the possibility of a doubt, and then Prof. Marshall exhibited the brain of an idiot boy, which was remarkable for its smallness. Perhaps he might have found better examples of microcephaly among the learned fellows who surrounded him.

Who Dr. Seemann and Mr. Bendyshe are we have not the slightest idea. The former appears to have travelled, and, like other voyagers of more renowned character, he delights in "long yarns." He does not limit the injurious effects of the American climate to the human family, however, for, at a subsequent meeting of the society, he says:

"The influence of climate on race appears to be considerable. Cattle taken to America become so stupid that they lose the instinct of self-preservation, and the trains on the American railways are obliged to be provided with cattle-catchers, as the animals will not get out of the way."

The worst of it all is, that this twaddle went on without a word of dissent. There there should be asses in the Anthropological Society of London is not very wonderful, but that scientific men like Professors Owen, Busk, and Marshall, and men of the world like Captain Burton, could listen to such stuff, and consider it "science," is something strange. In reading the remarks made at various times, and the papers contributed to the "Anthropological Review," the organ of the Society, it is very evident that a spirit of intense hostility exists on the part of many of the members towards America and everything appertaining to the country. In fact, it will be very evident to any one who takes the trouble to look through the Transactions of the British Association, that the Anthropological Society is mainly made up of a pestilent set of men, who are seeking their own notoriety rather than the furtherance of science, and at the last meeting of the Association, at Newcastle, they received several rebukes, which it would be well for them to remember. We can therefore afford to pass over such false science as is contained in the passages we have quoted; but as the opinion that the white race in America has degenerated is held by some European savans of eminence, and is even entertained with a lingering dread by some of our own people, who base their views upon foreign ideas, instead of looking around them, we propose to adduce a few facts to show that the Caucasian race in the United States is as high in the scale of human development as it is in any other part of the world to which its enterprise has taken it.

The report of the Provost-Marshal General is before us, and supplies ample evidence to sustain this position. In the military services of most civilized nations a strict examination is made of recruits, and if there are reasonable grounds for apprehending a deficiency of stamina or the existence of any disqualifying physical or mental infirmity, they are not allowed to enter the army. The results of these examinations, based upon the inspection of many thousand men, afford very trustworthy data in regard to the strength and vigor of nations, because the life of a soldier is such that the highest degree of physical development is necessary, in order that its hardships and privations may be endured. In our service, it appears that the ratio of men rejected for disability of all kinds was 285.52 per thousand, whilst in the French service it was, in the years from 1831 to 1843, 324.4, and in 1859 317. In the British army it was, in the years from 1832 to 1862, 317.3, and in the Belgian army, from 1851 to 1855, 320.6 per thousand. The advantage is thus shown to be very greatly in favor of the United States.

If it be said that the requirements were less rigid in our service than in that of either of the nations mentioned, it can be answered with perfect truth that the reverse was the case; for whilst we had thirty-six disabling causes the British had but twenty-three and the French but twenty. When we examine the tables giving the results for individual diseases, we see that, in regard to many of the most important, the superiority is with our people.

It is considered by military authorities advisable that the circumference of the chest of a recruit should be equal to half his height. If it is less than this, the individual will probably prove deficient in stamina. From a table in the report cited, we find that the average height of Americans is 66.44 inches, the circumference of the chest at full inspiration 35.16 inches, and at full expiration 32.75 inches. When moderately expanded, therefore, the average American chest is fully up to the severe requirements of a military life.

It is to be recollected that the data contained in the Provost-Marshal General's report relate to American males of all ages between fourteen and sixty-five, the average being 30.59, at which age every anatomist and physiologist knows the full development of the thorax has not been reached. There is, therefore, no room to doubt that in strength, in freedom from disease, in physical development, and in all the elements which tend to show tenacity of life, the American white is not surpassed by the people of any other country in the world.

But are statistics really necessary to prove these points? Are they not abundantly shown in the powers of endurance, in the energy, the unfaltering spirit, the calm, quiet, resolute will which our whole people, and especially our soldiers, have shown throughout the sanguinary war which has so happily been brought to a close? If there ever was a nation which has proved its manhood and its vitality in the face of almost insurmountable obstacles—obstacles before which other people admit they would have succumbed—that nation lives in the United States of America; and, our word for it, now that success has attended their efforts, there will be no lack of arguments to prove their vital tenacity, even from those who have hitherto disputed it most, and we should not be surprised to learn that even Dr. Seemann and his confrères had begun extolling not only the human family as found in America, but the whole animal kingdom.

OCEANIC TELEGRAPHY.

THE memory of New York is none of the best, but she cannot have forgotten the celebration of the laying of the submarine telegraph in 1858, and the festivities and glorifications thereupon attendant. We know how we all counted our chickens before they had chipped the shell. The city feast was a meat-offering thrown away. The illuminations illustrated nothing more than the streets. The poets who fathomed the depths of the bathos with their lines, as that of the telegraph did those of the sea, strung their lyres in vain. If their odes had no other elements of poesy, they were, at least, pure works of the imagination. The glory of the Grand Cyrus was but for a day. The philosophers who had averred that the thing could not be, and who had been put to shame for a little season, exalted their heads again among the stars. The telegraph, after a few stammering utterances, held its peace. De Sauty disappeared into the mysterious darkness whence he issued, and became, indeed, what he had always been suspected of being, a myth. In short, the cable refused to talk, and the telegraph was a failure.

And yet not altogether so. The possibility of conversing three thousand miles off was demonstrated. A single word was enough to prove that, and there were a good many more than one, first and last. Still, it was not a success, excepting so far as its mistakes furnished the elements of knowing how they might be avoided, and we were a little ashamed of our precocious rejoicings, and did not delight in hearing the matter talked about. But Mr. Field, with an honorable perseverance and a living faith in his idea, which is the badge of all the tribe of benefactors of mankind, did not despair of success, and succeeded in inspiring his confidence into the sluggish soul of capital. It took time to recover from the depression of the first mishap; but the good time came, a new cable was woven, and the Great Eastern is even now depositing its strands along the bed of the ocean stream. There is good reason to believe that the marvel is on the eve of accomplishment, and that the Old World and the New are about to talk together, as friend with friend, with most miraculous organ. Not only will deep cry unto deep, but continent unto continent. The children of men will be brought nearer to one another, and will know each other more, and, it is to be hoped, like each other better. The cable may be the cord that is to bind nations together in a closer friendship than they have ever yet known, and be, indeed, a link in the chain of events that is to secure peace on earth and good-will to men.

Should it be successful, as it will be, this time or the next, what a revolution it will work in many of the doings of men! In fact, Field will do for the continents, which the ocean has hitherto held apart, what Morse has already done for the continents separately. It has already, in connection with steam, revolutionized diplomacy, and it will work mighty changes in the way of doing business. The foreign affairs of nations are transacted on a totally different footing and in an entirely different way from what they were fifty years since, and so must be the foreign affairs of individuals. And the change will be, on the whole, in favor of honest dealings in matters public and private. The time is gone, never to return, when the delay of a courier by a flood can unseat a favorite or upset a prime minister, as happened in the case of the Princess des Ursins and Cardinal Alberoni. Steam and lightning have simplified the science of diplomacy by making many of its old arts and artifices impossible. All the aid it drew from mystery and darkness is gone, inasmuch as facts are known in London as soon as they happen in Madrid or Vienna. Even Talleyrand would be forced to make his exception the rule of his conduct, and tell the truth when he wished particularly to deceive, when all crooks and crannies are brought to light by the magic flash of telegraphic lightning.

And so it will be with private mercantile affairs. When all men are put on an equal footing of intelligence as to prices and markets, the advantages that used to come from private advices, or even from sagacious guesses, will disappear, and all fair traders have equal chances. Good judgment and practical experience will not be as liable as now to be outstripped by cunning and chicanery. Some kinds of enterprise, indeed, will suffer a sea-change from this submarine whispering-gallery. Adventurous spirits who love to deal with the property of other men as if it were their own, will find their wings singed and their flights checked. Enterprising men of business who have possessed themselves of the funds of other people; cashiers and bank clerks who have subjected the plethoric institutions to which they belonged to a little wholesome phlebotomy; ready writers who have had the ungenerous modesty to prefer writing somebody else's name at the foot of a bit of paper—these, and such as these, will be apt to find their deeds blazed abroad by the intrusive telegraph, and their shrinking natures subjected to the parade of a public reception on their arrival, and of a complimentary escort on their return to their native shores.

The newspapers will have their share in these telegraphic overturnings, and whether it will be for their advantage or not remains to be seen. All history will be contemporary, and foreign nations will no longer stand to each other in the relation of posterity. Much fine writing and profound wisdom will be rendered useless or have to seek new occasions for its display. With what heart, for instance, could the London Times or Standard have indited those miracles of political skill in which was demonstrated the certain success of Jeff. Davis and the inevitable victories of Lee, when the next morning the sea might have given up the fact of the surrender of the one and the flight of the other! But there is one particular in which the telegraph may read an excellent lesson to editors as well as to public men of all sorts. And that is as to the value of brevity. Brevity, that soul of wit, will be enforced under fearful penalties. Speech is golden indeed at a guinea a word, address and signature included. Suppose a similar tax could be laid by Congress on public speeches and newspaper articles, what a promoter of conciseness it would be, and what a retrenchment in the weapons of our logomachy! To be sure, Congress could not be expected to tax its own manufacture of speeches, any more than to rectify its own mileage. But public documents, Fourth of July orations, caucus speeches, might be assessed at so much a word, to the great advantage of the revenue and the greater relief of the lieges. However, we only throw out the suggestion, and will afford an example of the conciseness we desiderate by stopping at once without following out any of the many leadings branching out from our topic.

ARMY CORRESPONDENCE.

III.

TRIALS AND FEATS OF CORRESPONDENTS.

Unsatisfactory as the average merit of army correspondence has been, it is nevertheless true, as already admitted, that the productions of certain correspondents, on special occasions, deserved no mean measure of praise. Moreover, besides these few, there was quite a number of others, who, although lacking what was most indispensable for a successful pursuit of their calling, viz., natural and acquired intelligence, comprehensiveness and accuracy of observation, fluency and polish of style, yet proved themselves possessed of certain subordinate qualities, such as power and patience of physical endurance, disregard of personal discomfort and danger, ingenuity and amplitude of resources, persistency of purpose, and indefatigable energy. For the display of the latter they deserve as much credit as they invite unfavorable criticism for the lack of the former, and this credit shall be as freely awarded them as their shortcomings have been unreservedly exposed. Probably no less than one hundred and fifty persons assumed the part of army reporters in the course of the war. The experience of most of them was varied enough to enable each to fill a voluminous record. Hence to recount individual adventures will be impracticable, and only a general reference to them can be made.

The locomotion of many of the army reporters was wonderful. The great distances marched and vast regions traversed during the successive invasions of rebel territory by the loyal armies have been favorite subjects of national pride and praise. But the moving about from North to South and East to West of correspondents exceeds by far even the travelling in search of employment done by the most useless of our generals, whose fate it was to be ordered from one army to another, only to be returned with protest to the War Department by the several commanding generals. Many of the managing editors made it a rule to keep their most efficient correspondents continually in motion, by sending them from one part of the theatre of war to another, as the public interest shifted from point to point according to the time and character of the operations of the various armies. A battle being over and "done up" by a correspondent in Virginia, he had hardly time enough to rest from this culminating labor of a campaign, before an order reached him from his chief to start without delay and repair as hurriedly as possible to Tennessee, or Georgia, or Louisiana, or North or South Carolina, as the anticipation of events in another quarter might compel. From the banks of the Mississippi or Red River, the mountains of Georgia, or the Atlantic or Gulf coast, he would be again ordered to Virginia or another centre of interest in a few weeks or months. And thus it fared with them from campaign to campaign, from season to season. Their yearly reckonings of travel would foot up thousands and tens of thousands of miles. That this chronic migration from time to time was attended with no little personal discomfort and injurious effects upon health will not appear strange.

However, this professional vagrancy was by no means the worst trial correspondents had to undergo. The hardships and perils incurred while in the field with active armies taxed them far more severely. It is strictly true, that if not at all, at least at certain, times they endured as much as the soldiers in the ranks, or even more. Ordinarily they messed with officers—if practicable, at some headquarters. But it happened not unfrequently that their duties and the movements of the army compelled them to forego the comforts of fixed quarters, and for weeks, during offensive operations, take their chances of finding shelter at night and in inclement weather, and of satisfying the cravings of hunger. What this means, those only who have marched with armies limited to a certain amount of rations for a certain number of days, can fully understand. Hospitality is one of the characteristics of the soldier, but it becomes as difficult to extend as to receive it when, as frequently occurred, the supplies were reduced to a few days' rations, and these of bacon and crackers only, with no definite prospect of replenishment before them. Then it became literally true that neither love nor money could be relied on to secure food. The poorest beggars in the Atlantic cities then fared no worse than the correspondents. Whole days without a morsel of nourishment, and weeks upon the scantiest fare, was to them no unusual occurrence. The necessity of providing food not only for themselves, but also for their horses, added much to the misery of their existence.

To this periodical starving were added other hardly less trying bodily vexations. Upon the march their baggage, like that of officers and men, was of the most limited extent, and even what little they could find transportation for was often lost or stolen, so that for weeks they had to get along as best they could without a change of upper or nether garments. Of course, they suffered as much from exposure and the variations of weather during the different seasons as any one in the army. To sleep on the ground in the open air, in rain, cold, or snow, was no uncommon necessity with them. To dry their clothes on their backs in the summer sun, or to find them ablaze upon awaking from hugging the camp-fire too closely while seeking sleep in the winter nights, was also frequently their lot. Perhaps their worst vexation was to find, on rising from weary slumbers, their steeds gone—wandered off during the night in search of food, or led off by remorseless blue coats, who would rather endure the pangs of conscience than the pains of sore feet. To be obliged then for many livelong days to struggle afoot, rain or shine, in the mud and mire or sea of dust alternately produced by the march of armies, was the very climax of tribulation.

With these sore personal experiences were joined the risks of war, to which they were continually exposed. To venture within the range of rifled or round shot or shell, or minié or ordinary musket balls, was not required of them by their employers. Nor can it be safely asserted that very many of them improved the opportunity to test the effect of these various "messengers of death" upon their nerves by coming voluntarily within sight and hearing of their parabolic flight. It is a fact, nevertheless, that not a few of their number never showed this natural and excusable shyness, but finding that, without going under fire, the possibility of observation while an action progressed was very limited, they took, in order to be able to discharge their duties more faithfully, the chances of battle as much as any general or staff officer did, by riding along the lines, following columns of attack, and posting themselves at prominent and exposed points for a better view of the field. Some, carried away with the wild enthusiasm which the noise and fury of battle are apt to kindle in a manly breast, went even further at times, and kept up with the charging columns until they closed with the lines of the enemy; or volunteered their services as temporary aides-de-camp to general officers, and served as such as gallantly and diligently as any regularly commissioned officer. Two or three of these paid with their lives for their zeal; others bear lasting remembrances of the war in the form of scars from wounds of greater or less severity; and again others had horses shot under them. The official reports of several generals bear witness to the personal bravery shown and valuable service rendered by correspondents as volunteer aids in some of the bloodiest battles. Their intrepidity, having been without the line of their proper duty, may have partaken of foolhardiness. They certainly received but a modicum of praise for it. That they were, however, bold and fearless without the selfish motive of prospective reward, is all the more to their credit.

Captivity, no less than balls and bullets and bayonets, made part of the personal hazards incurred by correspondents. About a dozen tasted the bitterness of rebel prisons for more or less protracted periods. The circumstances of the capture of several form some of the most striking and adventurous incidents of the war. To fall into the hands of the enemy involved for them a far greater risk than for the officers and men of the army. The latter were sustained by the hope of exchange while prisoners of war. The captured correspondents had no right to ask, and no reason to expect, anything but imprisonment to the close of the war. The boldness and fortitude exhibited by several in the manner of their escape are well known, and will live among the chief romantic chapters of the conflict.

Not the lightest grief of the correspondents was the persecution they received at the hands of some of the commanding generals. The right of generals in command of independent armies to permit or prohibit the presence and regulate the status within their lines of all that come under the head of "army followers," cannot be disputed. But this right did not privilege them to allow established regulations to remain dead letters as against correspondents generally, and insist upon their enforcement only in case of their violation by certain writers for the press against whom they had personal grudges on account of certain strictures on their official conduct printed in the papers which they represented. Right or wrong, it is a matter of record that they did persecute a number of correspondents by banishment from the lines, imprisonment, trial by court-martial, and even by the most humiliating petty punishments, such as are inflicted upon private soldiers for minor breaches of discipline.

The greatest enterprise was shown by correspondents in the manner of writing out their reports for publication and ensuring their prompt transmission to their destination. When they had no important event to describe, they took their time in the collection and working up of matter, and used the regular army mails, or at best the special messengers with whom the leading Eastern and some of the Western papers had provided their correspondents for the conveyance of despatches, and who acted as a sort of go-betweens from the army to the nearest post or telegraph office from which the means of direct and quick communication with the place of publication could be fully relied on. But when they had great movements and actions to report, they usually strained their own energies, both as to quickness of preparation and the most expeditious transmission, to the utmost. To save time then became their principal object. When darkness had put an end for the day to marching and fighting, and all the army, save those watching for its safety from surprises—men and beasts—were seeking and finding repose and new strength for the coming work, the correspondents could be seen with weary eyes, busy the whole night through, with pen or pencil, at the dim light of camp fires or commissary candles, enlarging their notes into many long columns. And with the break of day they would saddle and mount their horses, speed to the nearest landing or station, and then journey on many hours and often days until they had deposited the fruits of their labors in the hands of their employers. Frequently they started from the battle-fields immediately after actions were over, in order to lose the least possible time in getting their reports through, riding whole nights and days through regions infested with the enemy's marauders, and jumping aboard steamboats or trains, devoting every available moment of the entire journey to the drawing of maps and writing out of notes. Several of the best battle accounts printed were prepared wholly on railroad trains by correspondents, who upon starting had not a line ready for the compositors, and upon arriving at their destination were able to deliver their reports in full to the managing editors. It was an established rule with the latter to instruct their correspondents always to come through with their reports in propriis personis, not only to ensure their safe delivery, but also to superintend their printing and assist in the preparation of editorial comments. Journeys for this purpose were made to New York and other Eastern and Western cities from Fort Donelson, Shiloh, New Orleans, Vicksburg, Memphis, Chattanooga, Charleston, and other distant points. When reporters missed railway connections while en route, or ascertained that rivals were ahead of them, they often used the telegraph to transmit complete reports, filling columns. Cairo, Nashville, Louisville, Cincinnati, Washington, and Baltimore, were the places from which these voluminous despatches were usually started over the wires.

It will be admitted that these efforts required extraordinary energy of body and mind. Nor did those who displayed it go entirely unrewarded. It is true that none even of the most successful correspondents either attained a reputation likely to be lasting, or accumulated anything out of their regular salaries. But the more generous and well to do of their employers sometimes allowed extra compensation for achievements of the kind described. And many of the journals have not been slow, both during and since the close of the war, to make permanent use of the fine journalistic capacities developed by army reporters while in the field, by attaching them to their respective editorial staffs. In most of the leading newspaper offices throughout the country ex-army correspondents are now found holding important editorial positions, and in this wise, if in no other, has army correspondence proved a positive gain to journalism. While war reporting from its very nature could but be an ephemeral vocation, an abnormal, short-lived journalistic outgrowth of the times, and war reporters as a class have passed out of existence, individuals belonging to it continue identified with the profession and infuse new vigor and enterprise into it.

It may not be out of place to conclude this review with some statements relative to the amounts of money expended by the several journals for army correspondence, for which, upon the whole, they received such inadequate returns. The salaries of the correspondents formed the least item of expense. They ranged from $1,000 to $3,000 a year, reaching the latter figure only in a few instances. Their current expenses, which they were allowed in addition to their salaries, often amounted to as much as these figures and more. Each correspondent may be said to have represented an average yearly investment of from $1,000 to $5,000. Special messengers were paid lower wages, but also allowed their expenses, which were frequently larger than those of the correspondents, owing to the heavy expenditure continually incurred in passing to and from the armies. Then came the cost of horses and equipments and general campaigning outfit of the correspondents. Of horse-flesh a great deal was used up by them owing to the irregular feeding and grooming their animals received, and the constant exhausting use they were put to while active campaigning was going on. Some of the correspondents were mounted half-a-dozen times in a single year. The transfer of correspondents from one army to another far distant, often from want of means and time for transportation, compelled the abandonment of their entire outfit and a replenishment in their new sphere of duty. Property thus left behind was hardly ever recovered. Last, not least, was the expense of telegraphing reports. The expense either of journeys of correspondents with their reports from the field to the place of publication, or of sending their reports over the wires, made the cost of single battle accounts at times many hundreds of dollars.

In the first two years of the war, all papers, East and West, employing correspondents spent money most lavishly. The expenses of the New York journals each were not less than from $60,000 to $100,000 a year. The Boston, Philadelphia, and Western papers invested from $10,000 to $30,000 each in the same way. Later, the diminished incomes of newspapers compelled retrenchment. Only one New York paper continued its expenditures on the same scale to the end of the war. All others reduced them more or less. The greatest expenditure, however, by no means always ensured the greatest success.

LITERARY NOTES.

MESSRS. D. APPLETON & Co. have now just ready for publication Sir Charles Lyell's "Elements of Geology, or the Ancient Changes of the Earth and its Inhabitants, as illustrated by Geological Monuments." This is reprinted from the new sixth edition lately issued by Mr. Murray. Ten years having passed since the fifth edition was brought out, it is necessarily very much enlarged and improved, with the view of reflecting exactly the present state of the science that it teaches. The actual additions form about 150 pages, and the original name "Elements" is restored, as the volume has outgrown the dimensions of a "Manual," under which title the fifth edition appeared. It now makes a bulky volume of 800 pages, with 770 wood-cuts —Bourne's "Hand-book of the Steam Engine," a key to the author's well known "Catechism" of the same subject, containing all the rules required for the construction and management of engines, etc., with wood-cuts, tables, and examples—and the much talked of "History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe," by W. E. H. Lecky, M.A. This work has just reached a second edition in England, and, as the first work of a young author, is considered to exhibit greater promise than any first literary appearance since the days of Ruskin and Buckle. Messrs. Appleton & Co. will also bring out during the fall Murray's elegant "Illustrated New Testament." Having purchased an edition for the American market, they will be able to offer it below the usual cost of importation. The embellishments (with the exception of a few historical subjects) are true and accurate views of the places they represent as they exist at the present day, not "made up" or artistically beautified, and are mostly derived from photographs or original sketches. The notes are intended to supply a plain explanatory comment for private or family reading. In typographical and pictorial execution the work may be regarded as the "high-water mark" of excellence reached in those departments.

—There is always much curiosity among the intelligent classes to know the solid rewards of literary toil, the substantial returns that successful authorship produces. In the case of the Earl of Derby's "Homer's Iliad," the noble lord supplies the public with the data necessary for ascertaining the measure and quantity of his reward. He announces his purpose of founding a scholarship in the newly established Wellington College, and says that the sum already received will enable him to endow it with £54 a year. An easy calculation, based upon the current value of money in England, shows that the amount in question must be about eleven hundred pounds. This, though not equal to the small fortune secured with so much artful management by Pope for the like labor, is considerably more than Cowper ever received for his translation of the Iliad, and it must be remembered it is derived from less than one year's sales only. An association with Homer seems indeed part of the traditional inheritance of English statesmen. Not to mention Mr. Gladstone's Homeric studies in three solid octavos, and the beautiful "Grenville" Homer, edited by the minister of that name, Matthew Arnold, in his recent "Essays on Criticism," quotes a striking instance of familiarity with the poet in the famous Earl Granville (better known as Lord Carteret, and whom Horace Walpole declared to be the most brilliant genius of the age), who applied to himself, with marked emphasis, the famous speech of Sarpedon, while completing on his death-bed the treaty of Paris, which put an end to the Seven Years' War, in 1762.

—Professor Bopp, the founder of comparative philology as a scientific study, is alive and well in his seventy-fifth year, at Berlin. His friends trust that he will continue so until the 16th of next May. This will be the fiftieth anniversary of the day of publication of his work on Sanscrit, from whence is dated a new epoch in the science of language. A movement for a wide and general manifestation in honor of the professor on that day commenced in Berlin and is spreading to England and France. It is proposed to establish a fund for the advancement of the studies which owe so much to Professor Bopp, to maintain and annually revive the memory of their founder, or, at all events, to present to Professor Bopp, on the day mentioned, the sum so raised, leaving to him the decision of its disposal and the drawing up of the necessary regulations.

—Mr. Robert Dale Owen has undertaken to write a life of President Lincoln. It will form two volumes in small octavo of three hundred and fifty pages each, and will be issued with as much speed as the necessary attention to authorship will allow. It will probably be accepted as the standard biography of the late President. Another life by Dr. J. G. Holland is also in preparation. The latter is, however, intended for sale by canvassing agents exclusively, and will be of a more popular character. A "History of President Lincoln's Administration" is preparing by Hon. Isaac N. Arnold, of Illinois. In France at least three biographies have appeared or are in progress; the most elaborate one, by Achille Arnaud, is entitled "Abraham Lincoln, his Birth, Life, and Death, with a Sketch of the War." In Germany a full and elaborate life is announced, to meet the strong national feeling and sympathy for the man and the cause for which he died.

—The discovery of a new lake in communication with the Upper Nile, through which the river is said to flow, just made by Mr. Baker, and christened with very bad taste the "Albert Nyanza," rather complicates than settles the much vexed question of the source of that river. Everything that occurs goes to confirm the opinion of Dr. Beke, that until we are fully acquainted with the limits of the Nile basin, the extent of the region drained by its streams, and the size and direction of its tributaries, any discussion of its source must be undertaken without the true conditions of scientific certainty, and is unquestionably premature.

—In the new number of the "Westminster Review," Mr. J. S. Mill (M.P. for Westminster, as we may now write since the result of the late election) continues the masterly review of the writings and philosophy of M. Auguste Comte commenced by him in the previous number. It is chiefly occupied with the works produced in the second stage of his intellectual career—works so strangely at variance with his former writings in form and spirit that they are usually ignored by his admirers, and passed over without remark, so that they are little known out of France. Mr. Mill exhibits their faults unsparingly, but without bitterness. His general conclusion is that Comte most closely resembles Descartes and Leibnitz among philosophers, both in his excellences and extravagances. He says: "Were we to speak our whole mind, we should call him superior to them, not intrinsically, but by exertion of equal intellectual power, in a more advanced stage of human progression, but also in an age less tolerant of palpable absurdities, and to which those he has committed, if not in themselves greater, at least appear more ridiculous." It is to be feared the exactions of a metropolitan constituency will lessen Mr. Mill's opportunities for philosophical discussions, at least for some time to come.

—The approaching retirement of Mr. Antonio Panizzi from the post of principal librarian of the British Museum is announced. There are few persons whom it will be so difficult to replace worthily as a public servant—none, perhaps, to whom men of letters throughout the world owe so great obligations. When a political refugee from Italy, engaged from necessity in literary pursuits, he attracted the attention of Lord Brougham, and by his influence was placed in the position he now occupies. The narrow illiberality that would have debarred him from it as a foreigner, received a well-merited rebuke by the splendid success that has attended his exercise of its functions. His untiring energy overcame the dead weight and vis inertiæ of boards of management, trustees, etc., and for some years he has practically had uncontrolled sway in his department. Many Americans have studied under the dome of the Reading Room, that magnificent temple of science that owes its erection to his inspiration, and can testify to the liberal facilities afforded to its frequenters. This, and the library itself, now approaching to 800,000 volumes, and trebled in extent since his accession to office, are testimonials of his services that no lapse of time can obliterate.

—Among the evidences of refined taste and high artistic culture given by the late Prince Consort of England, in spite of the absorbing public calls on his time and resources, was the formation for his private study of a Raffaelle collection—an assemblage of every work of art that could illustrate the genius and productions of the prince of painters. A very interesting account of this collection, and the means taken to extend it, is given in the "Fine Art Quarterly Review." The foundation was laid by the choice Raffaelle drawings in the English royal collection. Correspondence was opened with all the galleries of Europe that could contribute to the object, and photographic copies of every sketch and picture, and every known engraving that could illustrate the genius of the artist, were secured and arranged so as to illustrate its progressive development and final achievement. It is in partial fulfilment of this design that the Cartoons have been removed from the gloomy gallery built for them by William III. at Hampton Court, where they were dimly visible to sauntering holiday makers, and placed in a spacious hall at Kensington. Here they are placed on a level with the eye in the order they were intended to occupy in the chapel for which the designs were executed—each Cartoon being separated by ornamental pilasters with Raffaellesque arabesques, etc. This room is decorated with contemporary furniture and articles of virtu, as old carved Italian caskets, Tazzas of Majolica or Raffaelle ware, Milanese velvet chairs and couches, etc., etc., so that these unrivalled works can now for the first time be studied with the care that they deserve. One gratifying result of the close examination that can now be given them is, that scarcely any great works of art have descended to us in so pure and genuine a state, the identical touches of the master being everywhere visible, free from repairs or restorations. An easel picture by Raffaelle has also just been added to the National Gallery. It has long been known to connoisseurs as the "Garvagh Raffaelle." It represents a Holy Family, and is fourteen inches wide by eleven in height. It was brought to England from the Aldobrandini Palace during the French occupation of Italy at the commencement of this century, and was sold to Lord Garvagh in 1802 for £1,500. The price just paid for it by the nation is £9,000, a rise in value almost equalling that of New York real estate.

—The New York Historical Society is making rapid progress in the accomplishment of a plan for the publication of original historical materials from its manuscript collections. This plan has some novel features. The society issues 1,000 scrip shares for twenty-five dollars each, the proceeds of which form the publication fund, and pays interest in cash on them until publication commences; after that time it guarantees to print every year an octavo volume of not less than 500 pages. Every holder of a share will be entitled to a copy, and none will be printed for sale or attainable in any other method. The Colden, Gates, Steuben, and Duer collections of papers, and many others of miscellaneous character, throwing a flood of light on the colonial and revolutionary history of the State and country, are among the sources that will contribute to the value of the series. The largest portion of the shares are taken up, and printing will shortly be commenced. The editing of the volumes will be done gratuitously by members of the society.

—Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce for reproduction in this country a book whose enigmatical title may excite some curiosity: "Frost and Fire: Natural Engines, Tool-marks, and Chips. With Sketches taken at Home and Abroad, by a Traveller." It is a work completely sui generis, by a Scotchman of honored name in the Western Highlands, Mr. J. F. Campbell, of Islay. His subject is the configuration of the surface of the globe, as affected by volcanic and glacial action—the "natural engines" whose "tool-marks" and "chips" he has hunted out in most countries of the globe. Fire holds but a secondary place in his affections. Icebergs and glaciers are his idols, whose tracks he follows across the continent of Europe, from Iceland to Greece, and through the wilds of Canada and the States of the American Union. Mr. Waterton's enthusiasm for his birds hardly equals Mr. Campbell's passion for his beloved boulders, and 120 illustrations, drawn with admirable force and spirit, depict them and the scenery where they are found in every aspect. He has even invented a shorthand way of describing a landscape by characters indicative of the forces that shaped its leading forms, so that a few cabalistic marks on the margin show to the initiated eye the "rock basins," "ancient sea terraces," "lines of denudation," etc., that make the scene dear to the geologist. Even the cover of the book offers a fac-simile of the "ice-marks on a slate rock in the street at St. John's, New Brunswick." The notes of travel bring out much quiet Scotch humor, and altogether the book is full of individuality, a quality most rare in these days of stereotyped resemblance between man and man. We trust it will be produced in all its original wealth of grotesque and exuberant illustration, and not "shorn of its beams" by a meagre reprint.

—Modern pilgrims do not wait till death has consecrated the scene and object of their pilgrimage, and in this day of locomotion no spot is so secluded as to escape the search of the hero worshipper. A recent traveller, Mr. Walter White, who has published several home tours in England, thus describes the birthplace of Alfred Tennyson in his "Eastern England, from the Thames to the Humber:" "Another descent brought me into a warmer vale, where cots peep out from masses of wood, the road curves, and, shadowed by tall trees, a streamlet tumbles over a dam and makes a cool and cheerful murmur, and the seclusion seems complete. No prettier scene did I see in Lincolnshire. Another bend, and there is a deep lane ascending between grander trees, with a clear and gentle spring at the foot of the bank, reflecting the hart's-tongue and other ferns that grow around it. I drew out one of the ferns to carry home as a memorial of the place. It is living yet. And this is Somersby, and in this delightfully sequestered spot the poet-laureate was born." Mr. White got a cup of tea at a cottage where the woman had lived servant at the vicarage, and "remembered Master Alfred," though delicacy seems to have prevented him from any enquiries as to the youthful days of the poet. He is able, however, to testify, for the lovers of minute facts, that of > "—— the poplars four

> That stand beside my father's door," three "yet wave" behind the house, one has disappeared.

—Of all the contributions of American scholars and cultivators of Italian literature to the great Dante celebration at Florence, none was so elegant and appropriate as the small privately printed volume by Mr. Charles Eliot Norton, of Cambridge, "On the Original Portraits of Dante." The purpose of the tract is to prove the authenticity of a mask, as being in all probability a cast from the face of the poet after death, by comparing it with the undoubted portrait by Giotto, discovered in the frescoes of the Bargello, in 1840. Beautiful photographs of this head in its genuine state, before the reparations that destroyed its character, and of a cast from the mask, are given in various lights and positions, so as to bring out the identity of the two representations of one subject, allowing only for the alterations produced by the distinctive characteristics of youth and age. The recent discovery of Dante's remains, lately mentioned, has led to a scene so curiously at variance with our northern ideas of the solemnities that should wait upon "reverent, grave, and mighty death," and so characteristic of the southern familiarity with the urns and sepulchres of mortality, that it deserves to be chronicled. The discovery was followed by the exhibition of the remains. "Within a magnificent glass tomb, elegantly ornamented and raised on a noble dais, beneath the arches of the chapel of Bracciaforte (temporarily transformed into a most appropriate theatre for the occasion), was visible the skeleton of the immortal poet, extended on white drapery, the head slightly raised upon a pillow." To this scene are we told "devoted crowds flock with a tearful interest," previous to the transference of the remains to their former resting place.

—The serious loss to literature inflicted by accidents like that which has recently destroyed the unique library of Mr. Offor, recalls the frequency of other catastrophes equally disastrous to books. No doubt a very appreciable percentage of the existing stock of them in the world is doomed to destruction by the agencies of shipwreck, fire, and warfare, that have already to answer for the devastation of much beyond human means to replace. Even at the present day war is by no means stripped of its terrors to non-combatants, and men of letters have suffered largely by its inseparable accompaniments. The library of Wm. Gilmore Simms, amounting to 10,500 volumes, was entirely destroyed during General Sherman's march through South Carolina, and the valuable oriental library and collections of Wm. B. Hodgson (well known to savans by his researches in the African languages, etc.) shared the same fate in the neighborhood of Savannah: these are isolated instances that have come to our ears, but may be paralleled in most parts of the country. Of all known losses by shipwreck, the great typical one is that of the copy of Dante illustrated by marginal designs from the hand of Michael Angelo—a volume that would now be as nearly beyond price as any we can imagine. It was the property of a Florentine architect, Antonio Montanti, who shipped it with his goods at Leghorn for Civita Vecchia, when he was appointed architect to St. Peter's at Rome, in a vessel that foundered at sea. Few valuable books are now exposed to the waves of the Mediterranean in all probability. It is between Europe and America that the great commerce of literature now is carried on, and the Atlantic gathers its tribute of books as of man's lives and fortunes. A fine "first folio" Shakespeare from the library of the Pagets at Beaudesert went down in the Arctic, as well as some of the rarest and probably unique books on American history collected abroad, which perished with their owner. Independently of the great national calamities by fire, such as are historical and easily remembered, as the burning of Moscow, the fire of London, etc., it is likely that the greatest losses to literature have been occasioned by conflagrations at the houses of English country gentlemen, where untold wealth is often stored, unknown perhaps to any one even in the immediate neighborhood. Thus perished the invaluable collection of Col. Johnes (the translator of Froissart) at Hafodd, the unique library of the Wynnes at Wynnstay (leaving a complete gap in Welsh history), the grand library of the Marquis of Bute at Luton, and possibly hundreds of others. There are at this moment in England four private collections of manuscripts which would, if brought together, exceed in number and value the great national manuscript library of the British Museum; each are exposed to all the casualties that every private dwelling is liable to.

—The most strictly professional work of that delightful writer, Dean Stanley—on which his fame as a scholar and divine will probably depend—is his "Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians," with philological notes and dissertations. It has been very scarce until the appearance of a new (third) edition, just brought out. How directly he grapples with the difficulties of the subject, in defiance of old conventionalities, may be seen in his vivid parallel of the style of the Apostle Paul with that of Thucydides and Oliver Cromwell! "In all these," he says, "there is a disproportion between thought and language, the thought straining the language till it cracks in the process—a shipwreck of grammar and logic as the sentences are whirled through the author's mind—a growth of words and thoughts out of and into each other, often to the utter entanglement of the argument which is framed out of them. In the case of St. Paul there are also peculiar forms of speech, which he finds it impossible to resist—that almost always act with disturbing force on the sentences in which they occur." Other peculiarities of his diction and rhetoric are as powerfully characterized, ending with "his sudden rise into successive ranges of flight through the various stages of spiritual life, not halting till he reaches the throne of God." The work gives the Greek text of the Epistles, a corrected translation, a paraphrase, critical notes, introductions to the Epistles, and separate dissertations on every subject of interest brought out in the teaching of the apostle.

EDUCATION AT THE GREAT ENGLISH PUBLIC SCHOOLS.*

Mr. Atkinson's valuable pamphlet is based upon the report in four folio volumes, issued in 1864, of the recent Parliamentary Commission to investigate the condition of the great English public schools. It contains in brief an abstract of the most important conclusions arrived at by the Commission in respect to the results of the favorite English academical system, with a commentary by the author full of good sense, ingenious reflection, and pointed argument, and distinguished by moderation of statement and excellence of style. It exhibits an extraordinary picture of the complete failure of the English system of academical training as a means of education, if by education be understood the proper development and discipline of the powers of the mind, not only as applied directly to intellectual pursuits, but as involved in the formation of those habits of reflection and reasoning upon which the culture of the moral faculties in great part depends.

The only mental discipline for boys in the famous public schools of England, with exceptions so slight as to be unimportant, is that which is derived from the study of Latin, Greek, and a very little mathematics. At Eton, and Westminster, and Harrow, and Winchester, and Rugby, boys pass six, eight, or ten of those years of life of most importance for the cultivation of the faculties of observation and reflection, and for the acquisition of the foundations of general knowledge, wholly employed, so far as school learning is concerned, whatever be the natural diversity of their faculties or the differences of their tastes, in the study of Latin and Greek grammar, Latin and Greek prose and verse, and the most elementary mathematics. They leave school as ignorant as they entered it, so far as direct instruction is concerned, of natural history, of physical science, of every branch of learning that has to do with the faculties of observation; and not only of these, but of political history and geography, and, as a general rule, of any of the modern languages. They have not acquired even the rudiments of what are called the practical branches of knowledge, or of those arts, like music and drawing, which are to be regarded as essential elements of a complete education. They enter the university or go out into other fields of life with their minds wholly unopened to the vast interests of science, wholly unacquainted with the charms of literature, wholly unprepared by elementary acquisitions to proceed in any studies but the three already enumerated. And this is not all. But a small proportion of the pupils acquire even in these studies thorough knowledge or facility for further progress. Knowledge has not been considered as a means of intellectual development. They have been taught unscientifically even those things in which they have been instructed. Rev. W. Hedley, tutor of University College and public examiner, says, and his testimony is supported by that of many others equally qualified to pronounce an opinion:

"I am sorry to say that many boys come to the university from school knowing next to nothing. . . . I have sometimes had to remind my brother examiners and myself, in the final examination for B.A., that we were not at liberty to pluck for bad spelling, bad English, or worse writing. . . . Hitherto it has seemed useless for the university to enlarge her course to suit the tastes of men whose minds have never been formed at all by any methodical teaching, and who really cannot be said to have any tastes. . . . It is difficult to say what proportion of candidates for matriculation can translate a new passage of a Latin or a Greek author. At my own college, we consider such a test as much too severe: the college would be left half empty if it were insisted on. . . . Of arithmetic and mathematics few of them know anything more than the amount insisted on by the university, and many of them barely that; the extent of their knowledge not reaching beyond vulgar fractions and decimals. . . . Their acquaintance with history is very meagre, and so exceptional, that where it does exist I should be induced to attribute it more to domestic training and individual taste than to the systematic teaching of schools. Much the same may be said of geography."

This, then, is the general result of the English aristocratic system of education for boys. That the system has no good results it would be wrong to assert. It does turn out a certain number—a small proportion—of good Latin and Greek scholars. It does furnish to a few the sort and measure of intellectual training fitted to their capacities and tastes. But even of these a considerable part acquire the externals of good scholarship rather than its essence; are better fitted to detect a false quantity than to appreciate the literary and moral elements of a noble style; are mere critics and pedants rather than large-minded scholars; are good at translating trifles in Greek or Latin verse, but have acquired neither the taste for, nor the knowledge of, the glory, the beauty, and the worth of the literatures of Greece and Rome.

That there are other results of the system pursued in the great English schools besides those pertaining to the methods of instruction and the studies pursued, is no doubt true. But these results are separable from the methods and subjects of instruction, and would not be affected by changes in the course and manner of study. The direct instruction—the exclusive classical and mathematical training which is substituted for a liberal education, and miscalled by its name—is a lamentable failure.

"The crying evils," says Mr. Atkinson, "in English higher education, and the sources of its failure, are two, though very closely connected: first, that it utterly neglects the principle, patent to all who will give the least attention to the study of the human mind, that men are born into the world with the most diverse mental aptitudes, requiring, instead of one, a great variety of means for their development—of means capable of combining, and requiring to be combined, in varying ways and proportions, to suit the varying circumstances; and that, therefore, it is simply preposterous to attempt to run all minds in one mould, to fit all to the Procrustes-bed of one narrow system; and, secondly, that the system itself with which the experiment is tried is antiquated and obsolete, in that it utterly ignores the great body of modern physical science which has come into existence since it was established in the days of Laud and William of Wykeham."

The question inevitably arises, Why is such a system maintained? or what gives it force and vitality enough to maintain itself in the light of modern ideas and improved methods? The answer to one acquainted with English institutions and habits of thought is not difficult. The strength of the system lies, first, in its long traditional authority. A tradition is sacred, especially if it be embodied in an institution, to those whose rank, title, wealth, and social position are all alike founded on tradition and not on natural right. Moreover, and this is the second source of the strength of this perverted system of education, it is "a protected monopoly of the strictest kind," supported by "bounties that are almost prohibitive of any other style or quality of teaching." Fellowships, scholarships, church-livings, the lucrative masterships in the schools themselves, are the premiums offered for certain classical accomplishments. A Greek epigram is a qualification for a bishopric, and a Latin verse may secure a deanery. Dr. Moberly, late head-master of Winchester, testifies that he knew a boy repeat a whole play of Sophocles without missing a word, and adds that it secured him a fellowship—that is, a good maintenance and good social position—"the prize of a struggle," to use Dr. Moberly's own words, "which was over at fourteen, and success in which was won, in a great measure, by a hard strain on a retentive memory."

But this state of things will not last for ever. The English suffer abuses patiently and long, but at length grow weary of them, and by degrees correct them. The recommendations of the Committee, which accompany their report, all tend to moderate, gradual, but tolerably efficient reform. The rapid improvement during the past few years in middle class education, the great attention which this subject is now receiving, and the vigorous measures adopted to increase the opportunities for education of this class, will compel the aristocratic class to improve the system of aristocratic education.

* "Classical and Scientific Studies, and the Great Schools of England: A Lecture read before the Society of Arts of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, April 6, 1865. By W. P. Atkinson. With Additions and an Appendix." Cambridge: Sever & Francis. 1865. 8vo pamphlet, pp. 117.

Mere enlightened self-interest will be the great agency in the work. The ruling class in the state, if it would retain its authority and its privileges, must be, in the largest proportion, the best educated class. An ignorant aristocracy will not be respected by an enlightened and well educated middle class. The English aristocracy have always shown their appreciation of the political axiom, that reform is better than revolution.

But how is it with our own higher school system? Mutato nomine de te fabula narratur. "Under a changed name the story is told of thyself," is the epigraph on Mr. Atkinson's title-page, and though he does not enter on the application of the lessons that may be derived from English experience, he allows us to infer that he thinks we have lessons to learn from it. Indeed, if we may judge from the tone of his pamphlet, he thinks that our universities, in insisting so much as they do upon classical studies as a preliminary to entrance upon the university course of instruction, compel our higher schools to give too much attention to these studies, and to require too great proficiency in them from their pupils.

"It seems to me," he says, in speaking of the reform required in the English system, "that no reform will fully meet the case that shall stop short of establishing a course of liberal education in which linguistic studies shall be represented, first, by a study of the Latin language and literature, more thorough and effective than it usually is now, inasmuch as it should be treated as the foundation of a future knowledge of the modern languages of the same family; but in which the study of Greek shall be wholly superseded by a real study of the mother tongue and these modern languages, and in which the study of physical science, begun from the earliest moment that the child's observing powers begin to be active, shall be continued in such a thorough manner as shall develop the full disciplinary power it possesses."

We do not readily understand, nor would we readily accept, Mr. Atkinson's complete exclusion of Greek from the course of school studies. If the language is ever to be known, its rudiments may best be learned in youth. Perhaps it is not well to insist upon it as a universal qualification for admission to college, but that it should at least remain as an alternative qualification we believe, and we cannot believe that Mr. Atkinson himself would differ from us in this opinion. Very few of those who learn to read Greek keep up their knowledge in after years, but it is not saying too much to assert that not one of those who does keep it up regrets its acquisition or would willingly exchange it for the knowledge of any other language.

We have no fear that too much attention to the classics is likely to be exacted in our colleges and schools. They are not close monopolies, or for one class, like those in England the condition of which is so forcibly presented by Mr. Atkinson. On the contrary, they are essentially popular institutions, and subject to the influences of popular opinion. They have no uniform, compulsory system; a truly liberal spirit pervades them; and even our best endowed and most independent colleges and universities give constant and satisfactory proof of the disposition of those who control them to keep them at a level with the wants and needs of the community, and to make them represent in their systems of instruction the most enlightened and sensible thought of the times. If the study of the classics is still insisted upon in them, it is because they estimate the true importance of that study in any genuinely liberal system of education, and because they recognize that the tendency of modern and especially of American civilization is to give undue importance to mathematical and physical science as a means of education, because of the practical utility of these branches of knowledge, and of the material advantages which may result from acquaintance with them.

A true system of education, such a system as we believe is developing here, will embrace all branches of knowledge as its instruments, giving undue prominence to none. It will endeavor to draw out the best powers of each individual, although this must in a great measure be done by methods determined mainly by the capacities of the mass. It will take into account the various elements in the education of the child outside of the academic instruction; and in a community where newspapers abound, where lectures are popular, where the rapid growth of wealth leads towards materialism, where scientific pursuits are favored because of their application to the arts of life and of money-making, where there is a general even if not well cultivated activity of the observing faculties, and where the higher and purely intellectual pursuits are but little followed or honored, it will do its part towards preserving the balance between the spiritual and material elements of life, by insisting on those studies which bring in no return of pecuniary gain, but which widen human sympathies, refine taste, cultivate imagination, discipline the soul as well as the mind, and enlarge man's conception of himself and of his destiny, by bringing him into communion with the spirits of men long dead, and creating in him a sense of the historic continuity and perpetuity of the race, and of the intimate responsibility and relation of every generation, however remote, to those which succeed it upon earth.

Mr. Atkinson's pamphlet should be widely read. It is eminently readable, and, as we have already said, of uncommon excellence both in style and thought. It is of not less interest incidentally to the student of the political and social conditions of England than to those readers most directly concerned with its special subject.

PRINCE ADAM CZARTORYSKI AND ALEXANDER I. OF RUSSIA.*

WHATEVER we may think of the influence of the Czartoryski family in general, and of that of the late Prince Adam in particular, upon the destinies of Poland, it must be owned by every candid reader of history that that nobleman—whose birth preceded the first partition of his unhappy country, and whose death took place so little before its last struggle for independence, the patriot warrior of 1792, the adviser of Alexander in the eventful period of 1805–6, the curator of the University of Wilna down to 1823, the President of the Polish Revolutionary Government in 1831, the exiled magnate who so eagerly declared his adhesion to the democratic movement of 1846, the nonagenarian of the Hotel Lambert, who had never ceased to be a protector of the needy and a patron of the learned—forms not only an important but a highly imposing figure in the modern annals of his people.

His life may be divided into two equal parts, the first of which embraces his connection with Alexander, almost down to the death of the latter in 1825; and the other, the checquered period in which he is but a Pole, by wealth, authority, patriotism, and munificence almost the foremost in peace, in the revolutionary tempest, and in exile. A collection of (or, probably, a selection from) his correspondence with his Russian imperial friend, recently published by his son Prince Ladislas, allows us a clear insight into the personal and political relation of the first period; and through that part of his career, as illumined by his writings, we purpose following him with our reader, without assuming to fill up the chasms, to guess at what may be intentionally omitted, to judge as a critic, or to write history. Candor is evidently one of the features of the character before us, and as history, though often severe in its strictures on the political course of the Czartoryskis, happily in no point contradicts the pages of that correspondence, we can without hesitation follow its guidance.

When the battle of Maciejowice was fought, and Kosciuszko became a captive of the Russians, our Czartoryski, together with his brother, was carried as a hostage to the court of St. Petersburg. A young man of high culture, developed at the schools of France and Great Britain, he was introduced by the old Empress Catherine II. into the society of her favorite grandson Alexander. This youthful prince, who was destined to ascend the throne of the czars over the mangled corpse of his always eccentric and wild, and frequently ferocious, father, Paul, was of a character and disposition diametrically opposite—mild and calm, emotional and addicted to romantic musings—a Telemachus who lacked only manliness and truth to be capable of real greatness.

We find them together, in one of the early days of the spring of 1796, in the vast and beautiful garden of the Taurida Palace, traversing its walks for hours. The grand duke is charming; the flight of his ideas forms the most extraordinary contrast with his position and his future. He expresses his warm sympathy with the misfortunes and fortitude of the exiled brothers, the esteem and confidence he bears them, and the necessity he feels of being known to them fully in his real character; his condemnation of the policy of the empress, of the ideas and doctrines that rule the court; his grief on the fall of Poland; his admiration of Kosciuszko, whose cause was that of justice and humanity; his detestation of despotism in all its forms; his love for liberty, the inalienable right of all men; his lively interest in the French Republic in spite of its excesses; and his veneration for his republican teacher, the virtuous Swiss, La Harpe.

The hostage listens with delight, with gratitude and hope. He can hardly believe his ears. "Is it not miraculous," he thinks, "that in an atmosphere and surroundings like these such noble thoughts, such high virtues, can spring forth?" Himself, he writes later, was then "young, full of exalted ideas and sentiments, not easily astonished by extraordinary things, and inclined to believe what appeared great or virtuous." Though the son of the wealthiest family of Polish aristocrats, he was deeply imbued with the liberal ideas of the age, for which his friends had labored and bled; the French Reign of Terror itself had not cooled his ardor for liberty; the French Republic was then seemingly marching towards a future of boundless prosperity and glory; its brightest period, that of 1796–7, had begun; "the empire had not yet poured its icy cold over the warmest partizans of the revolution." Strange words from the lips of a Czartoryski, of him who one day will see the democrats of his country, the Lelewels and the Mieroslawskis, arrayed in bitter hostility against him!

Could Czartoryski resist the temptation of such advances, full of promise, as they were, for Poland as well as for himself? He was convinced of their sincerity, and the Polish exile and the future czar formed a friendship which only the death of the latter could entirely sever, though its warmth was, perhaps, gradually diminished by age and circumstances. An accident brought it about—fate worked against it. Alexander was to rule the Russian empire—Adam would not cease to be a Pole. They loved and esteemed, their countries hated each other.

Catherine died soon after, and her son Paul succeeded her. The influence of Czartoryski upon the crown-prince appeared to him pernicious, and the exile was again exiled, being sent as ambassador to the court of Sardinia—a kingdom which at that time had ceased to exist. He profited by the circumstance, devoting himself to historical studies in Rome. But scarcely was Alexander placed upon the throne, in March, 1801, when he recalled him. Prince Adam, whose fatherland had been entirely annihilated by its third partition, hastened to join his friend, from whose liberalism and magnanimity he hoped for its restoration. Two years later he became his minister of foreign affairs.

The devotion of the Polish emigrants to the cause of France had been cruelly betrayed by Bonaparte. The bones of hundreds of Polish legionaries who had gallantly fought under his banners in Italy now lay scattered among the swamps of St. Domingo. The assassination of the Duc d'Enghien and the final overthrow of the French Republic made both Alexander and his friend decidedly hostile to the usurper. Czartoryski counselled an alliance with England and Austria, and bold measures against Prussia, should she refuse to join it. The restoration of his country was involved in the scheme. Prussia was to be compelled to give up her part of the Polish prey, Austria to be compensated for hers, and Alexander to combine the whole of ancient Poland into one kingdom, united only in his person with Russia. But this prince, whom the circumstances of his education made fatally inclined to hesitation, indecision, and double-dealing, was altogether incapable of a straightforward and bold course of policy, either in war or in peace.

Without compelling Prussia to join him or persuading the Poles to aid him, he rushed headlong with Austria into the war of 1805, fought the battle of Austerlitz, and immediately after pusillanimously abandoned his ally. The two letters in which Czartoryski asked for his discharge from office subsequently to these events are models of eloquent persuasion as well as of manly frankness. He openly tells the emperor that his vacillation and indecision; his want of foresight, of confidence in the measures adopted, and of consistency in carrying them through; his readiness to enter into propositions with the conviction of their impracticability, coupled with his inability, from weakness, to resist their execution; his misplaced friendship for the King of Prussia, who ought never in the eyes of a monarch to have represented a person, but a kingdom; his presumption personally to influence the decisions of the councils of war, and to hamper by his presence in the camp and on the battle-field the movements and check the decision of commanders more experienced and bold than himself; his sudden departure from the army after the defeat, which was almost a signal for desertion; and many other mistakes committed by himself, were the real causes of the disasters of the campaign. All this is told in the language of sincere friendship, whose aim it is to instruct but not to wound, and interwoven with lessons of statesmanship which reflect no little credit upon the sagacity of the adviser. It is equally creditable to the czar to have listened with composure to the undisguised reproaches of his subject, and to have preserved the friend while parting with the minister.

The campaign of 1807, in which Alexander took part, and with no better success, on the side of Prussia, was followed by the creation of the Grand Duchy of Warsaw, which was a restoration of a part of Poland, a measure by which Napoleon achieved for himself what Alexander was so often advised to do by Czartoryski. The latter was now without political employment, but continued to fulfil with patriotic zeal the duties of curator of the University of Wilna, which he had entered upon in 1803. On this neutral field of action he was able to render immense service to his nation without sacrificing his friendship to Alexander. He took no part in the warlike events of 1809, when his imperial friend sided with Napoleon. One of the results was the aggrandizement of the Grand Duchy. But mightier events seemed now preparing. A decisive conflict between the two great powers of the Continent—France and Russia—was becoming unavoidable. Prince Adam, who had never ceased to plead for his country, and again and again urged Alexander to assume the initiative in its complete restoration, but in vain, could not but be perplexed in the extreme by his delicate position. The gulf between him and the czar was growing wider the more the interests of Poland and Napoleon seemed to coalesce. The idea of an independent Poland now became alarming to Alexander, and Czartoryski felt that the moment would soon come when even a shadow of a political connection with him would be a stigma on his patriotism.

"In my opinion," he told the emperor, speaking of the Grand Duchy, "a man who is not attached to his fatherland is a despicable creature. To deny one's faith, one's parents, or one's country, is equally odious in my eyes. . . . . Besides, I have my brother, my sister, all my family, in that new country, and I must confess to your majesty that this is one of the reasons which makes me desirous of severing all connection with affairs here. I cannot be satisfied with being pure, right, and sincere in my actions; I must be so also in my sentiments and thoughts. . . . . My first aim is to preserve my self-esteem; the next, to preserve the esteem of those whom I love and honor."

Alexander refused to allow him to leave his service definitively. But it was less friendship that inspired his gracious refusal than the fear of losing the prestige in the eyes of his Polish subjects which the allegiance of Czartoryski cast upon his rule. How different did he already then appear to the Pole from the Alexander of the Taurida Palace garden. The perils of a French war were continually looming before his eyes; and in order to avert them when already approaching, he induced Czartoryski to sound the intentions of his compatriots by promises of a semi-independence under his sceptre. The attempt, as could be foreseen, proved futile. The Poles were full of enthusiasm for Napoleon, and it was from him that they expected the regeneration of their country.

And soon his eagles again took their flight eastward. The campaign of 1812, his "second Polish war," was begun. A Polish Diet was assembled, and this was presided over by Prince Adam Casimir, the father of our Czartoryski. The latter could hesitate no longer. Lithuania itself, the province in which he lived, was evacuated by the Russians; he was again de facto, as well as de jure, a citizen of Poland. In a fine and touching letter he announces to Alexander his return to his native allegiance, but still begs to be voluntarily discharged. He receives no answer. He writes again and again—in vain. In the meanwhile, the whole of the situation is reversed by the great catastrophe which overtakes the French grand army in Russia.

A few more months, and two-thirds of ancient Poland are under the sway of Alexander. The wonderful events of that time have again exalted the spirit of that monarch, while plunging his thoughts into the depths of mystic revery. He yearns to become the benefactor of his peoples, of mankind. He remembers his youthful vows for the regeneration of Poland; he recalls his Polish friend. Czartoryski works for him in Poland, accompanies him through Germany, is at his side during the deliberations of the Congress of Vienna. Will Poland be regenerated? No. Alexander is more feeble than magnanimous. The interests of the Austrian and Prussian Governments, the prejudices of the Russian people, struggle against his better will, and prevail. A small part only of the former Polish provinces, consisting chiefly of the territories of the Grand Duchy of Warsaw, is erected into a nominal Polish kingdom, to be united with Russia and endowed with a sufficiently liberal constitution.

None of the letters before us show that Czartoryski at any time enjoyed this partial restoration of his country. Several of them are devoted to expositions of infringements on the new constitution, and of shocking abuses committed by the brother of the czar, the Grand Duke Constantine, who, as commander-in-chief of the Polish army, was the virtual governor of Poland, while the nominal one, the old Polish General Zajonczek, as the writer had so often reason to observe with bitterness, was unable, from infirmity of body and mind, to oppose the arbitrary will of the czarevitch. Czartoryski speaks with his old frankness, still in the tone of a friend. He sends warning after warning. He clearly foresees and foretells that such a condition of affairs can be productive of no good. He urges the recall of the grand duke. He prays for it. His warnings, his prayers, remain unheeded. Evidently the czar has become inaccessible to the influence of Polish advice, of Polish friendship. The mysticism of Mme. Krüdener, the diplomacy of Metternich, the insinuations of old-Russian surroundings, carry him in a direction opposite to that of sincere constitutionalism and Polish autonomy. The spirit of Poland moves one way, that of czardom the other. No Czartoryski will prevent a collision. Even the University of Wilna becomes exposed to the persecution of the Government. Czartoryski resigns his curatorship in 1823.

Two years later Alexander dies at Taganrog, tired of reign and of life.

A MELANCHOLY POET.*

"I know the critics shall be kind at last," says or sings Mr. Dorgan, and we will be kind now, for there can be no doubt that he has suffered genuine pain in writing many of his verses, and we have no heart to add to his sorrow. Mr. Dorgan, though a ready versifier, is not one of the mob who write with ease. His poems are the expression of his unrest, or his discomfort, or his remorse, or his despair. He is always in agony or in tears. In his very first poem his heart after sobbing, and "shaking the panting stars," and lying in dungeons, falls into "agonies of ultimate despair." A little after, in a succeeding poem, his heart is old and cold, and his spirit beats its bars, and trembles for the happy stars which his heart had just before been shaking. And in one of the very last poems in the volume we regret to find that his soul is still beating its bars, having meanwhile broken its pinions, and blooded its hands.

Mr. Dorgan is often naturally in tears; he has very troubled sleep, he complains of feverishness, and both life and death, he declares, are curses and accurst. He almost wishes some one would bring him poison. Nature does not solace him, for the forest is haunted by ghastly shapes, and the sea either hisses like a snake or is dead, and the night is dead, and the moon is drowning. Everything, in fine, is very disagreeable to him. We truly pity him, for

> "Doom and desolation, and of hell
> The anguish, wheresoe'er he turns, are nigh."

It is not in jest, it is in all seriousness, that we say we pity Mr. Dorgan. For he is a man capable of doing better than thus to devote himself to the expression of his morbid feelings, and of a sickly melancholy which he mistakes for a "divine despair." The volume of his poems gives indications of his possessing the poetic faculty to a degree that would enable him to write poems that should be read and prized, if he would refuse to dwell on himself, his real or fancied woes, and would strive after that simplicity of feeling and expression which some strains of his verse afford evidence of his capacity to attain.

If Mr. Dorgan be a very young man, youth and inexperience of life afford some excuse for the faults of his work, and strengthen our hopes that he may grow out of his present passion for revealing himself in his forlornness and weakness, and produce verse that shall be strong with the vigor of self-restraint and health. There are better things for one's self and for one's readers than to tell the world, in the eagerness and self-absorption of youth, of one's own morbid conditions. It is the hardest lesson for a young poet to learn, that however important and interesting the study and expression of his morbid feelings may be to himself, they are of very little consequence to the public. The subjective school of poets, even though it includes some great names, is not the school of the highest masters of the divine art. The greatest poets are the most reserved; they recognize the sanctity of their own feeling; they shrink from self-exposure; they honor the modesty of their souls. Moreover, a man of genuine manliness, whether poet or not, is averse to showing or indulging his own weakness. Strength is the foundation on which genuine excellence of character or of work must rest. If a man be weak, let him not parade his weakness, but let him discipline himself in quiet to overcome it.

Mr. Dorgan may find our criticism harsh and hard, but it is, as we began by saying, truly kind. Even in his poorest pieces, even in those too frequent poems in which he strives to be intense and falls into the manner of Mr. Alexander Smith, carrying what Ruskin calls the pathetic fallacy to a great excess, or in those in which he most displays his sickly fancies and humors, there is often an element of such true poetry as to make his faults seem the worse by comparison. He has tenderness, sweetness, grace, and fancy, and that he has manly strength enough to give promise of writing well hereafter, let the following striking poem witness to our readers:

MENE! MENE!

Speak not to me of power that builds its throne
  On outraged rights; for it shall pass away;
Yea, though its empire stretch from zone to zone,
  And bathe in endless day.

Even when the mirth is loudest shall the wine
  Grow bitter, and the shivered wine-cup fall;
For in that hour shall come the Hand Divine
  And write upon the wall.

Weep, if thou wilt, sad seer! thy land's decay;
  Weep, if thou wilt, the hopes that shall expire;
Weep, if thou wilt, the wearisome delay
  Of earth's august desire.

But weep not ever-during Truth as fled,
  Though deserts howl where once her temples rose;
Nor weep for Freedom, dreaming she is dead,
  Fallen amidst her foes.

For God remains alway; and to the Truth
  Shall incense stream from many a grander fane;
And, in the blinding glory of her youth,
  Freedom shall rise again.

ANTI-SLAVERY MEASURES IN CONGRESS.*

The framers of the Constitution of the United States did not dream that the compromises with slavery, which they so reluctantly consented to incorporate in that instrument, enclosed the seeds of the wickedest and bloodiest civil war that the world has ever seen. Believing a union of the States indispensable to the national life, and therefore a paramount necessity, they were too easily persuaded that, for the sake of achieving so great a good, they might safely make terms with the supporters of a system which they acknowledged to be inconsistent with republican principles and a blot upon the national character, but which they thought was sure of extinction at no very distant day. But the attempt of a nation to shield with the forms of law an institution in flagrant antagonism with its highest professions, and with the principles of justice and humanity, is alike impious and demoralizing, and, if long persisted in, is sure to undermine the foundations of social order and public security.

In our country the bitter fruits of national injustice and oppression were apparent at an early day. From 1789 to 1861—a period of more than seventy years—the Southern lords of the lash, through the concessions made to them in the Constitution, were almost as much masters of the general Government as of the slaves on their plantations. Their property in human flesh, under a vicious and anti-republican rule of representation, increased their political power to such an extent that, by acting always as a unit, and adroitly taking advantage of party divisions at the North, they were able, from the very beginning, to control the legislation of the country for the support and perpetuity of their hateful system. With the exception of the ordinance by which slavery was excluded from the Northwest Territory, and the act of 1808 abolishing the foreign slave trade, the records of Congress from 1789 to 1861 exhibit no act unfriendly to the system, but many acts calculated and designed to give it strength and protection. The Constitution, according to the highest judicial authority, conferred upon the general Government no power to interfere with slavery in the States; and so watchful were the guardians of the system, and so imperious in their demands in its behoof, that they were always able to prevent the adoption by Congress of even constitutional measures that were likely to expose it to the slightest peril. Subserviency to the slave power became the fixed habit of politicians and parties at the North, insomuch that the petitions of the people for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and of the slave trade between the States—measures admitted by eminent statesmen of all parties to be within the constitutional prerogatives of Congress—were contemptuously laid upon the table, at the moment of presentation, without debate or reference. Many of our readers are old enough to remember the contest so valorously waged by John Quincy Adams, nearly thirty years ago, in support of the people's "right of petition," and the insolent attempt of the cohorts of slavery to expel him from the House for simply enquiring of the Speaker if it would be in order to present a petition purporting to be signed by slaves. That simple question so provoked the rage and fury of the Southern members that they threatened to break up the Government if a way could not be found of putting a stop to anti-slavery agitation at the North. The House was, for days, a scene of unparalleled excitement and disorder, and there were fears in some quarters of the flow of blood upon the floor.

Mr. Wilson's book records another and a brighter chapter in the history of our country. The rebellion of 1860–61 swept away in a moment the constitutional restrictions by which slavery had been so long protected, and the withdrawal of the Southern senators and representatives afforded an opportunity to the Thirty-seventh and Thirty-eighth Congresses to expunge from the statute book the whole series of measures designed to strengthen and perpetuate slavery, and to propose to the Legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution abolishing and for ever prohibiting it on every part of the American soil. Nothing could better illustrate the power which slavery had acquired over the Government than the hesitation of an anti-slavery Congress to undertake this work of expurgation and reform. The habit of regarding the system as beyond the jurisdiction of the national Government was so strong that members found it hard to believe, at first, that the old limitations were removed, and that they were actually at liberty to legislate in accordance with the principles of impartial and universal liberty. It took four years to do the work which might and ought to have been done in a single month. But the work, thank God! is done at last. The statute book of the United States is no longer defiled by a single line or word supporting or tolerating slavery, and measures have been adopted by the highest legislative authority to secure the complete extirpation of the cruel and bloody system.

We venture to affirm that no other legislative body ever adopted, in the short period of four years, a series of measures so important in themselves and of such wide-reaching beneficence as those of which Mr. Wilson has given us the history in this volume. The men to whose unyielding persistency and devotion we owe these grand measures have claims upon the gratitude of their countrymen no whit inferior to those of the men who led our armies in the bloody conflict with treason and rebellion. But for these measures, indeed, our victories in the field would be of little worth.

The preparation of this volume required much patient labor and no common degree of judgment and discrimination. It is divided into twenty-six chapters, each one giving us the history of a distinct measure, from the moment of its introduction to its final passage in either House. The amendments adopted or rejected are carefully stated; and the spirit and substance of the debates impartially set forth, so far as possible, in the very words of the speakers themselves. The narrative, unencumbered by needless details, embraces all that the general reader will care to learn, and it is far from being dry or dull. In preparing it, Mr. Wilson has added another to his many claims upon the gratitude of a nation redeemed from the crime and curse of slavery.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Sybil: A Tragedy, in Five Acts. By John Savage. (James B. Kirker, New York.)—The incidents of this drama, we are told in the preface, so closely resembled the actual history of a well known Kentuckian, that the play was for a time interdicted at Louisville. The plot, which is ingenious enough, the action, and the catastrophe are in fact truly Southern, and calculated to delight the community in which the characters would be at home. We have a seducer, duellist, and unscrupulous politician in Wolfe; in Sybil, his victim, who practises target-shooting in the spirit of Miss Mary Harris, until, being pressed by the suit of Clifden, she yields to him as an avenger rather than a lover. Chance favors—the author and the Southern public would say compels—the vicarious execution of her bloody purpose; and if Sybil had been familiar with the enlightened usage of Southern society, she would have survived her husband's trial, in the perfect assurance of his acquittal. The literary merit of the tragedy is exceedingly slight. The heroic vein of discourse is interrupted absurdly by commonplace conversation, which would seem to defy the best effort of the actor to relieve it of flatness. For all that, we can see that "Sybil" has qualities which fit it for successful representation, and that the "moral" it contains will be applauded nowhere more enthusiastically than among those who are depraved enough to commit the crimes against nature which the dramatist condemns, and that against social order which he approves. This is not different from the phenomenon that may be witnessed at any theatre whose votaries are treated to "Jack Sheppard," "Paul Clifford," and the like sensational performances. The pit, which is the demonstrative friend of virtue and innocence, dissolves into the rabble that feeds the police courts. There are nations which exhibit the same inconsistency. One would think that the English code and people were peculiarly humane in their respect for womankind if he accepted the conclusion of Blackstone—"So great a favorite is the female sex of the laws of England"—or the mot (not down in the play) of a stage supernumerary—"And allow me to add that him as lifts his arm, except in kindness, against a woman, is unworthy the name of a Briton."

The Jest-Book: the Choicest Anecdotes and Sayings. Selected and arranged by Mark Lemon. (Cambridge: Sever & Francis. 1865.)—This book might be called more appropriately, and with some saving of words, "Joe Miller, edited by Mark Lemon." The collection of anecdotes and jokes is large, and, though it undoubtedly contains the "choicest," it also contains a great many very bad ones, which Mr. Lemon might have judiciously omitted. There are some dozen that it was a shame ever to set afloat, and which a professional joker, like the compiler, ought to have had too much respect for his calling to put into a permanent shape. The sense of humor a century ago was not so nice as it is now, and people laughed at a great many things at which they will never laugh again. Still Mr. Lemon has done good service in rescuing several good modern jests from oblivion, in old newspapers and little read memoirs, and many more have now for the first time been transferred from common room and mess-table gossip into print.

The Cottage Library. (Bunce & Huntington, New York.)—The numbers of this series thus far issued are: "Home Ballads, by Our Home Poets," "The Song of the Shirt," and other of the poems of Thomas Hood, "Under Green Leaves," a book of rural poetry, edited by Richard Henry Stoddard. The last-named collection is almost exclusively from English authors, with a liberal representation of the oldest and best. The publishers aim at obtaining a popular circulation for these volumes, and have shown good judgment in determining their size and style. The price they ask would not be dear except that it ought to purchase much better workmanship. The people have a right to all that their hard-earned money can fairly claim as an equivalent. A little more pains would have produced much better typography, and have given their proper meaning to the engravings, which show slovenly printing. No apology of haste can be offered in works of this character. It is inexcusable that the frontispiece of No. 3 should deface the title-page by being bound up with it before the ink was dry.

A Smaller History of Rome. By William Smith, LL.D. (Harper & Brothers, New York.)—The old and standard work of which this is an epitome is well enough known. Mr. Eugene Lawrence has continued the narrative from the establishment of the empire to its fall in 476. There is a profusion of illustrations, but not too great for the youth whom they will serve. The index is incomplete, as one may see by turning to the title Vespasian. The colosseum, however, is duly catalogued.

The Culture of the Observing Faculties in the Family and the School. By Warren Burton. (Harper & Brothers, New York.)—In the reaction against our present system of instruction from primary schools up to and including colleges, this little book bears a useful if an humble and unpretentious part. Its special aim is to set forth the advantages of object-teaching over the discipline of words and rules, and to propitiate for the young a kind of training which shall call into activity the senses by which all knowledge enters the understanding. Nature and natural operations—the field, the sky, the wood; dew, rain, and snow; the flying bird and distant mountain; the insect and the quadruped—whatever appeals to the perception of color, size, shape, position, weight, number, time, texture, taste, sound, or smell—are all impressed as educators of the growing boy or girl. When we add that Mr. Burton furnishes examples of the mode in which tuition of this sort may be disguised as play, and invested with all the attractiveness of childish amusements, we shall have indicated the scope of his work. His hints will profit all who have the charge of youth, or influence immediately their bringing up.

Our Great Captains. Grant, Sherman, Thomas, Sheridan, and Farragut. (Charles B. Richardson, New York.)—We would not call this a catch-penny publication, yet we apprehend it to have sprung from a shrewd regard to the general curiosity of the hour, rather than from a conscientious desire to extend the domain of critical biography or to rear an enduring monument to the military genius and patriotism of its five justly famous subjects. The proof of this suspicion lies in the fact that the book was in type before the operations of the war had culminated in the coup de grace of the rebellion, and therefore is deficient in those latter exploits which throw new light upon the character of Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan at least. Other marks of haste are not wanting: the paper is inferior, the portraits moderately faithful, the compilation—though it doubtless cost labor and trouble—no whit better than that which is made for the daily press or monthly magazines, nor more trustworthy. For instance, Sherman is said (p. 97) to have declared two hundred thousand men necessary for a forward movement in his department, in the fall of 1861. The public has just learned from the general's own lips that he only asked for sixty thousand, but added that the larger number would be needed before the South could be subjugated. Perhaps two hundred would have sufficed for this business if he could have obtained his sixty.

DISCOVERIES AND INVENTIONS.

Quite marvellous results have lately been noted from the use of ice applied to the spinal nerves. Its frequent application in some severe cases of apoplexy has relieved the patients. It is applied to the lumbar plexus of nerves over the spine, alternated with hot water to the feet. A case of undoubted hydrophobia has been cured by following that treatment. The patient was bound to the bed, face downward, and a thorough wet cupping from the head down the whole length of the spine, followed with ice applications for two or three days uninterruptedly. Pulse and breathing became quiet, pains gradually left him, and complete recovery was the result. In the French hospitals the ice treatment, in cases of nervous debility, paralysis of the motor nerves, prolapsus uteri, convulsions from teething, and puerperal convulsions, has been successful without a drop of medicine. The great secret of this mode of treatment consists in using the ice long enough to get its tonic effects only, which is a nice point, and requires great care from the attendant, as short applications of ice are powerfully neuro-tonic, while its too lengthy application debilitates the patient and does more harm than good. In diphtheria some of the happiest cures have been effected by allowing or compelling the patient to eat ice continually, and use stimulating applications like mustard or capsicum to the neck.

—A chemist has lately been making gas from the gases of the sewers, which is said to be equal to coal gas. His invention consists in pumping the sewer gas into a receiver, and passing it thence through naphtha into the streets—the fixed gas of the sewers retaining the naphtha vapor sufficiently to carburet it. Nous verrons.

—To produce grapes without seeds, early in the spring or late in the fall make a slit in the vine, open and take out the pith, and put some putty in place of the removed pith, close the opening, and bind up with some surgeon's adhesive plaster to exclude the air.

—There are hundreds of oil wells or dry holes in the oil regions of no use but to give éclat to some flaming prospectus of companies just formed. We should like to have some company put down a few inches of two-inch rope of gun-cotton attached to a battery and explode it. If that didn't reach the vein, no "rimmers" would, on which so much money has been expended. A charge of powder was tried once with fair success, but too small a charge.

—Mildew on grape vines may be effectually removed and prevented by sulphur. The powdered sulphur may be blown on the vines with a rubber syringe. This kind of syringe may be found at any drug store.

—Wheat and barley or different kinds of wheat may be amalgamated in the following manner: Take a hollow glass tube with the inside about the size of a pipe stem, not large enough for two stalks of the wheat to grow separately. Put the two varieties of grain to be amalgamated in the bottom of the tube, which should be filled with soil; stick the tube in the ground; the two grains of wheat or barley will sprout, the roots going downwards; the stalks of each compressed into one by the smallness of the tube will grow upwards out of the tube as one stalk and one kind of grain, differing from the parent seeds and possessing properties of both. This is one way of making new seed wheat.

—A beautiful red ink is made as follows: One-fourth ounce of aniline red from petroleum and coal oil, dissolved in one ounce of alcohol. This is to be added to one gallon of water with four ounces of gum-arabic.

—Polish blacking from petroleum and its products: One pound of bone-black powdered, one pound of molasses, one-quarter pound of the waste sulphuric acid from refineries, and one and a half pounds of residuum of petroleum. Mix.

SOMETHING ABOUT MONUMENTS.

Let us assume that about one-half of the memorial buildings which it is now proposed to erect within the United States will be built during the next two or three years. It appears, then, that many American cities and villages, now somewhat bare of other ornament than wayside trees, will either be adorned by good buildings or disfigured by very bad ones, and that many cemeteries will either gain their first good monuments or be more than ever burdened by those which are poor and tame. For it is difficult to build a monument of negative merit. Such buildings, as they have no utilitarian character, must be truly beautiful, or they are ugly and hurtful; they cannot be respectably because appropriately designed; like statues, they must be noble, or they are worthless. And there is a necessity, similar and almost as positive, of great artistic excellence in those buildings which unite a practical use with their monumental purpose.

It will be well, therefore, if those who intend to give money or time to build monuments will give a little thought on the subject as well. We Americans are not so sure of ourselves in artistic enterprises that we can afford to omit the common precaution of thinking about the work we mean to do. Good monuments are not so plenty anywhere in the world that habit has grown to be second nature, and that monuments in the future will somehow be good also. But, in both these cases, the converse is true. Of thousands of sepulchral and commemorative monuments built during the last three hundred years in Europe, statues, triumphal arches, columns, temples, towers, obelisks, scarce one in a thousand is good. Out of hundreds of architectural enterprises brought to some conclusion in America, scarce one in a hundred has been even reasonably successful. There is no undertaking for which most people in the United States are less ready than this of building the monuments which they earnestly desire to build—monuments to their townsmen, college-mates, or associates, who have fallen in the war—monuments to the more celebrated of our military heroes—monuments to the honored memory of our dead President.

Peculiar difficulties will surround and hinder these undertakings, because nearly all these proposed memorials will be built, if at all, by associations; few by private persons. When a gentleman of average intelligence wishes to erect a monument to his brother or friend, there is a reasonable chance that he will employ an architect or sculptor of reputation and professional ambition, even if not of the first artistic skill, and so get a memorial that neither artist nor employer need be ashamed of. But there is much less chance of this in the case of action by a community or association. If a city or society employ an artist, without experimenting with a "competition," they very seldom select the best or even one among the best of the artists within their reach; political influence, private friendship, personal popularity, accidental availability, or temporary popular favor, always interfere to govern the choice. If they resort to competition the result is not practically different; for, supposing the most absolutely fair and careful consideration by the judges of the submitted designs, and supposing the submission of a great number of good designs, what likelihood is there that the judges are fit to judge? How many committees of management, or boards of trustees, or building committees with power, contain each a majority of men who understand the complex and many-sided art of ornamental architecture? How many persons are there in the land, not professed architects or sculptors, who can select the best among twenty or ten designs, each design illustrated only by formal and technical drawings, or by these aided by a fancifully colored and shaded "perspective view" of a building which it is proposed to erect? It is not enough to have "good taste"—to have a correct natural feeling for beauty of form, or to be accustomed to drawings. No man is at all fit to pick out one design among many, unless he has some knowledge of what has been and of what can be done in actual marble, stone, and bronze. There is apt to be a gentleman on every committee who has travelled in Europe, and who gets great credit for knowledge and judgment, and great influence over his colleagues on that account. But that gentleman must give proof of a better than guide-book knowledge of what he has seen, and of a less confused memory than most travellers bring home, and of having bought photographs of the best buildings instead of those most beloved by valets de place, before he can be considered an authority by sensible stayers-at-home. It will often be better if the judges will decide by lot—as judges have been known to—among the designs laid before them. There will then be a reasonable chance that they accept the best design, which chance dwindles indefinitely when most committees of selection attempt to select.

It will be well, therefore, if the people will give some thought to this matter during the months that are to come, that they may learn to bring some wisdom of choice and some appreciation of beauty to their chosen task of grateful remembrance, and that the nation may give its best art and its most poetical feeling, as well as its material abundance, to honor its noble dead. We proceed to offer to our readers some suggestions concerning parts of the general subject.

Private tombstones are not included in the class of monuments we are considering. But there is one simple and not necessarily expensive kind of monument which is often used for a private tombstone, and which will answer as well for many other occasions, namely, the obelisk. The word means any object of the well known shape, square in plan, higher than thick, gradually diminishing in size from the base upward, until the gradual taper suddenly ends at a sharp edge, and a square pyramid with much inclined sides terminates the whole. The form is wrongly used in such cases as Bunker Hill Monument, because so large and expensive a building can be much more effective and beautiful in another form; the famous monument named has the one merit only of being likely to endure a long time. It is wrongly used in such cases as the monument at Munich to the Bavarians who fell in Napoleon's Russian campaign, because bronze cannot be more foolishly used than by being cast into flat plates, and so built up into a hollow square tower, and the cannon which were melted to make this monument would have been better employed if they had been piled in pairs like a child's corn-cob house. The obelisk should always be a monolith, a single block of granite; and in that case it is not a contemptible ambition to get your obelisk as large as possible, and pay largely for quarrying, transporting, and setting up a great stone. It would not be a work of art, but it would be a labor of love and a worthy work for a city, to try to get out of American quarries a rival of the Egyptian Obelisk at Paris, red syenite, seventy feet high, and half a million pounds in weight; or the equal of the yet vaster one at Rome; or one such as a czar might have had, according to the story, a hundred feet high, had not his workmen obeyed orders too literally. But the purpose of an obelisk is not all fulfilled when it is smoothed and set up. The Egyptian idea of this monument was the idea of an excellent place for inscriptions. They covered their obelisks with their picture-writing, from base to summit. Not as the Worth Monument in New York carries the names of battles, cut in raised letters, at great expense; not as the same ugly structure carries its bas-reliefs, and "trophies of arms," in cast bronze; but simply cut into the smooth face of the granite, these inscriptions can be seen from a far, and will remain for ever. The obelisk shares with the pyramid the honor of being an emblem of eternity. The granite monolith is indestructible by time, and nearly so by the hand of man. Cut, to-day, your inscription, half a volume long, on the four smooth faces of a monolithic obelisk of hard granite, and there is no reason why three thousand years rather than one year should efface the letters.

The obelisk has generally been injured in effectiveness as a monument by the addition to its simplicity of other members, making it part of a composition. The simplest and lowest base is the best. And any attempt at union between this and other architectural forms is sure to fail, as in the noted instance of that most inappropriate and offensive design for the great monument to Washington at our national capital; a circular temple, over a hundred feet high, surrounding the base of an obelisk-shaped tower rising four hundred feet above the temple's roof. A very recently built monument, that at Lowell, in memory of Ladd and Whitney, the soldiers of the Massachusetts Sixth who fell at Baltimore on the 19th of April, 1861, is a similar instance of unsuccessful combination of parts. The singular infelicity of the idea of erecting what seem to be four sarcophagi, two of them—the longer two—bearing the names of the two soldiers, and the other two bearing inscriptions in their honor, is equalled by the want of harmony in the design. These four seeming tombs project from the four sides of the base of an obelisk, forming a cross of two longer and two shorter arms. The central tower itself is made up of three plinths or bases, one upon another, the obelisk crowning the highest; the entire height, of which the obelisk itself is about half, reaching twenty-seven feet and six inches. There can be no doubt that a very noble monolith could have been brought to Lowell and erected, with two inscriptions cut upon two opposite sides, for the money that has been spent on this feeble design. And there can be no doubt that the plain obelisk would have been as good a monument as this is in every way unsatisfactory.

Almost all forms of monument that have been sanctioned by the use of ages, and are in themselves excellent, are more or less associated with sculpture. And memorial sculpture is, of course, generally portraiture. It will be found that most of those monumental forms which are the best and the most universally loved, were originally intended for the reception, protection, and exhibition of portrait statuary; such, for instance, is the monument in Trinity Church-yard, New York, in memory of those who died in British prison-ships during the Revolutionary War. It is a canopy of four Gothic arches, raised upon a high base, and surmounted by a tall spire. It is pleasing in outline and in detail, but the open canopy is blank and empty, nothing being seen through its arches but the sky beyond. The original type of this form of monument is found in those canopied tombs of the Gothic time, so numerous once in northern churches, still so numerous in Italy both in churches and in the open air. And, looking back to these, the models—models, also, of all artistic excellence—we find the canopy put to use, covering nearly always that modification of the ancient sarcophagus known as the altar tomb. These tombs vary in style and character with the different ages of the art, but the typical form is a sarcophagus two or three feet high, long enough to receive a life-sized effigy, and wide enough for one such effigy or for two. Upon the slab forming the cover was laid the figure of the dead, as if asleep, the head upon a round pillow, the feet together, and often resting upon a lion or hound, or else crossed one over the other, the hands brought together as in prayer. These effigies were sometimes carved in marble or stone, sometimes cast in bronze. The sides of the tomb were decorated with heraldic devices or with figure sculpture representing incidents in the life of the deceased, or, more simply, with little arcades or with tracery. This representation of the figure as in placid and motionless sleep is perfectly appropriate and right. It has been felt by the best sculptors of our own time to be the most fitting form for memorial statues, and, with the revival of mediæval architecture in Europe, the sarcophagus and effigy have been restored to use. It is hard for modern sculptors to retain the composed stillness of the early statues; the figure must be less stiff to suit modern notions of gracefulness, and much of the pathos and dignity of the old work is lost when the change is made. Baron Marochetti's statue of the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Charles I., on the tomb erected to her memory by Queen Victoria, is one of the loveliest portrait statues of modern times; but, lovely as it is, it is open to the objection that it has too much action for the effigy on a tomb. In some modern tombs in Germany, the carefully modelled statues are made ridiculous because couched upon an elaborate mattress and pillow, and because posed in different attitudes of uneasy sleep.

Many tombs remain to us from the best times of art without the life-size effigy on the top, but covered with a heavy stone, figured only with a cross and sacred monogram, but having the sides panelled, and each panel filled with sculpture in relief. This plan has also been followed in modern times, in cases where the portrait statue was not to be had, as in the case of soldiers who have died away from home, leaving no sufficient material from which a portrait could be made. But, as we have said above, memorial sculpture will generally be portraiture. No other casting or carving can be so fitting as a likeness of the dead whom we wish to remember and honor.

The tombs of the Scala family at Verona, deservedly celebrated as the most perfect monuments known to us, have the sarcophagus and effigy, as was customary at the time, but also the statue of the dead chief as in life. The figure on the stone coffin is clothed in the long gown of peace, and wears a simple fillet around the head. The sides of the sarcophagus are carved with incidents in the life of the dead man. A noble four-arched canopy, resting on slender shafts, is raised above it, and the arches support a square, steep roof or spire, which is truncated, and bears upon the flat top a small equestrian statue of the chief in his armor of battle. These tombs, or the best two, those of Can Grande and Can Mastino della Scala, are as perfect in design and execution of details as in general feeling, and are models of excellence in monumental work.

It should be observed, though, that these monuments, consisting of the sarcophagus and recumbent figure, are designed for tombs proper—designed, that is, to be placed over or to contain the body itself. They are not suitable for memorials, merely, to be erected in memory of one who lies elsewhere. There is a certain difficulty in fitting any monumental building, if of the nature of a tomb, to this purpose. No structure yet proposed is as suitable as a life-sized portrait statue, erect or in sitting posture. The difficulty is, of course, to get the statue. The cost may not be an objection. Money can be raised to pay for the noblest figure, in bronze or marble, of McPherson, or Wadsworth, or Stevens, but who is the artist that is to carve it? There are one or two sculptors in the country who have approved ability, and they should be kept busy for the five years to come modelling nothing but portraits, that we may rightly remember our gallant dead. That they should be left to waste their time on fancies and "ideals" proves a radical deficiency somewhere in the glorious laws of supply and demand.

The need of statues of eminent soldiers suggests inevitably the appropriateness to this need of equestrian statues. And in connection with this theme, as the bronze horsemen at Rome, at Venice, and at Padua occur to the mind, the need of some knowledge on the part of our people of what other people have done to honor their illustrious dead becomes evident. Cannot something be done to reproduce by a carefully made cast—as was done for the Sydenham Crystal Palace Company—the great statues of Colleone and Gattamelata? When shall we learn that the way to teach people art is to show it to them? One great work of art is worth a thousand lectures on art. If the lectures also are good, they will be better when the work of art is present to enforce their doctrine..

If the newspapers speak truly, some of the great colleges propose to build memorials to their graduates who have fallen in the war for the national life. It seems that one of these great colleges has put head and heart to the consideration of the matter, for the rational and worthy conclusion is arrived at to build a hall for her living alumni in honor of the dead. A good building thus serving each present generation, and full of memories of a past generation of heroes; greeting every graduate who enters to share in literary or social festivity with welcome from a noble past; holding up, within and without, the names, to honor, of good men and true, who have gone before—such a building would certainly be better than any huge pile erected to memory only. But it must be a good building. It must be a noble building. Every memorial must have these two characteristics, or it is worthless; it must be rich and ornamental, and even profusely decorated; and it must be built to last for ever. A plain building, well fitted to its purpose, and intelligently designed, such as would make a good alumni hall, would not serve for a memorial. There must be the evidences of lavish expense of money, all well spent indeed, but also freely spent, of beauty sought for itself, and ornament loved for its own sake, and used to dignify the building. Then durability—of course no public monument is to be allowed to rival those wooden head-boards which are still set up in German village grave-yards—the Harvard memorial should stand as firmly as Bunker Hill Monument itself.

This Friday morning, as we conclude, the Times' correspondent sends us his account of the action of Yale College in the matter: and it seems that a sort of sub-chapel to the proposed new University Chapel of Yale is the form proposed. This plan is so far good that it gives a good chance to set private memorials—tombs, tablets, memorial windows, and pavement slabs—where they can be well seen. It would seem, however, that this purpose is as well suited in an independent building, and that an independent building would be a better monument to the soldiers, one and all.

In another case, a campanile has been proposed, a tall tower within which a gradual stairway or inclined plane should ascend continually from base to summit—those who have ascended the great bell tower of St. Mark, in Venice Square, will remember the slow ascent to the belfry chamber—the walls of the stairway to be incrusted with the tablets in memory of the dead. And other forms of building have been and will be proposed. We return to our first request, and ask the American people to think a little of all these things, and see to it that their willingly-given money shall be well spent. No afterthought will avail. We must all give our minds and hearts to it now, or we shall only perpetuate our carelessness with our sorrow, and compel pity for our ignorance and narrowness of mind when we seek to inspire admiration for the gallant deeds of our dead servants.

The following descriptions of Policies are issued by this Company, the premiums on which may be paid yearly, half-yearly, or quarterly, at the option of the party assured:

1st. LIFE POLICIES.—These are issued for the whole term of life, payable, together with the dividend additions, after the death of the party assured, to the person entitled to receive the same.

2d. ENDOWMENT ASSURANCE POLICIES.—These are issued to persons desirous of making provision for advanced life, or any other purpose, and are payable, together with accrued dividends on the same, to the assured party on attaining a certain age, say 40, 45, 50, 55, 60, or 65, or in case of his death, before arriving at that age, to his heirs or assigns.

N.B.—Particular attention is requested to the advantages afforded by the payment of the premiums, on both LIFE and ENDOWMENT assurance policies, in TEN ANNUAL INSTALMENTS. The rates of such premiums charged by this Company are lower, while the dividends are greater, than in any other life company in the United States: and the Company will, on the surrender of such policy, issue a paid-up policy for an equitable sum, which they will guarantee SHALL EXCEED the proportionate amount.

For instance, on surrender of a policy for $10,000 (other amounts in same proportion) on which the premiums are payable in ten annual instalments, the Company will issue a PAID-UP POLICY which they WILL GUARANTEE

After the payment of	2	premiums shall exceed	$2,000
"	3	"	3,000
"	4	"	4,000
"	5	"	5,000
"	6	"	6,000
"	7	"	7,000
"	8	"	8,000
"	9	"	9,000

This privilege is NOT CONFINED TO NEW POLICIES ALONE. Every policy now in force is NON-FORFEITABLE to the extent of the amount which its present value would purchase, on application to the office, as a paid-up policy.

This plan of paying for a policy by a definite number of annual instalments must commend itself to every thoughtful man, as it obviates one of the greatest objections to life insurance, namely, the uncertainty of being able to continue the customary payments of premiums during the later years of life.

3d. ENDOWMENT POLICIES FOR CHILDREN.—These are payable when a child attains the age of 18, 21, or 25 years, either with or without the return of the total premium paid, in case the party assured does not attain the specified age.

SURVIVORSHIP ANNUITIES.

The officers of this Company have the satisfaction of offering to the public rates or premium by which SURVIVORSHIP ANNUITIES, at all combinations of ages, may be secured.

By this plan the insurer pays a certain sum per annum to the Company during his life, to secure a sum annually thereafter to one or more persons, for the balance of their lives.

Thus a husband may secure to his widow the payment of an annuity sufficient to maintain her in comfort and independence during the remainder of her life; and, in like manner, a whole family may be provided for, and more economically than by any other method, by taking a policy for each person separately, with the additional advantage of being able to modify the annuity to suit each individual case.

This form of annuity supplies an actual want or necessity that exists in the minds of a large number of persons, and one that increases with the wealth of the insured; for it often happens that fortunes or bequests are lost in much less time than it has taken to accumulate them. This necessity is particularly apparent in the case of a wife or daughters, who are always dependent upon advisers, who may prove injudicious or adversely interested, and human experience has amply proved that a provision of this kind is often of equal importance with the bequest itself.

This provision is not only free from the ordinary dangers of investment and dependence upon other persons, but is punctual, and full payment is secured upon the promises, good faith, and large resources of this institution; which thus, to a certain extent, becomes the GUARDIAN OR TRUSTEE of the survivor, and hence the provision may be considered, humanly speaking, beyond any adverse contingency.

These considerations have induced several of the officers and trustees of this Company both to avail themselves largely of this form of life insurance, and to fully recommend it as the most comprehensive and perfect method known whereby may be insured a definite, certain, and permanent support to a surviving nominee, whether wife, parent, child, or friend.

The Rates of Premium have been calculated, at great labor, upon a basis that has been submitted to and received the unanimous approval of some of the most able managers and actuaries in Great Britain as well as in this country.

All premiums paid may be made returnable to the insurer in case the nominee, or person for whom the annuity is intended, should die first. This feature is especially recommended.

The Dividends are as large as upon any other form of policy issued by this Company, and may be applied, as on other policies, as follows:

1. As CASH in part payment of annual premiums commencing at end of first year.

2. To increase the amount of the annuity.

3. Accumulated dividends may, at any time, be used to cancel the premium for any one year, or series of years, until exhausted.

The premium for any one year, on any form of policy in this Company, may be thus paid by relinquishing the CORRESPONDING VALUE ONLY of additions.

POLICY MAY BE MADE NON-FORFEITABLE.

Should the insurer desire, at any time, to discontinue the payment of annual premiums, he has the option of receiving either its equitable cash value or a paid-up policy for an annuity, in proportion to the amount he has paid to the Company.

Rates of premiums for all combinations of ages, or any other information desired, may be obtained on application at the office of the Company, 144 Broadway, New York, or to any of the authorized agents.

DIVIDENDS ANNUALLY.

DIVIDENDS, OR DISTRIBUTIONS OF SURPLUS PREMIUMS, will hereafter be made ANNUALLY, the next being February 1, 1866.

Policy-holders may use their dividends as CASH IN PAYMENT OF THE PREMIUMS for any current year, or to augment their insurance, as heretofore.

Dividends may be thus applied IMMEDIATELY; WITHOUT ANY DELAY FOR THE REDEMPTION OF SCRIP, as in some other companies.

When premiums are paid in ten (or other) annual instalments, whether upon Life or Endowment Policies, the Dividends will be based, during the term, upon the amounts actually paid. After the payments shall have ceased, and until the Policy becomes a claim, the Dividends will continue as upon other paid-up Policies. The Dividends under the present system may be used, during the ten years, as cash payment of the premium, and afterwards as an absolute cash income, or they may augment the amount insured as heretofore.

The ASSETS of the Company are invested exclusively on Bond and Mortgage on Real Estate in the City and State of New York, worth in each case at least DOUBLE the amount loaned, in United States Stocks and Stocks of the State of New York: the solidity and security of this disposition of the Company's funds will be conceded.

N. B.—The Company will issue policies on A SINGLE LIFE to the extent of $20,000, but only in cases where the physical condition and family history of the applicant are entirely unexceptionable.

Applications by mail, or otherwise, promptly attended to at the office of the subscriber,

5 WALL STREET.

This Company will continue, as heretofore, to insure respectable parties against DISASTER BY FIRE

At fair and remunerating rates; extending, according to the terms on its Policies, the advantage of the

PARTICIPATION PLAN OF THE COMPANY,

pursued by it for several years past, with such great success and popularity, and profit to its customers: whereby

(75) SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT. (75)

of the Profits, instead of being withdrawn from the Company in Dividends to Stockholders, is invested as a "SCRIP FUND," and held for greater protection of its Policyholders; and Scrip, bearing interest, is issued to Customers therefor: thus, IN THIS COMPANY, those who furnish the business, AND PAY THE PREMIUMS, derive the largest share of advantages; and when the accumulations of the SCRIP FUND shall exceed

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS,

the excess will be applied to PAY OFF the Scrip IN CASH in the order of its issue.

☞ The liberal and prompt adjustment of Claims for Loss, WHEN FAIR AND SQUARE, is a specialty with this Company.

NOTE.—This Company does not insure on the hazards of RIVER, LAKE, or INLAND NAVIGATION; confining itself strictly to a legitimate FIRE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY A.M.

BUSINESS through the week has again been active in the line of foreign importation. We have had quite a fleet of steamers from Europe laden with dry goods, and the usual number of arrivals from the Indies with sugars, coffee, teas, etc. Trade in the domestic commission line is also fair, while in domestic produce, near the close of the week, prices were rather in advance of the limits on recent orders from abroad for export. The whole export movement of the week, exclusive of specie, which is light, and of the U. S. 5-20 bonds, which go out on a liberal scale, amounts to $2,950,000. The arrivals of cotton from the South are over 20,000 bales, or 5,000 bales in excess of last week and the week before. But of these receipts, we find that scarcely one-tenth is taken up for export, the remainder being subject to local speculation and the regular demand from the New England manufacturers. The stock on hand is steadily accumulating, and we have reason to believe that in another week or two the export will be materially increased. The accounts from the States recently in rebellion in reference to the old stock of cotton in the country continue to perplex the trade, because of the wide differences of opinion on the subject in the letters from New Orleans, Georgia, Alabama, etc.

Within a day or two past the harvest advices from the West are not so favorable, and this change has partially enhanced speculation on the Corn Exchange. It appears that the recent heavy rains caused some trouble to the gathering in of the wheat crop, and material damage in some sections of the West to the oat harvest. These reports are of a private rather than press authority, and may be exaggerated for speculative purposes. The telegrams to the Associated Press represent the mischief as limited. We shall soon have the official reports on the subject through the Agricultural Bureau at Washington.

There is a rise—or rather recovery—in United States 5-20s of 2 per cent. since last Saturday, the quotation returning to 105¾ to 106 per cent. The orders to buy from abroad have been coming in freely by every steamer through the week, and at such limits as to price as enabled the parties here to whom they were directed to fill them at once. They have been favored by the higher ruling of gold, from 143 up to 146 per cent. This advance is of a speculative character. The party who are reputed to have been very large buyers of late held the market steady until the rumors of apprehended trouble on the Rio Grande enabled them to demonstrate for a rise. The highest sales were at 146½ Thursday night, from which the price receded to 145 per cent. on Friday.

Exchange on London has fallen to 108½ to 108¾ per cent. for gold, which, of course, shuts out all export demand for gold. The Custom House demand to pay duties has again been very large through the week, but this has been qualified by some sales of gold out of the large interest surplus in the Treasury office. The July interest, $9,750,000 in amount, is payable in gold, being 3 per cent. on the 6 per cent. gold-bearing loan of 1881, and 2½ to 3 per cent. on the old funded loans of the United States. The payment has been made this month without diminishing the heavy gold balances with which the Treasury entered upon the new fiscal year. The customs for July at New York will equal this sum, leaving $3,500,000 at the outports to be added to the previous gold balances, if not turned into currency to help pay the 15th August interest, amounting to $10,950,000, or 3.65 per cent. for 6 months on the first series, $300,000,000, of the 7.30 loan. The September interest, $4,319,000, is payable in gold, being 2½ per cent. on the 10-40 years' stock. No stated interest falls due in October, while in November the gold interest, $18,167,085 in amount, comes in, being three per cent. on the 5-20 stocks.

The money market worked easy in the early part of the week, but is now up to 6 to 7 per cent. on a demand to carry up the gold and railway speculation. The amount of gold thus held is on the increase, as there is no export demand, and the Treasury is supposed to be selling its current receipts from customs. The leading railways have suddenly gone up 3 to 5 per cent., and even 10 to 15 per cent. in one or two instances. The common stock of the Erie Company led off in this movement, and from 82½ per cent. nearly touched par (99¼) on Thursday. The company have declared their half-yearly dividend of 4 per cent., to be paid on the 21st August.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

As remarked above, the European demand for 5-20s, original issue, has been large—estimated at three millions for the week. They have advanced from 104 to 104½ to 106 to 106⅛ per cent.; the new issues from 104 to 104½ to 104¾ per cent.; the 6 per cents. of 1881 from 106¾ to 107¼ to 107½; the 10-40s, 96¾ to 97¼.

The 7.30 per cent. loans, first and second series, are at par and interest. The third series has been closed out, $230,000,000 in amount, through the agency of Mr. Jay Cooke, though a considerable part of the money is still undrawn in the various National Banks that subscribed to the loan for their local dealers.

Treasury certificates of indebtedness, twelve months to run, carrying 6 per cent. interest, are selling at 97¾ per cent. for the 1865, and 99½ for the 1864 issues.

STATE SECURITIES.

We have nothing new to report under this head. A few sales are making of the Border State bonds, such as Virginias, Missouris, and Tennessees.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The large advance in Erie common stock has also advanced the fourth mortgage bonds of the Company, which are convertible at the will of the holder into common stock until 1868. They are now selling at 99 to 100. Erie shares have advanced from 82¾ to 98; New York Central from 94½ to 95½; Reading from 103 to 109, and then returned to 107; Hudson, 108 to 115½, returning to 113½; Michigan Central, 108 to 109; Michigan Southern, 65¼ to 69¾, returning to 67¼; Pittsburg, 68 to 75, returning to 72¾; North-West, 27½ to 28; North-West, preferred, 61½ to 64½, and back to 62⅝; Fort Wayne, 98 to 98½; Rock Island, 107¾ to 108¾. Market firm this morning.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

Atlantic Mail has declined from 164 to 156½; Canton 40 to 39⅝; Mariposa advanced from 12¾ to 13½; Cumberland from 42 to 42¾; Brunswick fell off to $10¾.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Gold is about 145¾. Bills on London for this day's steamer close very weak, with sales as low as 108⅛ to 108⅜ per cent.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

TERMS:—Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

MOODY'S PATENT SELF-ADJUSTING HOOP SKIRTS.

It is the only article of the kind manufactured that is never in the way either in the narrow church-pews, on horseback, or in any crowded place.

The new Trail Skirt of this peculiar manufacture is particularly recommended to ladies, as the flexible joints enable her to fold it about her person with much greater ease than a small one of the old style. Ladies are well aware that there is no article of dress which has heretofore caused so much trouble and annoyance as hoop skirts, and they should at least examine "THE MAGIC" before purchasing.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

Reliable agents wanted, to whom we offer great inducements. Every explanation will be cheerfully given to all, whether they wish to purchase or not. Descriptive circulars, together with specimens of their work, will be furnished to all who desire them by mail or otherwise.

FINANCIAL REVIEW 189

Three Dollars per annum, in advance; Six months, Two Dollars. When delivered by Carrier in New York or Brooklyn, Fifty Cents additional.

JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, PUBLISHER, 130 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Week.

THE public debt, according to a statement by Secretary McCulloch, amounted on the first of the present month to $2,757,253,275 85, divided into $1,108,662,641 80 bearing interest in coin, $1,289,156,545 bearing interest in lawful money, and $357,906,969 not bearing interest. The annual interest in coin is $64,521,837 50; in legal money, $74,740,630 78. Of legal-tender notes in circulation there are $685,236,269; of fractional currency, $25,750,000. The amount of coin in the Treasury is $35,338,000, and of currency, $81,402,000.

THE Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy at West Point, after attending the annual examination of that institution, have made their report. They were abundantly satisfied with the proficiency of the cadets as soldiers, but in point of scholarship find them not distinguished above the pupils of any first-rate educational establishment. Between the sections of the graduating class the inequality was far too great, and in all there was a general lack of precision and distinctness in their replies, and "frequent and inexcusable errors of pronunciation and of grammatical construction." The Board, as an aid to their inspection, resolved to call upon the Superintendent and the several members of the Academic staff for views and suggestions touching the management and needs of the Academy. They were obstructed, and to some extent defeated, in this design, by the action of the Superintendent, Brigadier-General Cullum, who insisted that his staff should communicate with the Board through himself. This interference was not tolerated without protest and an appeal to the Secretary of War, who sustained the right of the Board to obtain testimony directly, though the Superintendent chose to construe the decision otherwise. The Board make a number of recommendations for promoting the efficiency of the Academy: that the superintendency be thrown open to the whole army, and not confined to an officer of the Engineer Corps; that the corps of cadets be gradually increased to four hundred, without preventing a desirable system of commissioning a large proportion of officers from the ranks or from civil life; that English grammar, descriptive geography, and the history of the United States be added to the requirements for admission; that the law be modified so as to oblige the appointment of cadets one year before the date of their entering, and that competitive examinations for cadetships be held in the various States; that seventeen and twenty-two years be made the limits of the age of admission, with a special exception in favor of those young men, not older than twenty-four, who have been more than two years in the service; that the cadets be allowed to wear beards and moustaches at pleasure, with such uniformity in trimming as may be deemed advisable; that profane swearing among them be checked, and a distinction be made in punishments between offences against conventionalities and those involving moral turpitude. We are somewhat surprised that while recommending a first assistant professor in Spanish the Board did not also recommend a professor in German, whom, if we are not misinformed, the Academy has not—a singular omission, when we consider what the German nation has contributed to the history, practical illustration, and improvement of military science.

THE Fifth National Temperance Convention was held at Saratoga on the first three days of the month. There were 332 delegates present, including six women, and representing twenty States and four foreign nations. One Indian tribe was also represented. Gov. Buckingham, of Connecticut, presided. Essays and papers were read on the early connection of the temperance cause with religion; on the unnecessary and injurious use of alcohol as medicine; on prohibition; and on the need of a temperance journal. Among the speakers were Ex-Gov. Dutton, of Connecticut, and Gen. Neal Dow, of Maine, who defended the prohibitory laws of their respective States, and urged their extension to other communities, together with the co-operation of temperance men in their enforcement. Addresses were also made by Rev. John Pierpont and Hon. Gerrit Smith. The latter was in favor of doing away with wine in medicine and at the sacramental table. These two subjects, in fact, were the chief cause of controversy in the convention, unless we except an invitation to Maj.-Gen. Hooker to attend, which was not pressed to a vote, simply because the general had left town, it was learned. Resolutions were adopted giving thanks for the overthrow of the rebellion; reaffirming the doctrine of total abstinence; constituting a committee of seven to perfect a plan of organization for cities, towns and villages, and the nation at large; rehearsing the original and constant sympathy of the church with the temperance cause, and affirming the duty of ministers and church members to help on the movement; against the use of intoxicating wines in Christian ordinances; in favor of educating the people up to prohibitory laws, and the young in the ways of temperance; setting forth the perils involved in the use of home-made wines, and discouraging their use; and recommending the medical profession to be cautious in prescribing alcoholic drinks, especially for trifling ailments. Among the resolutions presented, but lost sight of, were one advising abstinence from spirituous liquors as food, drink, or medicine; another condemning the use of tobacco; and a third and fourth urging Congress to forbid the importation of liquors ascertained to be adulterated, and recommending the removal of the New York State License Commissioners. The statistics of the order of the Sons of Temperance show that it has organizations in twenty-six States, and embraces 113,000 members.

THE burning of the ship William Nelson is closely followed by that of the British steamship Glasgow, of the Inman line, which left this port for Liverpool on the morning of the 30th ult. She took fire shortly after noon of the next day, but happily we have no loss of life to record. Captain Manning maintained good order in spite of the inevitable panic which prevailed, and every soul on board was safely transferred to the American bark Rosamond, together with the ship's valuables and some baggage. The steamer Erin afterwards came up with and relieved the over-laden bark, and brought the passengers to this city again. The cause of the fire is yet unknown.

The freedmen are meeting with many obstructions in their endeavors to work for pay, as was to have been expected. On the Eastern Shore of Virginia they complain that they cannot obtain the compensation which is due their faithful and productive toil. The planters will not keep their word, and are most reluctant to submit to the altered condition of labor. At Memphis, Brig.-Gen. Tillson has issued a circular concerning the enticement of freed people from their employers, after contracts fairly made, by persons temporarily in want of laborers. This pernicious practice affects both parties injuriously—the employer with a direct loss, and the laborer with forfeiture of his previous earnings. Col. Bentzoni, at Helena, Arkansas, to prevent further outrage of the blacks by their former owners and other evil-disposed persons, directs all instances known to the superintendent of freedmen to be brought by him before the provost-marshal in the form of charges. Trial and stated punishment will follow. Colored men are in every case to choose their own employers, but must fulfil all approved contracts when once made. Employers, however, "are prohibited from taking the law into their own hands under any circumstances." Gen. Fisk has issued a circular for the instruction of whites and blacks in his department, which embraces Kentucky, Tennessee, and Northern Alabama. He explains the intentions of Government in regard to the freedmen—to protect their industry, to settle them in homes of their own, to ensure their absolute freedom, to promote among them virtue and intelligence. They will be encouraged to support themselves, and to cultivate lands for an interest in the crop. Freedmen's camps and refugee homes will be discontinued as soon as practicable. Difficulties which involve colored testimony will come before the officers of the bureau for settlement. It is asserted to be "a common remark among the colored people of Raleigh that they have suffered more from the abuse of Union soldiers than they ever did during the whole period of the rebellion." A tale of horrible atrocity committed upon a colored woman by members of a Pennsylvania regiment, is confirmatory of this strong statement. Superintendent Conway reports that less than thirty-five (hundred ?) freedmen are maintained by Government in Louisiana. Only the sick and helpless receive rations. There is a crisis in the educational system of Louisiana, which, as the legacy of Gen. Banks, is not favored by Gen. Canby, and is almost destitute of means. A tax was long ago ordered for its support, but, though estimated and prepared, has never been levied. The thousands of colored youth and adults who are now enjoying its beneficent privileges, are liable to be stopped short in the career of knowledge on which they have entered with so much zest.

We stated last week a little inaccurately, that General Palmer had proclaimed emancipation to all the slaves in Kentucky who should choose to leave the State. The fact remains that there is an extensive exodus of this class of the population, but the cause of it must be referred, not to the military authorities, but to the slaveholders themselves. We have already recorded the consequences of their equally foolish and wicked representations to their slaves, that freedom never would be granted them. The troubled bondmen thought it time to betake themselves to States where black people had their liberty. Hence a widespread desertion of the plantations, and a crowding of the cities bordering on the Ohio. The municipal officers appealed to Gen. Palmer. He adopted the simple plan of furnishing a pass to every negro willing to move on "in search of employment." In this paper the bearer was merely described as "colored." Gen. Palmer writes to the President that he always "presumed" the applicant was free, and adds: "To presume slavery from color alone is contrary to justice; to presume freedom without regard to color, and give protection accordingly, is to end slavery." It certainly is.

Governor Peirpont informs the justices of the county courts of Virginia, that in a number of counties persons have been illegally elected to the offices of commonwealth attorney, sheriff, commissioner of revenue, clerk of court, etc. They are disqualified by having held office under, or been members of, the Confederate Congress or Legislature. The justices are directed to consider the designated offices vacant wherever they have been filled in the manner described, and to order new elections immediately.

Where the liberty of the press cannot be trusted, it would seem as if the liberty of the ballot ought not to be. Maj.-Gen. Ruger, commanding the Department of North Carolina, has suspended (not inappropriately) the Daily Union Banner, a disloyal publication of Salisbury. It is thought other newspapers deserve the same treatment. We quoted last week from the Raleigh journals their not flattering descriptions of the state of society there, and the dismal prospect of reaction consequent upon the withdrawal of the United States troops. Two citizens of North Carolina, sojourning in this city, were alarmed lest they should be unable to induce emigration to so unpromising a State. They accordingly addressed a note to Gov. Holden, requesting a denial of what The Progress had said. His answer merely expresses his belief that what is threatened by the insolent aristocrats will not come to pass. He does not deny that they boast of a speedy return to power, and of the vengeance they will wreak on Union men and negroes. Nor would he recommend that the troops be removed.

Bishop Wilmer, of Alabama, has been addressing the clergy and laity of his diocese. He thinks that Davis is past praying for, professedly because there is no longer any "President of the Confederate States," but really, we mistrust, because the chances seem slim that the state prisoner will go unscathed. The Bishop is inclined to hold on to the separate organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church South. He says the Church of Scotland gets along without quarrelling with the Church of England, though both exist as distinct organizations under one civil rule. He will not recognize the war-power of the President of the United States as a part of that authority which the Church is enjoined to heed, nor, consequently, substitute Johnson for Davis in the prayer for the powers that be—that is, so long as there is martial law at the South. Cæsar will get his dues when he marches off his centurions; till then, not a penny. We doubt if this mode of collecting taxes will be approved at Washington. The concluding advice of the Bishop is not so perspicuous as might be desired. Here it is:

"In regard to the taking of oaths, it is beyond all question the duty of every citizen to render faithful allegiance to the government under which he lives, and an oath of fidelity to the government is only the formal and solemn acknowledgment and expression of an already existing obligation. If, therefore, the oath of allegiance should be lawfully required of all citizens, there is no good reason why such an oath should not be taken, provided that all things be done (see 39th Article) 'in justice, judgment, and truth.' All false swearing is an abomination."

A curious case was recently decided in a Cincinnati court, Judge Woodruff presiding. A colored man named Tabbs Gross and a late slaveholding secessionist, Gen. Bethune of Georgia, contended for the keeping of "Blind Tom," a feeble-minded colored lad, who has been much celebrated throughout the country as a musical prodigy, though his talent, like his blindness, has been called in question. During the rebellion he was employed by the general, who owned the large family to which he belongs, in giving concerts for the benefit of Confederate regiments. He is now held by the same person on the strength of a contract with his parents, Mingo and Charity, approved by the local superintendent of freedmen, and binding him for a term of five years for a stipulated share in the profits of his performances. Gross, who has been showman of a panorama, had arranged with the general to join in the enterprise of exhibiting Tom, but by some means was afterwards rejected as a partner. He then applied for papers of guardianship in Indiana, on the ground that Tom was illegally restrained, and obtained a writ of habeas corpus, which came up before Judge Woodruff. Both parties to the controversy were evidently more concerned for their own interest than for Tom's, and Gross's counsel asked that Levi Coffin might be made a veritable guardian. The court decided that Gross had no legal claim on the boy, who seemed to have sufficient intellect to choose, and preferred to go with Bethune.

The remains of the late Bishop Potter of Pennsylvania are being brought home from California for interment. His career, and that of his brother, the Bishop of this State, furnish one of those rare phenomena on which the theory of the presence of talent in the blood is based. One is astonished, in watching the course even of the families which have won most distinction, to find how generally they owe it all to the achievements of one member in each generation. The spectacle of two or more brothers reaching the summit of their profession is even less frequently witnessed than that of a famous father followed by a famous son. Bishop Potter's claims to cordial remembrance and respect, however, are due even less to his labors in the Church, than to the valuable influence he exercised on the world by his opinions and teachings on the great questions of the day.

We find in the Times of this city an announcement that some of our wealthy citizens, who were incorporated last winter as the "Home Building Company," have begun to erect in Williamsburg, near the ferry, a block of twenty-four houses. These will be of brick, somewhat after the Philadelphia pattern as regards internal arrangements and accommodations, and will consist of two stories and a basement. Gas and water will be introduced. Twenty-five hundred dollars is the estimated cost of each house, which will be sold for this price to worthy applicants or rented at a simple interest on the outlay. The company will prosecute their undertaking further according to the results of this experiment. One of their number is abroad collecting plans of similar structures in the great European cities. We read in the London Times a report of the fourth half-yearly meeting of a company set on foot by Mr. Alderman Waterlow, to provide the working classes in the metropolis with suitable dwellings at easy rents. Lord Stanley, the chairman, presided. The capital amounts to only about £30,000, of which all but £6,000 has been expended in buying land and erecting buildings. The results have been very gratifying. Occupants have been found without difficulty, and from the returns thus far it was reckoned that a minimum dividend of five per cent. could be permanently relied on. Still, the need of greater capital was acknowledged, and the company thought they might fairly appeal to the public for contributions to an enterprise which had been proved to be commercially successful, as well as highly beneficial to the working classes.

We are enabled to compare the exhausting effects of the war upon North and South by a statement of Gov. Parsons of Alabama, that one hundred and twenty-two thousand men of that State were engaged in the service of the Confederacy, and that seventy thousand have perished or remain disabled. By the census of 1860, the entire number of white males in Alabama, between the ages of fifteen and fifty, was little more than a hundred and twenty-six thousand. Connecticut, with about the same population, sent only forty thousand men to the field, which was six thousand in excess of her quota. The military age, it should be remembered, is from eighteen to forty-five. Alabama had to rob the cradle and the grave.

Signs of the old contempt of human life are rife throughout the South. A mulatto woman, formerly the slave and mistress of a man living in the suburbs of Wilmington, North Carolina, abandoned his plantation for the city. He pursued her, ordered her to return, and on her refusal shot her dead. At Eastville, on the Eastern Shore of Virginia, a colored man was murdered, on the 31st ult., by two Confederate soldiers or by a citizen, as it is variously reported. The story of a slave made free by our army at Jonesboro', Tennessee, has just come to light. For attempting to escape to our lines, his master took him to a Confederate hospital and had his legs amputated above the ankles, with no subsequent dressing by the heartless surgeon who performed the operation. He survived, contrary to the expectation of his tormentors, and was cared for by some of his own people. The other day he dragged his mutilated limbs to the Freedmen's Bureau in Washington.

The call for a Democratic State Convention in Iowa includes "all persons opposed to striking the word 'white' from the article in our State constitution on the right of suffrage, and in favor of sustaining President Johnson in his plan of reconstruction." They do things differently in Massachusetts. The last Legislature passed an act prohibiting any distinction in places of amusement on account of color or race. Mr. Robert Heller, the magician, gave recently one of his exhibitions at Salem, and two colored citizens, either from a curiosity to witness his dexterous juggling or from the love of music, of which he is so distinguished a professor, applied for tickets in the usual way. Being refused admission, they complained to the authorities, and the agent was arrested next day in Newburyport. He pleaded ignorance of the law, said he had only followed the New York custom, and willingly paid the costs. Mr. Heller apologized handsomely, and sent free passes for his next entertainment to his prosecutors.

The colored people of Michigan recently held a State Convention, at which they discussed the elective franchise and common school education for themselves. The colored men of Virginia assembled in convention at Alexandria on the second. Their proceedings were marked by great decorum. On the third they adopted an address setting forth the grievances of the black people of the State, and asking for the right of suffrage with equality before the law. On Friday, they adopted a supplementary address, showing why they are entitled to all the privileges of freemen.

Was the Emancipation Proclamation legally operative and efficient the moment it was uttered? or, as many have maintained, only so fast and so far as our armies reached the slaves or the slaves our armies? Col. Charles Bentzoni, commanding at Helena, Arkansas, adopts the former view. In an order dated July 7, he notifies those employers who have restrained laborers of their liberty since January first, 1863, that they "will be required to pay them their back wages at the rate established" at Vicksburg, in March, 1864, by Adjutant-General Thomas. The provost-marshal will try all cases of non-compliance, and, after approval by the colonel commanding, enforce the payment. Certain of the freedmen in Virginia are said to have arrived at the same conclusion, and have requested Colonel Brown, of the Freedmen's Bureau at Richmond, to help them collect their claims for the labor of which they have been defrauded for more than two years past. Gen. Howard has been applied to for instructions. The doubt is not of the equity but of the expediency of the measure, yet we shall not be sorry for a verdict in favor of the Proclamation. A little logic in the matter of human rights would straighten wonderfully the affairs of the nation.

The counsel of Capt. Wertz, the infamous keeper of the Andersonville prison, now awaiting his trial at the hands of the Government, ask the public to suspend their judgment for a while. The wretch himself never suspended judgment when there might be a doubt on which side "the dead line" a Union prisoner was. He shot him for merely raising the doubt. "We protest," say these legal gentlemen, "against trying the Southern Confederacy in the person of Capt. Wertz." Will they tell us how that culprit is to be brought to justice? The Confederacy is a myth: its spirit resides in the flesh and bones of Wertz and Davis.

France is troubled by the vision of our troops in Texas and along the Rio Grande. Many here are disposed to magnify the chances of a collision with the Imperial forces, and many even to wish for such an occurrence. But the War Department has ordered Sheridan to disband all the white troops that he does not need, and meanwhile Gen. Grant is travelling for pleasure at the extremity of the continent—in New England and the Provinces.

There has been an engagement between the forces of Paraguay and her allied enemies. Corrientes was recaptured on the 25th of May by Gen. Paunero, with his Argentine brigade, assisted by the Brazilian fleet and some artillery and infantry of the same nation. The fighting was stubborn, and the losses relatively heavy on both sides. Reinforcements were telegraphed for by the Paraguayans, and the city was abandoned by its captors. Elsewhere Lopez seems to maintain his three army corps in their latest positions—at home on the Paraná, in the heart of Corrientes, and on the river Uruguay, threatening an invasion of the Brazilian province of Rio Grande. Altogether, the allies appear to outnumber the Paraguayans. It is reported that Presidents Lopez and Mitre will both take the field in person. We learn from Rio Janeiro that a bill opening the coasting trade to foreign vessels has passed both Chambers, but a bill for abolishing the holding of slaves by foreigners was negatived without discussion. The Lower House, by a large majority, has voted a subsidy to the steam line between Brazil and the United States.

News from the continent tells of heated weather in France, somewhat injuring the harvests. The chief theme of interest is the approaching pleasure trip of the combined iron-clad fleets of Albion and "La Belle." Austria has requested permission to join the armada, but without success. Probably Italy would have desired in that case to be represented. No doubt it would have been convenient to have an Austrian fleet in the North Sea, in case the wrangle with Prussia about the duchies had come to blows; at the same time Venice would have wished her oppressor a prosperous voyage to the bottom of the sea. The resolution of Spain to recognize the kingdom of Italy produced immense opposition to the O'Donnell cabinet, of course from the priesthood, who are busy in exciting popular discontent and intriguing at court. Nevertheless, the official recognition has gone forth and been received at Florence. All over Europe there are fears of an invasion of cholera from the south. There have been isolated cases from Naples to Birmingham.

We are promised a singular memorial of our late President from Rome. The National Committee, that secret organization which directs the Italian party under the shadow of the Papacy, is preparing to send to this country a fragment of the mound or wall of Servius Tullius, which dates back as far as 570 B.C., and whose vestiges may be seen in the gardens of Sallust. On this will be placed the following inscription in Latin: "To Abraham Lincoln, President of the American Union, the citizens of Rome have dedicated this stone from the wall of Servius Tullius, that the memory of these two valiant defenders of liberty may be associated together. A.D. 1865." The address to President Johnson which accompanies this relic establishes a parallel between the two characters whose names are thus conjoined:

"Servius Tullius resembled in many respects the great citizen whom America has just lost. This king admitted the people to all the rights of citizenship, distributed among them the territory of conquered nations, favored the laboring classes, instituted the census, facilitated for the slaves the purchase of their liberty, and made citizens of freedmen; in short, he gave order and unity to the Roman people, and, to accomplish this, had to contend against the ambition of the patricians, who regarded the common weal as personal detriment. Nevertheless, just as Servius would deserve to be called the second founder of Rome, since he changed her institutions to assure her future grandeur, so, to our minds, Abraham Lincoln is worthy to be known as the second founder of American grandeur and liberty, since, if the primary laws of the federation left open the wound of slavery, which in time might perhaps have annihilated the Union, the courageous President labored to cure this wound, and to keep all the members of the nation bound stoutly together.

"Lincoln fell beneath the knife of an assassin for having meant to abolish slavery, and maintain the unity of America. Servius Tullius was the victim of a parricide, seconded by the patricians who were opposed to the emancipation of the people. Both, therefore, at an interval of twenty-four centuries, essayed the same task and were smitten by the same malice; and therefore the Romans consecrate to the memory of Lincoln a souvenir of Servius Tullius."

According to an account in the Moniteur, there has been a rare discovery at Pompeii. They have laid bare a temple of Juno containing more than three hundred skeletons of women and children, whom the fiery ashes enveloped, perhaps in the midst of a sacrifice to the goddess, imploring her protection against the volcano. One skeleton, conjectured to be that of the chief priestess, was covered with rich jewels, and still held a golden censer, filled with calcined perfumes, attached to her arm by a ring of the same metal finely chased. The censer resembles in form those now in use in the Catholic Church, and is studded with beautiful stones. The eyes of the statue are of enamel, and it wears on its arms, ankles, and neck jewels and bracelets of precious stones, highly finished and of elegant shape. The peacock by its side is almost wholly of precious stones. The tripod before the altar is all gold, marvellously wrought. Lamps of bronze, silver, and gold were also found in the temple, carved with the foliage of trees and vines, combined with flowers and fruit. There is a mosaic pavement about the altar which is well preserved; that of the spot on which the sacrifices were made is of marble, and all the instruments for this purpose were found on a bronze table. The rest of the temple is flagged with white agate and purple bronze in triangles. The skeletons crumbled away on exposure.

It appears that M. Renan was at the bottom of the breach between the Mexican embassy and the Holy See. A hundred and fifty copies of his "Life of Jesus" arrived with other merchandize at Vera Cruz. The collector of the port applied to the Secretary of the Interior to know if the book should be admitted customs free or not. The Secretary referred the matter to the Empress, in the temporary absence of Maximilian, and she could not bring herself to refuse the admission of a book which circulates in every country of Europe. Her favorable decision incensed the clerical party in Mexico, and heightened the suddenness of the rupture with Rome. If the act complained of were not the pretext rather than the cause of the Pope's manœuvre, he might well withhold a concordat from the continent of Europe, which pays not the slightest heed to the books that he places on the "Index," and snaps its fingers at the Encyclical.

It may not be generally known that the Empress of the French is at the head of a committee for investigating the condition of the juvenile inmates of prisons and houses of correction. Already she has visited those in la Roquette, and the young girls of Saint-Lazare. In her desire to meliorate their lot, she would fain substitute for the present establishments large penitentaries located in the country. Strongly opposed herself to imprisonment in cells, she has just obtained a vote of the committee condemning it, though the division was so close that M. Emile Ollivier alone turned the balance in favor of humanity. The committee have no power to act in the premises, but their adoption of the views of Eugénie must aid her not a little in her appeal to the Emperor.

The old arsenal of St. Petersburg, after having been vainly put up at auction, has been converted into a court-house. Its immense chambers will become audience halls for the new tribunals whose proceedings, for a wonder in Russian jurisprudence, are to be open to the public. A large attendance is predicted, based on the experience of courts-martial, which have long been distinguished from the civil by their publicity, and on the novelty already remarked.

Garibaldi was asked to attend the ceremony of interring the bones of Dante at Ravenna. Unable to comply, he writes that the sacred trust of guarding these remains is an eternal protest against the Papacy. "The custodians of the sepulchre of Dante will therefore reject any conciliation with the butchers of Rome." Apropos of this subject, the city of Catana is determined to hold within its walls the body of the illustrious composer Bellini, who died and was buried in Paris in 1835. The municipal authorities intend to open a subscription throughout Italy to defray the expenses of transportation. One would think the dead might lie quieter in a region less subject to earthquakes, visited as this was by one as lately as the 16th of last month, to the destruction of life and property.

The appearance of a new journal in Paris—La Liberté—excites remark because of the difficulties of such an enterprise in the face of the virtual monopoly of the established presses. The editor, M. Charles Muller, is said to have begun by saluting liberal ideas. "This salutation," says a witty writer, "considering the 'warnings' of Damocles and the perils of the arena, is sometimes in danger of resembling that of the gladiators: Morituri te salutant!"

"The most celebrated representative of French eloquence," as M. Berryer is styled, was recently on the eve of being forced to relinquish his estate d'Augerville. Report had it that Lord Brougham had generously advanced the means to prevent this necessity; according to others, the Count Chambord. It is stated that arrangements with third parties, who have an interest in his affairs, have sufficed to secure the orator in his favorite retreat.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

THE NEWSPAPER AND THE READER.

THE immemorial usage which imposes or seems to impose on everybody who subscribes to a newly started periodical to forward his advice to the proper quarter as to the manner in which it should be conducted, has, we need hardly say, been faithfully observed in our case. The result is, that we have before us a large mass of material on this subject which we are unwilling to have entirely lost to the world. Much of it is very good and very sensible; much is incomprehensible, and much more sheer balderdash; but taken altogether, it affords a good survey of the mental condition of a portion of the community at this moment, which, though it would be an exaggeration to call accurate, is nevertheless worth studying.

We find that one large class objects to THE NATION on the ground that it requires them "to think;" and this is invariably spoken of as a great hardship, if not a positive fraud on the part of the publisher. Those who make this complaint have apparently not been in the habit of reading or talking at all except for amusement, and any demand on their reflective powers they look upon as a species of extortion. They want "light stories," "pleasing anecdotes," and would like to have all the great questions of the time disposed of in at most half a column, and apparently by somebody who has never troubled his head enough about them to have very much to say.

The glimpse we get of the feelings of this class on this subject gives one a tolerably fair idea of the influence of the daily press upon them, and, as far as we can judge, it seems to be very trifling. We have no difficulty in inferring that they never read the editorial articles, or at most only the first four or five lines, to get an idea of which side the writer is going to take; but we should judge that, if he shows signs of becoming argumentative or drawing distinctions, they drop him. We see the result, we believe, in the great development of the art of "paragraphing" in the daily press, in which the weightiest questions of morals and politics are settled in from three to five lines, or an opponent squelched by some pleasant though not very relevant observation on his appearance, his name, his place of birth, or what he said some place else, or what he will probably do if he gets full swing.

How large this class is it is impossible to say. If we were to believe our correspondents, we should conclude that it contains all American women and children and all business men. If this were an accurate statement, it would puzzle one to make out how a community can get along in which thinking is so carefully avoided by so large a proportion of it that it has become painful. It is not strictly correct, however, to say that they admit that there is no subject on which they have bestowed careful thought. There appears to be one on which they have profoundly deliberated, and in which they have, no doubt after a hard struggle, attained the absolute, and that is the best manner of conducting a weekly newspaper. The maturity of the views expressed on this topic, the intimate acquaintance displayed with the wants of the public and of the age, and the confidence with which judgment is pronounced as to the precise manner in which the great questions of the day should be treated in such a paper, prove that the writers really do not do themselves justice, and that they have thought, and do think, a good deal more than they would have us believe.

Still, after making all due allowance for exaggeration, it is impossible not to conclude that there is a much larger portion of the community than any one who is interested in its highest welfare would like to believe, who do deliberately cultivate both in themselves and in their children the habit of avoiding reflection, of trying to shoot all their game flying, and who are content if they knock off a few feathers, and who value above everything what is called "intelligence," that is, a very slight and imperfect acquaintance with a large number of things. When this is united, as it so often is in young men, with "the gift o' the gab," the consequences are sometimes awful. Now, if every man or woman would only for one year read any newspaper carefully enough even to differ with it, and know why, or to be amused or disgusted by it, we have no hesitation in saying that the effect would very soon be visible in the press itself, on the platform, and in the pulpit. The next generation would at all events be better educated, although we should rejoice in the possession of fewer persons competent to solve the greatest problems in political economy, international law, and moral philosophy, off hand. For there is nobody who fancies he knows so many things thoroughly as your man who refuses to think.

Another class—but this is a much smaller one—is of opinion that we should carefully avoid all comments on the acts or policy of the Government which are not of a laudatory character. They believe that inasmuch as the Government have all the facts before them, while editors have not, it is something like presumption for the newspaper to find fault with them. As one gentleman expressed it, "In the long run, a constitutional government will, in its proclamations, despatches, and papers of record, represent the most enlightened and sober sense of the land (i. e., without any criticism from the newspapers); and," he adds, "an editor stands at a great disadvantage, as the President and his advisers have to guide them a mass of facts which no editor can command." This remark reveals a state of mind so singular that we have reproduced it verbatim. As no constitutional government has ever existed without exposure to public criticism in one shape or other, we have no means of knowing how such a government would get on without this criticism. In all ages and countries, as soon as criticism by the public has been suppressed, the constitutional government has come rapidly to an end; and there could hardly be a better illustration of what one correspondent calls the general "laziness in thinking," than the failure of an educated American to perceive that the Government is enabled to embody "the enlightened sober sense of the land" in its acts solely because the course it ought or proposes to follow is the subject of constant debate on the part of the people on the platform and in the press.

It ought never to be forgotten, though it is now forgotten by a few persons, that a republic without a press is an impossibility, almost a contradiction in terms. The modern newspaper is the equivalent of the Greek agora, the only means possessed by the citizens of interchanging thought and concerting action, and Americans ought to be the last people in the world to talk of its uselessness. There is no country in which it is half so necessary.

"The facts" are not always before the public, it is true; but principles are; the experience of past ages is; and whenever any government shows itself forgetful of these things, it is the duty of every editor, as at least representing his readers, to remind it of them. Nor is it true that, even during the past war, the Government was always right and the press wrong. The press saw and pointed out, sooner than even Abraham Lincoln did, the intimate connection between the rebellion and slavery. He sought to separate them, failed, and acknowledged his mistake manfully. Moreover, the press preached that very policy of concentration by which the great victory was at last achieved, nearly two years before the Government saw fit to adopt it. And to come down still later, when it was proposed to try the assassins of the President in secret, the press protested against it, and the Government admitted its mistake, and—with that generally prompt and ready deference to public opinion which, and not its disregard of it, has, in our mind, during the last four years constituted its strongest claim on the national confidence and gratitude—tried them in public. Now, in this particular case, the facts were nothing, the principles everything. The experience of all nations, in all ages, has shown that no judge, however upright, or pure, or learned, is fit to try a fellow-creature for his life without having the eye of the world upon him; and it has shown, too, that one of the strongest guaranties of a witness's veracity is found in making him reveal himself and give his testimony publicly, so that if there is anybody to be found anywhere capable of impugning what he says, he may have the time and opportunity to come forward and do it. The Government might have had facts in this one case which the press had not, but the press had, however, the facts of a thousand similar cases, with the deductions from them of the wisest and ablest jurists and statesmen that ever lived. It would have been very absurd to halt between their judgment and that of either the Judge Advocate or Secretary of War, honest and able as we believe them to be.

If we thought that this feeling about the relations of the press to the Government was diffused through any but a very small portion of the public, we should certainly conclude that the languor which has in other countries preceded loss of liberty had set in in this. But it is very certain that except in a few localities, and amongst a few men, the old robust faith in the wisdom as well as of the force of public opinion, however expressed, in the superiority of principles to men, still lives and flourishes. There is indeed a kind of criticism of which the public is thoroughly tired. It is tired of blackguard abuse of high public officers; of the imputation of every official act to the foulest motives; of seeing official station regarded, not as a title to unusual respect and forbearance, but as depriving the holder of all the defences against ribaldry and slander by which private persons are surrounded. Of this Abraham Lincoln was made the victim, but the spectacle which the nation has enjoyed of seeing his worst revilers eating their own words after his death, has probably carried a lesson with it which will protect his successors for some time at least from similar treatment.

How this desire to exempt the Government from newspaper criticism, and to set aside the old maxim which makes vigilance so important a safeguard of liberty, has arisen amongst any portion of the community, is, we think, not difficult to explain. It is partly due to that feeling of excessive confidence in the Executive, and leaning to arbitrary measures, which is produced in every country, in the minds of some portion of its population, by great wars or great public dangers. People are so profoundly impressed by the risks they have run, that they very naturally feel profound confidence in the men who have brought them through them—a mental state which, in its exaggerated shape, throws popular government overboard, abuses congresses and parliaments in the Persigny style, as mere collections of "rhetoricians," and thinks the "chief of the state" "knows best."

It is partly due also to the fact, and it was a very unfortunate one, that there has during this war been no honest opposition for whose criticism the public had any respect. The main body of the opponents of the Government have been throughout persons who were notoriously in sympathy with the public enemy, and desired his success, and the struggle lasted just long enough to create in the public mind a not unnatural association between unfavorable criticism and downright treason. How great a misfortune this has been it is impossible as yet to tell; and how great a misfortune it might have proved had the war lasted longer, or our Executive been less upright, we can, of course, only conjecture from the experience of other countries.

Of one other thing our experience so far fully satisfies us. There is throughout the country an enthusiastic desire for an "independent" and "impartial" paper, which shall always take each reader's own side of every question. It is impossible for anybody who is not in constant contact with the public to understand how widely diffused this feeling is; and the bitterness of the complaints which come in, when it takes somebody else's side, are evidently due to a sort of vague impression that when a man subscribes for a newspaper or review the editor enters, by implication, into an agreement to supply him with his (the subscriber's) own opinions ready cooked. Now, that may be a true construction of the relation existing between a purely party "organ" and its readers, but there is another kind of journal, of which we seek to make The Nation, which supplies opinions to be weighed and examined, not swallowed, and which everybody is at perfect liberty to reject if they don't please him, it being well understood that their failure to give satisfaction is a good reason for further discussion but not for ill feeling.

WHY AND HOW.

A correspondent signing himself "L.," and whose opinions and even prejudices are worthy of respect and consideration, asks certain questions on another page, which, though not new, are entitled to answer.

He is evidently under the impression that the fact that in most of the free States the negro is either totally excluded from the franchise, or only enjoys it under restrictions which are not imposed on the whites, precludes or ought to preclude us here at the North from raising any agitation on the subject. But it does not; and for the simple reason that we are as much opposed to this inequality here as there, and are as anxious for its abolition. We think it is, as far as simple justice is concerned, just as great an outrage to disfranchise a man because his skin is black in Connecticut as in South Carolina, and a far greater scandal; and we hold it to be the duty of every man in the free States, while clamoring for the removal of this odious distinction at the South, to do what in him lies to procure its removal also if it exists in his own State. The one he is to do, and not to leave the other undone. The reason why we do not ask the President to interfere in the matter at the North is, that he has no power to do anything of the kind, and that he and we both know it. He has become possessed of that power in the Southern States by the simple fact that those States have risen in insurrection; that their own governments have been swept away by the storm of war, and that he has exercised, and is now exercising, and we believe rightly, in all those States, the authority of the commander of a victorious army on conquered soil. His emancipation of the blacks, his disfranchisement of the disloyal whites, his suspension of the civil tribunals, or disregard of their decisions, are all done in virtue of this authority; and the use of it is imposed on him by the most imperious necessity. He has to reorganize society at the South; somebody must do it, and he is the only person who has the power to do it. To contend that the national Government may overthrow the armed forces of a rebellion, but must, as soon as this is done, retire from the rebel territory, is to contend that it may win victories, but may not profit by them. Such a doctrine as this would convert the late war into useless butchery, and while allowing the republic the power to defend itself, would deny it the power to take any precautions for its safety. One of these powers never exists except in combination with the other. Had Connecticut lost her standing in the Union by the same acts as those of which South Carolina had been guilty, we should recommend her being reorganized by the same means. As she has not, politeness, as well as common sense and the Constitution, prohibits our troubling the President about her shortcomings.

"L." asks, "How can Pennsylvanians assume to force the inhabitants of South Carolina to grant the privilege of voting to masses of enfranchised slaves, embruted by generations of chattelism, when they refuse that privilege to the comparatively unimportant colored population of their own State, who for nearly a century have enjoyed the benefits of freedom and education?" The answer is, that those Pennsylvanians who are in favor of negro suffrage at the South do not ask South Carolina to do anything of the kind. What they do ask is, that "if ignorant and embruted men" are not fit to vote, the whites of that kind be excluded from the polls as well as the blacks; that if education, intelligence, and property, or good character, be deemed requisite in a voter, any man who can prove the possession of them, in the manner appointed by law, be permitted, no matter what the color of his skin, or from whom he may be descended, to come forward and vote; that, in short, an utterly irrational distinction, based on a barbarous and unchristian prejudice, be not allowed any longer to deprive any portion of the population of political rights. We confess we are puzzled by the persistence with which the ignorance and degradation of Southern negroes is brought forward in opposition to the agitation for negro suffrage. We do not ask, and never have asked, that ignorant negroes be enfranchised unless ignorant whites are. What we do ask is, that whenever they are disfranchised, ignorant white men be made to share the same fate.

We can go on a step further than this, however, and affirm that even if there was not one State at the North in which a colored man was allowed to vote, the North would still be justified in asking that all political distinctions based on color be abolished in the South. The total number of persons disfranchised under such a rule at the North would be, by the census of 1860, 237,218; the total number of those who are disfranchised by this rule at the South is 4,201,000. We count in for the sake of simplicity the whole colored population in each section. Now, looked at in the light of expediency, in the light of its effect on public security and tranquillity, on the administration of justice, or of the national unity, the disfranchisement of 200,000 people in a population of 19,000,000 is a small matter; looked at in this same light, the disfranchisement of 4,000,000 in a population of 12,000,000 is an immense matter—startling, momentous, full of danger; and it is still more startling and more dangerous when we remember that the barrier which separates them from civil rights is impassable, can never be surmounted either by genius or industry or good conduct. In all political questions numbers are the greatest of forces. Nobody can overlook or make light of them. The wrongs or disabilities of one man or a hundred men may smell as rank before heaven as the wrongs or disabilities of a million; but in the ear of any human lawgiver the cry of the million must always be the loudest and most impressive, because their griefs threaten the security of the state. Our naturalization laws, which convert every foreigner who lands into a citizen within five years of his arrival, and which now begin to exercise such marked and, as many think, prejudicial, influence on the elections, are, in our opinion, called for by the public safety. If there were but 200,000 foreigners in the country, their exclusion from a share in the Government would be of little consequence; as there are 5,000,000, and the number is increasing, it would threaten the very foundations of the Government. And we confess we do not know how any calm reader of history can sit down and contemplate with complacency the future of a democratic country in which one-third of the population is deprived of the rights of citizenship, by those who hate and have injured them, on account of a physical peculiarity.

The real solution of the question is, in our opinion, not "to be found in submitting it to the people in the shape of a constitutional amendment," for two reasons. The one is, that in the existing state of sentiment at the South, the passage of such an amendment would be very doubtful; the other is, that if it were passed, it would be by the aid of a Northern majority, and therefore everything done under it would be just as distasteful to the Southern whites, and have to be forced upon them by just the same means as if the work of the President and Congress alone. In other words, our opponents would not "acquiesce in the division with the readiness which distinguishes our people when a verdict is rendered by the tribunal of last appeal." We hear by every mail from the South that any attempt from any quarter to give votes to the negroes will be resisted to the death, and how "L.," with the events of the last five years fresh in his memory, can ask such a question, or expect an affirmative answer, we do not well see. No matter, in short, in which way the franchise may be conferred on the negro, his exercise of it will be resisted by his white neighbors, and will have to be protected by the military power of the Government for a while. That the whites will eventually reconcile themselves to this, as they are now reconciling themselves to his freedom, we do not doubt.

And we protest against the notion that, in asking the President to refuse in reorganizing the South to take any note of distinctions of color, we are asking anything novel or monstrous. There was not, at the time of the foundation of the Government, nor for long after, a single State in the South, except South Carolina, in which this distinction was recognized in the Constitution, in which the free black did not vote under the same restrictions, and no other, as the white. It is not very many years since color was made a disqualification in every part of the South, in compliance with the ever-rising and insatiable spirit of slavery propagandism. What we ask now is, that the South be forced, if need be, as a condition of her re-entrance into the Union, to retrace her steps, and act on the maxims which, in her earlier and better days, she deliberately adopted. We shall say little here of the obligations which the democratic principles we profess impose upon us, in the eyes of the world and of coming ages; nor yet of obligations we have incurred to the negro for his conduct during the war, because these are considerations which, powerful as we believe them to be, the singularly confusing influence of the negro's color on the judgment of most of our opponents prevents their recognizing.

But nothing is more certain than that, if, after having called the negroes to arms, and used their blood freely in carrying on the war, we now relegate them even to political subjection to our enemies, and their old oppressors, without exacting a single guarantee for their elevation, it will be recorded in history as one of the strangest breaches of faith ever committed. And last of all we ask "L." to consider calmly the following calculation drawn by Mr. George S. Boutwell in a recent speech:

"If these nine millions of people in the South are to elect ninety representatives, they will elect one for every one hundred thousand white persons represented by the voting population; while in the North it will take one hundred and fifty thousand persons to constitute the basis of representation; that is, two voters in the South will have equal power in the government of the country with three voters in the North. I submit that the people of the North, unless they are infatuated, so that there is no hope of their being able to comprehend the means necessary for their own salvation, will reject—once, twice, thrice, continually reject—every proposition which recognizes those States as States of the American Union. One of two things must happen—either that the negro shall be allowed to vote, or that, by an amendment to the Constitution, the representative power shall be based upon voters; and if, as is contended by those who oppose negro suffrage, these eleven States are States in the Union, as it requires three-fourths of the States to make an amendment to the Constitution, and as the eleven States are more than one-fourth, and are interested in the maintenance of the present condition of things, there is no hope of an amendment of the Constitution."

WESTBURY'S WOES.

British politics have been enlivened by an event that belongs to the Chronique Scandaleuse. The Lord High Chancellor of England, Baron Westbury, the man who had his sovereign's conscience in charge, was so far from being himself conscientious, that he pursued a line of conduct that led the British House of Commons to censure him by a direct vote, which compelled him to give up his great place under circumstances of the most humiliating nature. Never since Lord Macclesfield was punished in 1725, has such a proceeding outraged the respectability of Britain. The greatest of English chancellors, Francis Bacon, confessed that he was guilty of corruption, and was punished. Most English chancellors, after Bacon's fall, were honorable men, or not behind the morality of their times. Clarendon did some things that would not be tolerated now, and Shaftesbury was the reverse of a saint; but neither of these renowned politicians could be called a corrupt man, regard being had for the dissolute age in which they held office. James II. outraged decency by making Jeffreys chancellor, for Jeffreys was the most corrupt as well as the most cruel of mankind, and his punishment, terrible though it was, was hardly equal to his crimes. After the Revolution of 1688, English chancellors were as much improved as English judges of the law courts. Somers, Cowper, and Harcourt were great men, and sat worthily on the woolsack. Macclesfield did not want for talent, but he had a very imperfect conception of his duties. The Court of Chancery became a sink of iniquity while he was at the head of it; and not only suitors' money, "but the estates of widows and orphans, became a source of private peculation." The outcry was great, and he resigned the Great Seal; but that did not save him. He was impeached, and after a trial that lasted twenty days, the House of Lords unanimously pronounced him guilty. He was fined £30,000. "The unanimity of his judges," says Earl Stanhope, "might seem decisive as to his guilt; yet it may, perhaps, be doubted whether they did not unjustly heap the faults of the system on one man; whether he had not rather, in fact, failed to check gradual and growing abuses than introduced them by his authority or encouraged them by his example." Even if this were so, the judge who tolerates and permits the increase of corruption deserves the severest punishment. That others do not reform a bad system, is no reason that the chief of that system should countenance its growth in wickedness.

After Macclesfield's punishment, English chancellors kept as clear from corruption as men well could. Some of them certainly were men of strange habits. Lord Northington, who held more than one high office, was qualified to stand as "the awful example" to a temperance lecturer. Horace Walpole, writing in 1766, says: "The Chancellor [Northington] is President of the Council, in the room of Lord Winchelsea, with a pension of £4,000 a year into the bargain. I neither approve the pension nor the person, for he is never sober after dinner, and causes are only heard before the council in the afternoon." Mentioning that he went to balls, Horace adds, "but I believe had rather go to the alehouse." He calls him "the old drunken uncle;" and, alluding to the presidency of the Council, observes: "It is a drunken place by prescription; Lord Granville had it, and Lord Northington has." Such was the royal conscience-keeper a hundred years ago, and it is not strange that George III.'s conscience permitted him to do so many wicked things, if Northington had any weight with him. Lord Thurlow was as bad a man as lived even in those times, and would swear like a whole troop of horse, and did swear on most days of his life. He would not marry, but had several illegitimate children, which was not exactly the correct thing in the man who was bound to keep the monarch in the path of moral duty. Wedderburne was a thorough rogue; and when George III. heard of his death, he declared that he had not left a greater rascal behind him in his dominions—a speech that Thurlow quoted as showing that the king was not insane. Yet neither Thurlow nor Wedderburne ever was suspected of official corruption. Eldon was a hard drinker, but Northington would probably have pronounced him a milksop; and some of his political actions indicate a degree of immorality that contrasts strongly with his perpetual appeals to heaven, by which he "wore out his accountability." Erskine, Lyndhurst, Brougham, Cottenham, and Cranworth were "all honorable men" as chancellors; nor had any chancellor been denounced for corruption for 140 years until the charge was brought against Lord Westbury, and he appears to have been rather careless than corrupt, less rapacious than reckless. Had he given ordinary attention to the matters that he was engaged upon when he blundered, he would never have got into the scrape which has ruined him. Perhaps his fall is due to a sort of contempt that he has for the opinion of other men, which led him to suppose—if he thought at all on the subject—that there was no power that could shake him from the woolsack. And it is possible that the business might have been smoothed over and hushed up, had it been aired in the first year of the Parliament, and not in the last year—had it been brought forth just after an election in which the Ministry had triumphed, and not just before an election, the event of which was considered somewhat doubtful. The Tories took up the matter as a part of their stock in trade, and made political capital of it. They, being in opposition, wished to exchange places with the Liberals. They sought to get out of the shade and into the sun. Knowing how sensitive their countrymen are on the subject of judicial purity, they thought it would pay to convict the Whigs of supporting the highest of all law officers after it had become notorious that he had, to put it mildly, been guilty of carelessness that warranted suspicion of corruption. So they pushed the matter to a parliamentary censure, and succeeded. Yet it may be believed that they erred, and that they injured their cause by the very course that they adopted in the hope of promoting it. Lord Westbury had done enough to show that he was unfit to be chancellor, but it was impossible to make it appear that any party was to blame but himself; and therefore the Tories had the discredit of stirring a scandal, for factious purposes, that all good Englishmen would have put out of sight and hearing. That has been made palpable and patent which might have been left in the dark. The nation is satisfied with the action of the House of Commons, which has ousted the sole offending minister, and it refuses to hold the Ministry responsible for that which it could have done much to prevent. The chancellor tendered his resignation months ago, but the Premier preferred not to accept it, and his decision, though it is now easy to see that it was wrong, was right at that time. Much that was known when the Commons expressed its condemnation of Lord Westbury's conduct, was unknown last February, and Lord Palmerston felt that he was bound to stand by his associate until something definite should be established against him. Cambacérés said to Napoleon that the case of Robespierre was decided without having been heard; but though it may have been right in the French Convention to get rid of "the sea-green incorruptible" on any terms, such a course of proceeding does not become an established government, which has time for enquiry, and which cannot afford to run the risk of doing that which might prove to be unjust.

KILLING NO MURDER.

The doctrine of Woman's Rights has shown a new phase within the last week or two. It has extended its domain materially, and vindicated a fresh prerogative for the fairer part of creation. A Washington court and jury have decreed that a maiden, if she be but young and fair, whose young affections have been trifled with, may take justice into her own hands, and put to death the fickle swain who dared to be false to her charms. The verdict is substantially that of the Irish "crowner's quest," which sat on the old woman who undertook to run across a race-course just before the start, and then and there finished her own career, "Sarved him right!" It was at worst but an amiable weakness, a pardonable eccentricity. It was only "pretty Fanny's way." The gallant burgesses of Washington were too polite to think of making the fair Miss Harris exchange a lace collar for one of hemp around her lovely neck for this slight exaggeration in her notions of the feminine proprieties. So she was discharged from the bar, amid the joyous shouts of the spectators, with no severer punishment for having slain a man and made a widow than that of being kissed in open court by her senior counsel. How far the demands of justice may have been satisfied by this expiatory penance, we cannot pronounce with authority, having no personal knowledge of the parties in question.

A philosopher for whom we have a great respect has pronounced with authority that it is the duty of every woman to be handsome. We would improve upon the dictum by affirming that she ought also to be young. The force of these definitions of moral duty is illustrated signally in this shining example. Had it been young Burroughs who had shot Mary Harris under precisely the same circumstances, does any one doubt that the pretence of insanity would have been laughed out of court, and he subjected to the extreme penalty of the law? Or had it been a scraggy old maid who executed vengeance on a bulky bachelor, or stooping widower, would the hearts of the Washington panel have yearned towards her as they did towards the young and pretty Mary? We trow—not. It was the virtuous power of youth and good looks that saved that enterprising young person's neck, in our opinion. We are not sorry that she escaped the gallows. Voltaire says that the worst use a man can be put to is to hang him, and there are certainly many better uses to which a pretty young woman can be applied. But we think criminal justice should be done without regard either to fear or favor. Let us glance at the case. A young man has a flirtation with a young woman—nay, more, a serious attachment to her. He promises marriage. He changes his mind, and marries some one else. He was wrong not to have known his own mind better; but not wrong in refusing to marry the woman he had ceased to love. To have married her would have been the real injury under the circumstances. There is no pretence that he had injured his first love, otherwise than in her affections. The attempt to prove that he had entertained base designs against her broke down signally. The forsaken fair pursues her fickle lover to Washington, and shoots him in open day. The fact, and the deliberate purpose, were as well proved as evidence can show anything. Because she had shown signs of the strong emotion and deep passion that nerved her hand to this deed of blood, the disbursers of justice at Washington hold her not responsible for what she did! A murderess then is safe in those latitudes, unless she can approach her victim and complete her crime with the sweet tranquillity with which she would ask for a cup of tea or cheapen a yard of ribbon!

It is fearful to contemplate what may be the social consequences of this legal precedent, if its binding force should be generally accepted. Young ladies would be erected into an even more formidable power in American society than they now are, should they be thus armed with the power of life and death to compel flirtation to take the shape of betrothal, and betrothal that of matrimony. They would no longer have to depend on the hostile interference of hirsute brothers to oblige a backward lover to declare what his intentions may be. A dainty, jewelled revolver may become an essential part of full dress or demi-toilette, the knowledge of the neighborhood of which, loaded and capped, would have a wholesome effect in restraining lady-killers from prosecuting their designs on youthful female hearts. When it is understood that young ladies may be killing not merely in poetic metaphor, but in good set earnest, the knowledge must have a controlling influence over the intercourse of society. For there is no knowing to what a point of indulgence the tenderness of judges and juries towards the sex may carry them. It may come to be ruled that it is justifiable homicide to put to death a delinquent partner, or one of those awkward wretches who are the terror of every well constituted "German." Some of these latter offenders, we can tell them, would have a very brief expectation of life, should the leniency of the law be extended so as to expose them to the outraged sense of justice of the damsels they have provoked by their saltatory misdemeanors. In the matter of matrimony, at least, such a construction of criminal law would bring many matches to a hymeneal flame that now end only in smoke. There would hardly ever be a "flash in the pan," when it was known that a percussion lock was close by, and a little white hand that knew how to use it. As far as the supply of marriageable men went, such law might cure the inequality between the sexes which Governor Andrew lamented to his Legislature last winter. But then it cannot be denied that it might have the effect of making the game shy, so as to keep itself out of the range of the fair markswomen.

Such a termination as rounded the Harris trial is not without its ridiculous side certainly, but it has a very serious one as well. Washington courts and juries have not won for themselves a very honorable name for their mode of administering criminal justice. The acquittal of the California Congressman (we forget the wretch's name) who shot a waiter for not getting him his breakfast, and that of another homicide (whose name we all remember), in spite of evidence which would have insured conviction and execution in any other country and in any northern portion of this, have not left a good odor about the courts of the metropolis. And this one will not improve its savor. They furnish the Government with a perfect justification for their course in trying the conspirators against Mr. Lincoln by a military commission, and will do so should they subject Davis and his accomplices in murder and treason to the same trustworthy ordeal. We do not believe that the conviction of a single culprit connected with the assassination or the rebellion could be had in that or any Southern city by the ordinary tribunals. The general mind there has been so depraved and besotted by slavery that the judicial condition of mind, superior to all the solicitations of prejudice and influence, essential to criminal justice, is all but impossible. It is one of the blessings which the abolition of slavery that has crowned the war is to bestow on Southern society, that it will make the administration of civil and criminal justice without fear or favor a possibility;—a blessing which will be forced upon it in its own despite.

HASTE MAKES WASTE.

For suggesting, in our first issue, that there were sound reasons for delaying reconstruction at the South until we were better acquainted with the materials for this business and the chances of success, we elicited the satire of some of our contemporaries. We asked then if the Executive could not have waited profitably to learn the present capacity of the Southern people for self-government, especially under the conditions of loyalty and republican liberty. We were told that such an enquiry would exhaust the patience and the years of this generation. But nobody could pretend that it did not logically precede any effort towards restoring the States. Scarcely had the President appointed his last Provisional Governor, preferring to involve all the States in the fate of his experiment rather than to be guided as to the rest by the example of one or two, when he dispatched Gen. Schurz to make a tour of the South, and collect the very information which was needed at the outset. In fact, the General's observations will have weight not so much at the White House as at the Capitol, and he is not the only investigator whose report will affect the action of the new Congress. The Chief-Justice has visited the circumference of the late Confederacy with a view to examining the districts which are to fall under his jurisdiction, and obtaining some guidance for his decisions. Mr. John Covode, also, will have something to communicate in December, particularly in relation to Louisiana and the Gulf. Still more systematically and statistically the Assistant Commissioners of the Freedmen's Bureau are furnishing, and will continue to furnish, the knowledge which is so desirable. And lastly, the correspondents of the Northern press are daily enabling Government and people to understand the true relations of parties and classes at the South, and the actual workings of the policy now in force.

We have, we trust, little of that spirit which would sooner be able to say, "I told you so," than to see its predictions of evil unfulfilled. Not boastfully but regretfully we contend that the political reorganization of the South is justifying all our fears and our entreaties for delay. In Virginia it is shown to be eminently premature. There is an election at Norfolk, inaugurated with riots against the negro and carried by the suffrages of rebels. The military, who withdrew in favor of the civil rule, march back again and turn out the police. There is an election at Portsmouth, and Gen. Mann claps the mayor under arrest. There is an election at Richmond, and Gen. Turner reverses it in toto. We submit that the work of reconstruction has not made much progress in the Old Dominion. The frog in the well who falls back two feet for every three that he climbs up, has a not less lively prospect of reaching the top. We are encouraged, it is true, by the manifest determination of the President not to suffer the fruits of the war and the purposes of the nation to be swamped by a reaction in the mastered territory. But meanwhile what becomes of the system he has been at such pains to establish? and what, for example, is the exact value of Gov. Francis Peirpont to Virginia? A more ludicrous and helpless figure it would be difficult to imagine.

The instance just now cited is not the only indication that the President's haste has outstripped his discretion. Tennessee is palpably in a sorry plight. North Carolina is fast gravitating towards the political preponderance of the leading secessionists. The privilege of pardon itself is used for this very end, since only those who have obtained pardon can be candidates for office. There, as in Virginia, oaths are valued at precisely the cost of the stamp which is affixed to them—five cents in currency. And the opposition to emancipation is outspoken and insolent. Take a single day's bulletin from Raleigh as we find it in the morning papers:

"The Hon. William A. Graham, ex-member of the rebel Senate, and the political leader of this State, who is to be a delegate to the coming State Convention, says that under no circumstances will he consent to the return of North Carolina into the Union if the negro suffrage question is made a condition.

"J. H. P. Russ, of this city, who has recently received a Federal appointment, and who has been designated to represent this district in Congress and also in the approaching State Convention, defines his position on the slavery question by saying that if he had the power he would re-enslave every slave who is now free.

"Some of the county meetings which have nominated rebel leaders as candidates to the State Convention, instruct them to favor by constitutional or legislative enactments the binding out of liberated slaves to their former masters for a term of years.

"This is the material already designated to represent North Carolina in her Convention and also in Congress."

The very best witness we could summon against the Government would be itself. Without having the courage to proclaim the abrogation of the black code at the South, it is everywhere erecting special military tribunals before which the colored man and the white stand on exactly the same footing in all respects. Does any one ask the reason? Let the case which we noted last week as pending in Mississippi answer. It shows that the blacks are not secure of their lives, let alone their rights, if they have to trust to the civil courts alone. A planter, it will be remembered, shot a colored laborer in his cotton field for no greater cause than a respectful contradiction. Two weeks were allowed the civil authorities of Washington County, appointed by Gov. Sharkey, to take cognizance of the affair. At the end of that time Col. Thomas, Assistant Commissioner of the Freedmen, arrested the murderer Jackson, to await a trial by military commission. On a writ of habeas corpus being sued out, Col. Thomas telegraphed to Washington for instructions, the sheriff and his posse meanwhile making an ineffectual attempt to rescue the prisoner. The President sustained the Commissioner, and once more the laws were silent. Now we are asked to believe that a people which is not fit to execute justice within its own domain, is fit to legislate for its courts, and quite prepared to assist in making laws for the nation. It is useless any longer to beseech the President to stay his hand, for he has achieved what he undertook. We do urge all good citizens, as we shall the coming Congress, to postpone the recognition of these States, and to continue the military régime, till loyalists of whatever color are ensured supremacy and safety.

QUALIFY AND QUALIFICATION.

We publish elsewhere an able criticism on our recent article on "Republics and Equality." In that article we argued the question with reference to slavery, simply because we were thus enabled to argue it à fortiori. To maintain, as "A." does, that the Declaration of Independence, when it affirmed that "all men were born free and equal," and were entitled "to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," only meant citizens and did not include slaves, in our opinion renders it valueless for the very purpose for which he cites it—as a key to the Constitution. If these phrases did not affirm every human being's title to his own person and the wages of his labor, we do not believe that any known rule of construction will extract from them an assertion of every man's claim to vote, without regard to his color. That Declaration does not say that all "citizens" are born free and equal, but "all men;" and it was not addressed to American lawyers, to whom the distinction between men who were citizens and men who were "chattels" was familiar; but to the civilized world, who knew nothing concerning it.

That the Declaration of Independence was unfortunately not considered a guide by the framers of the Constitution, we are warranted in inferring both by the history of the time and by the fact that the Constitution recognized slavery, against which the Declaration of Independence was in words as solemn a protest as was ever uttered. That a "republican form of government" was not used by them in the sense now sought to be placed upon it, we conclude from the fact that South Carolina was admitted to the Union with the very clause in her constitution, which it is now maintained she has no right under the Constitution to keep there, excluding all but white freeholders from the franchise; and that thirty years later Connecticut inserted the very same clause in her constitution, so far as we know without any opposition on this ground from any quarter.

Probably no one exercised as much influence on the political thought of the last century, amongst the best class of minds, as Montesquieu. He was the first writer in the modern world who attempted to introduce accuracy and definiteness into political nomenclature, or to apply the historical method to the study of political philosophy; and there was probably no author with whose works the founders of the Government were more familiar. He defines a republic as "that in which the body or only a part of the people is possessed of the supreme power;" and adds that "when the body of the people are possessed of a supreme power, that is called a democracy; when the supreme power is lodged in the hands of a part of the people, it is then an aristocracy." What the historical testimony all goes to show is, that the framers of the Constitution believed that these two kinds of republic could exist together in the same federation, or that they would perhaps become assimilated in the natural course of events. We have found out that they were mistaken, and we propose so far to revolutionize the government as to make the whole body of the nation democratic. Where "A." differs from The Nation is as to the means of accomplishing this. He thinks it best to apply to the Supreme Court to meet the emergency, by calling on the various States to conform to what the judges may pronounce, in defiance of the historical argument, to be the "spirit of the Constitution." We for our part think the Supreme Court entirely unfit to be entrusted with any such task; we think appeals of this kind to it, at such crises as the present, are, if it responds to them, full of danger as precedents. We have already had one specimen of its legislation, and we never desire to see another. The President and Congress can do the work, in our opinion, far more effectually, and with far less shock to the body politic. "A." has, however, the consolation of knowing that no hostile criticism of his plan will be likely to impede its execution. At the same time, if he intends to rely on the Supreme Court alone, no amount of popular agitation will, or at least ought to, help him.

Correspondence.

THE SUPREME COURT AND NEGRO SUFFRAGE.

Boston, July 30, 1865.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Upon page 101, in No. 4 of The Nation, appears an article upon Republics and Equality, in which it is argued that any attempt to secure equal rights to the colored citizens of the South under the clause in the Constitution which guarantees to every State a republican form of government, is inexpedient if not impracticable, and at any rate inconsistent with the acknowledged meaning of the word republican.

One-half of the article is upon the thesis that there is nothing in a republican polity that necessarily excludes slavery. Slavery being dead, if not absolutely abolished, we may practically admit this. No one now proposes to attempt the abolition of slavery under the clause in the Constitution. What is proposed is to secure to the colored people who were slaves, but who are now citizens, the equal rights as citizens to which they are entitled, unless both the letter and the spirit of the Declaration of Independence are to be ignored.

We are told by the writer of the article in question that justice and necessity require equal rights before the law for the colored citizens of the South, and that they are to be secured to them, not by a strict interpretation of the letter of the organic law, or by an interpretation not heretofore given, but because the safety of the nation requires such equality as security for its own existence, and for that reason President Johnson has the same power to require the right of suffrage for colored citizens that President Lincoln had to abolish slavery. This is very true; but slavery was abolished under the war power held by the President as commander-in-chief, no one else can exercise this power, and President Johnson may not see fit to exercise it to secure equal rights. Are we then to give up the whole case?

Shall we not rather look to the spirit of the Constitution—to the letter of the organic law, and see if we have not our remedy?—a remedy which, if there found, can be availed of at once, without waiting the slow and possibly uncertain action of Congress. May we not find in the clause guaranteeing a republican form of government, taken in connection with the clause by which the several States are allowed to prescribe the qualifications of voters, a latent power to meet the case which has not been found before, simply because no case has ever been brought before the Supreme Court to procure a decision upon the meaning of these clauses?

This guaranty means something, else it would not be in the Constitution. We cannot find its true meaning in the history of any, or all, preceding republics, nor can we find it in any decision of our courts yet given. Because it has lain dormant for so many years is no reason that it contains no vital force: we must seek to give it life and action by the inspiration of the idea by which the nation lives and has its being. For the very reason that other republics have varied so much from each other, we are bound to seek for the special republican form of government intended by the framers of the Constitution in the idea upon which the nation is founded, of which the Constitution is but the exposition—and that idea is the declaration of equal rights before the law contained in the Declaration of Independence.

Equal rights for whom? Not for the slaves; they were chattels (the framers of the Constitution were so far untrue to their idea as to admit that men could be chattels and not citizens), but equal rights for all citizens without distinction of color.

In the Constitution there is no mention of color, and in the majority of the States which elected the members of the Convention that framed the Constitution there were colored men, not chattels but citizens, who voted for the members of the Convention. They were part and parcel of the people who ordained that "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Did these colored men—citizens, voters—intend to establish justice for whites only? to promote the general welfare of whites only? and to secure the blessings of liberty, not for their children and their posterity, but for the children of others?

Now if the idea of which the Constitution is but the exposition is clearly that all citizens, if not all chattels, are entitled to equal rights, there is in that idea a limit to the power of any State to impose qualifications upon such citizens as the condition of the franchise.

Qualifications may be imposed, but they must be equal in their bearing upon all citizens. They may be sex, age, property, or ability to read and write, because all these are qualifications which bear on all alike. They are equally a barrier to the white or the black woman. They are equally within the power of all male citizens, white or black, to attain or to acquire.

But color is not a qualification, it is a quality which the citizen cannot change; it is an absolute barrier to some, of no effect to others; it is unequal, and therefore not in harmony with the fundamental idea of the nation, and therefore unconstitutional.

The use of the word qualification in the Constitution, if considered in the light of the idea of equal rights, implies ability to qualify; and if a passive quality is included among the requirements of any State, it cannot be admitted, because no man can qualify himself to vote by changing the quality of his skin.

Because the framers of the Constitution temporized and compromised with the sin of slavery, and admitted in their organic law that men could be chattels personal; because they did enact that chattels had not equal rights with citizens, it does not follow that they admitted that one class of citizens could have rights not attainable by another class of citizens.

They believed that slavery would soon cease; and while recognizing its temporary existence, they framed their organic law to secure equal rights to all after slavery should have ceased. They so framed the law that for this even the letter should need no change.

Slavery has lived long, but is dead at last. The time has come to which our forefathers looked—for which they built. Their foundation was laid upon a rock; they builded well; the key-stone of their arch of triumph was equality. They left a rough scaffold, thinking that the cement was not firm set. The scaffold has stood until now, marring the beauty of the structure and poisoning the air with its decay. It is destroyed, and the arch stands revealed in its perfect proportion. No new keystone is needed. A.

PLAIN QUESTIONS.

PHILADELPHIA, July 24, 1865.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

GENTLEMEN: Observing that you invite free discussion on all national topics, and believing that your object is to arrive at a correct solution of the various perplexing questions which are involved in the re-adjustment of our political machinery, I take the liberty of asking you to relieve some of the doubts which assail me whenever I endeavor to determine for myself the position which I should hold on the subject of negro suffrage. The opinions and convictions of an individual, however conscientious, are of course of the smallest possible importance, but I think I represent a class whose aggregate may not be without weight in the closely contested elections which are to be foreseen in the near future. I mean the class of men who have surrendered, or are ready to surrender, the ancestral prejudices concerning the negro inseparable from his enslaved condition; who are neither negrophilists nor negrophobists; and who will support, with more or less energy, any measure, however radical, which they can persuade themselves to be right and expedient. Presuming that there are enough of such men, not yet convinced but yet open to conviction, to be worth the trouble of converting, I would respectfully ask of you to reply to one or two questions.

In how many States of the North does the negro enjoy an equality of suffrage with the white man? In how many has he the elective franchise under discriminating restrictions? In how many is the ballot-box absolutely closed to him? How can we, for instance, citizens of the great State of Pennsylvania, which set the example of emancipation, assume to force the inhabitants of South Carolina to grant the privilege of voting to masses of enfranchised slaves, embruted by generations of chattelism, when we refuse that privilege to the comparatively unimportant colored population of our own State, who for nearly a century have enjoyed the benefits of freedom and education, and who are as well qualified to discriminate between candidates and policies as a large portion of our white voters? This, I confess, is a point which I cannot conscientiously either evade or determine in favor of the Southern negro.

Again, is not the real solution of the question to be found in submitting it to the people in the form of a constitutional amendment? From my somewhat limited sphere of observation, I should conclude that President Johnson has the vast majority of the public with him in declining to interfere with State autonomy in this respect, and the arguments, logical and otherwise, concerning the war power and the salus populi suprema lex esto, I fear, are thrown away upon a perverse generation. And yet the question has got to be decided, and, what is more, we of the North must have a voice in the decision if we wish to secure the advantages which we have won with our bow and spear, and to protect the unfortunate freedman from a slow and relentless persecution, which in the end may prove worse than slavery itself. Therefore, I would ask you whether the result, which we all have at heart, will not come more satisfactorily from an amendment to the Constitution, which shall prescribe for the whole country the exact status of the negro, and shall admit him to the ballot-box under such restrictions as to education or property as shall seem best adapted to train him for the duties of the citizen, by stimulating his intelligence, thrift, and self-reliance, rather than from an exercise of temporary power, which so large a proportion of the people regard as of doubtful authority? If such an amendment could not be carried, would it not show that the public is not prepared for the change, and would not sustain it if made by the Executive? If it were carried, would not its opponents acquiesce in the decision with the readiness which distinguishes our people when a verdict is rendered by the tribunal of last appeal? And would not a settlement made in this manner be regarded as a finality, to which our local institutions would speedily be made to conform; while an arbitrary decision in favor of the negro would be looked upon as a matter to be set aside at the first turn of the political wheel, and meanwhile to be resisted and evaded—to be reduced, in fact, almost to a nullity while awaiting impatiently its formal appeal? And, finally, would not this recognition of the negro in the organic law of the land do more to elevate him as a member of the body politic than any other possible measure or device?

But I find that my questions are assuming a form rather argumentative than inquisitive, and as my object is not to ventilate my own opinions, but to elicit your views on points which I have not yet seen properly discussed, I will not further intrude upon your space.

Trusting that you will recognize my enquiries to be those of an earnest seeker for the right, I have the honor to remain

Your obedient servant, L.

MR. BARNUM ON MUSEUMS.

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., July 29, 1865.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

"THE NATION" is just the journal our "nation" needed, and it delights thousands besides my humble self. But the article on "Museums" in the last number exhibits a little of the slashing style of the London Saturday Review, or else I am blinded by my prejudices or interests.

I am not thin-skinned, and I know my Museum was not so refined or classic or scientifically arranged as the foreign governmental institutions, for mine had to support my family, while those require annually from the government thousands of pounds. "That class for which it [my Museum] would seem to have been originally intended" would not support a proper museum pecuniarily. More's the pity—but such is the stern fact. Hence, to make it self-supporting, I was obliged to popularize it, and while I still held on to the "million of curiosities," millions of persons were only induced to see them because, at the same time, they could see whales, giants, dwarfs, Albinoes, dog shows, et cetera. But it is a great error to state that I ever permitted "vulgar sensation dramas." No vulgar word or gesture, and not a profane expression, was ever allowed on my stage! Even in Shakespeare's plays, I unflinchingly and invariably cut out vulgarity and profanity. It is equally incorrect that "respectable citizens did not take their wives and daughters" "to see a play on that stage." Your writer doubtless supposed he was stating facts, but let him enquire, and he will find that nothing could be further from the truth. I am sensitive on these points, because I was always extremely squeamish in my determination to allow nothing objectionable on my stage.

I permitted no intoxicating liquors in the Museum. I would not even allow my visitors to "go out to drink" and return again without paying the second time, and this reconciled them to the "ice-water" which was always profuse and free on each floor of the Museum. I could not personally or by proxy examine into the character of every visitor, but I continually had half a score of detectives dressed in plain clothes, who incontinently turned into the street every person of either sex whose actions indicated loose habits. My interest even depended upon my keeping a good reputation for my Museum, and I did it to a greater degree than one out of ten could attain who had charge of a free museum, or even a free picture gallery. Now, I beg of you to submit the above to the writer of the article in question, and ask him, as an act of justice, to set me right before the public. Humbug with me has had its day, and although I always gave the money's worth of that which was not demoralizing, I often grieved that the taste of the million was not elevated. But now, having made my "million" nearly twice told, I really aspire to do a good and great thing, and I ask hereby the aid of you and your writer in accomplishing it. Listen:

If I build another museum—1st, It will be fire-proof; 2d, It will be almost infinitely superior in its collections and its classifications and accommodations to the old one; 3d, When I build a new American Museum, I shall also erect a large wing, or an additional adjacent building, the contents of which shall form and be a Free National Museum. There I will place classified specimens of natural history, paintings, statuary, armor (especially that worn by historical personages), old weapons of war, musical instruments, costumes and furniture of the middle ages, and a thousand other useful and novel features which will be an honor to our country. Here, too, will be placed all free contributions of novelties from everybody, including missionaries, ship-owners, foreign persons of distinction, and foreign museums. The Smithsonian Institution can loan its duplicates, the Patent Office, War and Navy Departments can lend their trophies, models, etc., gentlemen can loan their statuary and other objects, and myself, my heirs or assigns, shall always exhibit the whole free (I paying expenses by means of rent of stores and out of my own pocket), and whenever we fail to do so, every article not loaned by individuals to the Free Museum is vested in the general Government, and may be removed to a suitable building in Central Park or elsewhere. Indeed, if my paying Museum prospers as I expect, myself or heirs will eventually erect and present to the public the land and a proper building containing these curiosities, which in ten or twenty years will have accumulated to an amazing extent if properly pushed and encouraged. I have tried to hire Bayard Taylor to scour Europe with me to make purchases and obtain contributions of duplicates from institutions abroad. He will go next summer; but this summer I want an educated, intelligent gentleman, like the writer of that article on Museums, and will pay him liberally to aid me, for, after all, his taste, so far as a Free Museum is concerned, exactly coincides with mine. I know Europe pretty well, and for the Free Museum I shall be manfully backed up by the leading officials of our Government at home and abroad, and, with my experience and vim, I can in a single year accomplish more in this line for "The Nation" (I mean the American people) than the sleepy Historical Society could do in half a century. At all events, at the least I can form a magnificent nucleus for a Governmental Free Museum. I owe the youth of this nation a debt of gratitude, and I am anxious to pay it, at least partially. I hope that the fire of the late Museum will have fumigated and burned out the humbug from the public mind to such a degree that it can discover that Barnum has got neither horns nor hoofs, and that he has as much love for refinement and the elevation of the race, especially in this country, as even your excellent writer, "or any other man." I merely hope that this writer will carefully and impartially ponder this hastily written letter, and manfully give me justice. If he will, at the same time, lend me a helping hand in the way of counsel, he will confer a great favor on myself, which I will endeavor to transfer for the benefit of my countrymen.

In great haste, truly yours,

P. T. Barnum.

STATE OF THINGS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Charleston, July 21, 1865.

There are three things of which every dispassionate observer in South Carolina must be convinced. Two of them I mentioned in my last letter—that slavery and rebellion are both dead, beyond the possibility of revival. The other is no less important in an historical point of view. It is that the South Carolina aristocracy is destroyed. I do not believe that the ruin of the French nobility at the first Revolution was more complete than is now that of the proud, rich, and cultivated aristocracy of the low country of South Carolina. The splendid mansions are burnt down—Ashley Hall, Middleton Place, the Porcher House, and so on—the plantations are divided among the negroes, and the owners are wanderers on the face of the earth, glad to earn a dollar to keep themselves from starving. To be sure, the fee of the land, except on the Port Royal Islands, has not yet been meddled with. It is treated simply as abandoned, disposed of in this manner as a temporary arrangement. But even supposing the owners have found the means to pay the taxes, and have succeeded in escaping confiscation, even then there is absolutely nothing left to them but land—land so burdened with debt and of so low a market value that it can no longer form a foundation for an aristocracy. The best they can hope for is to become small farmers on the few acres they can afford to keep, or to enter into partnership with Northern capitalists. Add to this that nearly a generation of the young men of these families has perished in the war. No man of suitable age and strength could keep out of the army, and only a poor remnant of the flower of South Carolina return now, dispirited, to their desolate homes. I have no pleasure in drawing this mournful picture. "Whoever," said an officer of our army who has peculiar means of knowing about these things in my hearing the other day, "wishes these people more severely punished than they already are, must be very fond of revenge." I simply state the fact as one which ought to be understood. I believe this rebellion had its root rather in aristocracy (slave aristocracy) than in slavery, and in the destruction of its cause we have the surest guaranty of peace.

These three are accomplished and unquestioned facts. But there remains one point, of the highest practical importance, which is not by any means certain. In saying that slavery is dead, and is acknowledged to be so, I do not say that its spirit is dead, and that there is no danger of adverse legislation in regard to those who have lately been slaves. Neither do I say that there is any serious danger of this. When men of the highest position and character, who have the confidence of their fellow-citizens, and have taken great pains to learn their sentiments, tell me, as they have done, that they feel certain that the intentions of the community are humane and honorable, I have no right to suspect their fairness or their sincerity. I believe they mean well. I am not obliged, however, to have the same confidence that they have, and to believe that the State of South Carolina will certainly go with them. That is for the future to decide.

It is, in my opinion, upon this point alone that the great question of the day rests—the ability of the negro to take care of himself. I call this an open question, because in the mind of the Southerner it is so. In any true sense of the term it is not an open question. Wherever the negro has received just treatment, and has reaped a just and prompt reward for his labor, he has worked and become self-supporting. This is so abundantly proved at Port Royal and elsewhere, that it seems like a truism to us; but we must bear with the ignorance of sincere enquirers, and welcome all the evidence that we can get. I have not any definite information about affairs at Port Royal this year, but I have taken considerable pains to ascertain the state of things on the islands nearer Charleston, where a no less important experiment is going on. Edisto, Wadmelaw, John's and James Islands, being all abandoned by their owners, were set apart, under General Sherman's order, for the exclusive use of the freedmen, no white men being allowed there except General Saxton's superintendents. As these were too few in number to find time for anything but the absolutely necessary supervision of the islands, the crops have been carried on by the negroes, with no assistance but seed, tools, and rations. The result is highly encouraging. On the two plantations that I have myself visited there are large and fine-looking fields of corn—enough without doubt to give the freedmen a very excellent start for next year. And it was an entertaining sight on our return to see the crazy little steam-flat in which we had ventured our lives crowded with colored people who were carrying their produce to market—tomatoes, okra, huckleberries, water-melons, chickens, eggs, and bundles of light-wood for kindling. There is no doubt that these people who are left to themselves are doing well. We must understand that they do not work according to the Northern standard. I do not suppose that they have planted as large crops as they ought. In one district in St. Paul's parish—a district badly disturbed by the war—2,350 people (of all ages) on sixteen plantations have 1,900 acres of provisions, besides a little cotton. But we have no right to judge them except by their own standard; and all we have a right to require of any set of people is that they shall be self-sustaining; and that these people will be as soon as their crops are in.

Of all these islands, Edisto, which was settled first, is doing best. There is a promising crop of cotton here, and I suppose there is none anywhere else in the State except at Port Royal. But when we leave the islands, and come upon "the main," we find almost a state of anarchy in many parts. The chief trouble is caused by the return to their plantations of owners who were away when the crops were put in, and who now claim to be allowed to make contracts for a share of the crop on the same terms as those who never left their homes. So there have arisen disputes and violence—both parties, from all I can learn, being very much to blame. The great plantations on Cooper River—perhaps the wealthiest tract in the State—are in an especially disturbed state; and on the Santee things have come to such a pass that Gen. Hatch has just sent a company of the 54th Massachusetts Regiment to preserve order. I am told that throughout these low-country parishes, wherever contracts are made in good faith and lived up to, things are working well; but best of all on the abandoned plantations which are carried on by the negroes themselves.

The colored people of Charleston got up a fair, to be held the week of the Fourth of July; but it was broken up by the riots. They have held it again this week, in a different place, and I was able to attend it. It was a well conducted affair—managed, I believe, by a ladies' sewing circle, and for the benefit of the poor. As a general thing, these people suffer for the want of harmony and of good leaders. There has been a good deal of jealousy between the blacks and the mulattoes, between the free and the freed. For my part, I see no ground for this. Here and at Columbia I should not be able to say which class is superior. Both are intelligent and eminently law-abiding. Mr. Redpath did much, while here, to counteract this feeling; but there were many influences against him.

An important point was gained two or three weeks ago, at a court martial, in taking the testimony of colored men against a white officer. All the proceedings have been published in the Courier, and citizens begin to ask what it means—are negroes to testify in United States Courts? In such a thing as this, to make an idea familiar is the first step towards getting it accepted; and I do not believe it will take long for the practice to spread from martial to State courts. MARCEL.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

IV.

LYNCHBURG, VA., July 24, 1865.

THE Southside Railroad Company promises in its advertisements to take passengers through from Richmond to Lynchburg, a distance of about one hundred and thirty miles, in twenty-four hours. Packet-boats ply between the two cities, but that mode of travelling, besides being very slow and tedious, is made uncomfortable by the heat, and I decided to make the journey by rail. At half after six in the morning, I was assured, the train would leave the station; so breakfasting at five, I set out for the south bank of the James River. All the railway bridges were destroyed by Lee's retreating forces, and trains going southward start from the town of Manchester. I found no depot nor baggage-master. Half a dozen dilapidated cars were standing about, and a rusty looking engine was cracking and puffing up and down, shifting them from one track to another, and making up a train. Of this two passenger carriages formed a part, both on the outside adorned with a painted representation of two Confederate flags, and splashed half way up with the yellowish-red mud of this region, and, inside, both dirty and exceedingly uncomfortable.

Long ago, I suppose, cushions had disappeared, the only vestiges of them that remained being an occasional wad of horse-hair, or a shred of faded plush still clinging to the frame-work of the seats. In the window-sashes were many broken panes, and where the glass was wholly gone wood had been substituted. The floors were filthy. Such as they were, these two carriages were given up to the occupancy of ladies and the gentlemen accompanying them, together with a number of sick and wounded Confederate soldiers; other passengers found sitting and standing room in the freight cars. Even at that early hour the sun began to shine hotly down upon the baked and cracked soil of the railroad, and moving my trunk into the shadow cast by the leaving train, I sat and watched the crowd assembled at the station.

There were, perhaps, a hundred and fifty people collected together. Negro drivers, liberal of the whip and vociferous in expostulation with their mules, drove loaded wagons to the baggage cars. Dirty looking whites and dirtier negroes were selling "fried pies" and other uninviting edibles. A crippled negro was retailing cider, which he poured from a jug with a cornstalk stopper into a tin can that once had held preserved salmon. Newsboys were crying the New York Daily News and Herald, and the Richmond morning papers. Here in Virginia it is possible, I observe, to get a copy of the Herald for some time after every copy of the News has been sold. At last the train was got together, and at about half after seven o'clock we began our southward journey, pitching and jolting slowly along.

Indeed, throughout the day the rate of speed was but seldom so great that an active man might not have got off the train and on again without inconvenience or danger. I was told that even in the times before the war the trains never made much more than fifteen miles an hour. The country through which this railway passes lies south of the James, and at a distance varying from ten to forty miles. Between Lynchburg and Richmond the river makes a great curve to the north, that it may skirt the elevated ridge of land on the crown of which the road is built. The land is comparatively unproductive, and Virginians ask the traveller not to form an opinion of the fertility of their State from the appearance of this particular region. Yet there is some good bottom land. The country has many creeks, for in this ridge, close by the line of the road, are the head-waters both of the streams that flow north-easterly into the Appomattox and James, and also of those which seek the tributaries of the Roanoke on the south. I saw but little land under cultivation; indeed, the greater portion of the surface seemed to be not cleared at all. An occasional field of wheat-stubble, a cluster of farm buildings, surrounded by a field of corn, the railroad itself, here and there a tortuous footpath, winding away into the hot and solitary forest, furnished for the greater part of the way the only indications that the almost unbroken woodland was not an undisturbed wilderness. Every hour or two the train is stopped; the passengers get out and drink water at the tank that is supplying the engine; negroes beside the track are busy chopping the wood short for the furnace and throwing it on the tender; nobody seems to be in any hurry. When two screams from the whistle give the signal, we leisurely get aboard again.

At longer intervals a way station presents itself, where two or three passengers get on or off. Commonly a country road crosses the track, and two or three mean buildings are in sight; probably some Federal soldiers are standing about, and an officer inquires for newspapers. A dozen or more negroes, one or two men in Confederate gray, and some white women offer for sale cigars, apples, and peaches at ten cents a dozen, or for a quarter of a dollar will sell "a right good snack." This, in some instances, consisted of corn-bread with the leg of a fowl; in others, I saw tied together into a compact package a piece of bread, three fried eggs, and a slice of ham. At some places there were, I should think, as many as thirty people engaged in this traffic, which, however, seemed not to be lucrative, except, perhaps, at Burkesville Junction, where was a train loaded with two or three happy regiments of Kentucky soldiers, who seemed overjoyed at the prospect of being soon at home again. They were as boisterous in their delight as boys, and the Burkesville market was speedily cleared of eatables and drinkables.

It was understood that passengers for Lynchburg were to change cars at the Junction, while the other train proceeded to Danville. At the depot I could find no one to tell me when the train would leave, nor whether it would start from that station. The train itself, meantime, was nowhere to be seen, nor could I learn where it was to be found, till at last a man who had heard me several times making fruitless inquiries, told me it was "up thar a short piece," pointing to a curve in the railroad. Getting a negro to carry my trunk, I walked along the track for a quarter of a mile till I came to an engine and three freight cars, into one of which I put my luggage. Some negroes loading freight thought the train went to High Bridge and Far'ville. A white man whom I approached on the subject "reckoned it did," and went on chewing tobacco. A conductor I could not find, but finally a brakeman whom I asked, after carefully scrutinizing me as if to see if I might be trusted to keep a secret, told me that it didn't go to Lynchburg, but was the Lynchburg train; that it would start from the place where it stood, and added that I would have to look out for my own baggage. It was then about one o'clock, and a little after three we started. We went on a little way, then stopped and went back. Some one connected with the train had dropped a five dollar note, and the conductor returned to let him find it. Then we set out again, the engine in the rear of the train, pushing us along to High Bridge. This structure is a trestle-work viaduct, about twelve hundred feet long, and resting upon twenty lofty brick pillars that span a valley, through which runs a narrow creek. Lee's army destroyed the timbers at the western end of the bridge in its retreat before Sheridan, and it became necessary for us to change cars. Carriages of various descriptions were at hand to remove passengers and freight to the other cars. The fare from Burkesville to High Bridge, a distance of twelve miles, was a dollar and fifty cents. The wagon ride from one end of the bridge to the other was about half a mile in length. The fare charged was one dollar for a passenger with a trunk.

One could not help being impressed with the desolateness of the scene as we rode over the pits and gullies of the road. Up or down the narrow valley I could see no dwelling and no cultivated field. On a little knoll near the bed of the creek was a dark-red fort of earth standing out distinct amid the green. High aloft on our left hand broken fragments of trestle-work projected into the empty air between the last pillars of the bridge. We passed over a little bridge of logs, whose timbers were blackened by fire and burnt nearly through. In the open wagon in which I was riding an old North Carolinian, dressed in homespun, sat silent upon a rough board coffin containing the corpse of his son, and his seat was shared by two wounded Confederate soldiers. Everything around seemed to have felt the fire and sword of the war. We found the train awaiting us in the middle of an earthwork, built by the Confederates to protect the bridge against Federal raiding parties. Here we had another hour or two of tedious waiting in the blaze of the afternoon sun. But at last the conductor addressed the engineer, "Well, Oscar, reckon we'd better go"—and we took our departure for Farmville. This little town presents a not unpleasant aspect. The land in the immediate vicinity seems more fertile and better cultivated than any other which I had seen during the day. The principal business of the place is the manufacture of the tobacco raised in the adjacent districts. Here were more Federal soldiers, and an office of the United States military telegraph. Soon after leaving Farmville the cars became more comfortable, for it was near sunset, and the heat somewhat abated. It was not pleasant, however, to learn that we should be compelled to pass the night in the train, which would reach Concord at twelve o'clock, and there wait till six in the morning. I asked if a bed could not be obtained, but was told that there was nothing at Concord but the railroad depot.

With the man who gave me this information I had some further conversation on a variety of topics. He was going up the road, he said, to see about the loading of a material train which would go down to High Bridge the next day with timber for repairing the trestle-work. I asked him if green timber was used in the repairs. He said, "Yes, it's safe enough; we allow for shrinking." But on the very next day the same train broke through a defective trestle-work, about ten miles from this city, and was precipitated over a bluff nearly fifty feet high. Thirty or forty people were injured, seven of them severely, and two men were killed. What I have said of the inconveniences of railway travelling at the South has been said merely to give some account of the matter. Probably it would be very unfair to blame the companies for the worn-out rails, comfortless cars, and long delays of which I have spoken. And, perhaps, it is not the companies but the military authorities who should be held responsible and blamed for such accidents as this one. To take passengers over a railroad in the present condition of that between this city and Richmond, is to put them in fear and imminent danger of death. Yet the eagerness of the people for mails and transportation is so great that repairs of the most temporary character are made, and probably will continue to be made for months to come, unless some authoritative inspection is instituted. The scene, as described by eye-witnesses, must have been most impressive and distressing. The accident happened about midnight; nearly everybody on board was more or less injured. There was no assistance rendered by any of the country people till morning, for none lived at all near.

By the light of a fire kindled among the ruins of the cars the wounded were removed to a bank of sand in the dry bed of the creek, and the wounds of some were dressed by a Confederate surgeon who was among the passengers. Watches, money, and jewelry were taken from those who lay insensible by some marauding soldiers who robbed in the dark. Of these some who were seen at their work were forced to give up a part of their plunder, but a much greater part was not restored. One gentleman from the North is reported to have lost many thousands of dollars in Government bonds, and others lost sums amounting to hundreds of dollars. I have heard of no investigations into the accident or the robberies.

My travelling acquaintance said he was then going up the road for a load of timber. The gang of hands of which he had charge were getting out stuff in the woods, and it was to go down the next day. He had both black and white laborers.

I asked him what wages were paid. White men that were good carpenters got fifty dollars a month and their board. Ordinary laborers got eighteen dollars a month and the same board as the others. The company had the food cooked for them. It consisted of bread, bacon, vegetables, sugar, and coffee.

I asked if the company got laborers in sufficient numbers, for I remembered having seen an advertisement of theirs in the Richmond papers.

"Can't get white men enough. They're too damned proud to work. Rather loaf round Richmond and Petersburg. But they'll have to come to it. I've had to pull off my coat since peace came. I lost what money I had in the great fire. I had thirty-seven hogsheads of tobacco burnt thar. It would have been worth more than twenty thousand dollars in gold to-day. When this war broke out I had one hundred and sixty-one hogsheads in store. But I had to live off it. Had a wife and four children, and I couldn't begin to keep 'em on my pay. They conscripted me, and I had to serve eighteen months. Well, I got a little money from the government, but Lord! you'd have to give two months' pay in Confederate money before they'd let you give one look at a barrel of flour. Well, I had to sell a hogshead every now and then till I got it reduced down to thirty-seven, and them they burnt. So I had to go to work, and more than me 'll have to do it. No, if we could get white men enough we wouldn't hire niggers."

"They don't work so well?"

"A nigger's work a'n't much. Rather have one white man than three niggers. They'll work a day, and then they want to lay off a day. Now with me they used to lay off after they got their week's rations, and I wouldn't see anything of 'em for two or three days. But I broke 'em of that, just set 'em to work till they'd worked out what the rations come to, and then I told 'em to leave."

"You don't board negroes like whites, then?"

"No; we give 'em an allowance—fourteen pounds of meal a week and three pounds of bacon."

I asked if any negro mechanics were employed, and found there were none. The negroes are paid fifteen dollars per month, which is the amount paid hotel servants in this town and in Richmond. On the railroad the colored laborers when employed in cutting cord-wood are expected to cut what a white man usually cuts—three cords a-day. The railway company buys the wood as it stands growing for thirty-five dollars an acre, or already cut at the rate of one dollar and sixty cents a cord. It is piled up at the various wood and watering stations along the line, and the hands are employed in chopping the four feet sticks in two. It is at this work, as I suppose, that a man is required to go through three cords in a day. In the other kinds of work done on the railroad I was told that the negro did not perform nearly so much labor as the white man, and that he needed so much watching and driving that one white man was worth as much as three colored men.

Having discussed the negro in his capacity of working-man, I asked what he thought of the extension of the franchise so as to make the negro a voter. Like almost every other man with whom I have talked in this State, he was utterly opposed to it. The negro was not fit to vote; it wasn't in his nature ever to become fit to vote; and the Southern people wouldn't stand it if the North should put the negro and the white man on an equality. That would make the South fight. All the secessionists to whom I have mentioned the subject, plant themselves firmly on those three propositions. Let the negro vote, and the Southern people will have to be kept down by a standing army. The point will have been reached at which forbearance ceases to be a virtue, and perhaps at that point they will have to make a virtue of necessity, but it will be because the bayonet forces them.

Among Virginian Unionists also opposition is manifested, and is based upon grounds hardly different. There is already far too much ignorance and depravity existing among the voters. The servant will be almost sure to vote for the master's favorite candidate.

Ask a Unionist why, if the negro vote would be so much at the service of the masters, the masters as a rule are so strongly adverse to negro suffrage, and the reply is that just at present the master is inclined to hate the newly emancipated slaves; that, moreover, the former owners of slaves expect very soon to get the States back into their own hands, and have no fears that they will not be able, as in old times, to get a majority to carry the measures which they propose. If they needed the negro vote, they would hardly take it, and till they do need it they would much prefer that the freedmen be kept in a condition as nearly as possible resembling their former slavery.

If you then ask the Unionist, who is, I may say always, a disbeliever in the professions of loyalty made by his neighbors who have been in rebellion; who always predicts repudiation of the national debt, a factious questioning of any acts of Congress that were not passed when all the States were represented, persecution of Unionists, and a practical re-establishment of slavery—if you ask him what remedy he sees for these evils of the future, he will tell you that he has no hope except in the maintenance of a standing army throughout the South.

The Unionist and the secessionist both declare that the suffrage should not be made more but less extensive. The former seems to think so because he believes the rebellion could not have begun if a majority of the voters in the Southern States had been sufficiently intelligent to comprehend clearly the state of affairs in the country, and to discern their own interests. This has been said to me by several Union men—by one no longer ago than this morning, and in nearly the words I have used. The secessionist, when he says so, proceeds immediately to deduce the conclusion that it would be most unwise to give the right of voting to several millions of people who now are without it, and who confessedly are very ignorant. Which party is with most justice afraid of the negro vote, and which party will longest continue to fear it, I do not undertake to say.

"How do the negroes behave since they became free?" was the next question I put to the man with whom I was talking in the car.

"Sassy and lazy. They go round stealing. Two niggers were shot up here at Appomattox a while ago. They got into the way of going round to the houses, and taking what they wanted. The people complained, and a guard was sent after 'em; they wouldn't stop when they were ordered, but run, so the guard fired and shot 'em both."

I asked the same question of another person, saying that the general report was that they had become impudent and idle.

"Don't you believe it," he replied; "they behave well enough. But some people can't see a nigger go along the street now-a-days that they don't damn him for putting on airs. They are pretty much all at work. Their wages are not what they ought to be yet, but that matter will soon regulate itself. A good many of the masters forget pretty often that their niggers are free, and take a stick to them, or give them a cuff with the fist, though they don't attempt to administer a regular flogging."

This view of the case, so far as concerns the deportment of the negroes, I find confirmed by the Lynchburg Virginian of July 24, which, combating a report that there had been a negro riot in the city, says:

"There has been no riot here, nor anything bearing the slightest resemblance to a riot. The negroes have been orderly and respectful in their deportment, and the whites have been kind, just, and considerate towards them. The entente cordiale of old between the classes has been well preserved. There have been a few individual cases of insolence on the part of the one, and of unkindness on the part of the other; but such cases are exceptions to the rule."

The white people of the neighboring county of Franklin do not, however, appear altogether satisfied with the state of affairs in their district, and on the 13th of July held a meeting at the court-house, and passed a series of resolutions. The first acknowledges the supremacy of the Federal Government, and announces that the citizens of Franklin "are willing to discharge their duties as citizens, and are ready to appreciate and properly reciprocate a forbearing and conciliatory policy towards them on the part of the authorities and the people of the Northern States." The second resolution declares that "without expressing any opinion as to the constitutionality or expediency of the measures which have been used for the emancipation of the slaves, they are desirous to adopt such measures as will most alleviate the evils and best develop the good likely to result from so great a change in our social and industrial system." The resolution goes on to say that the laborer must content himself with small wages, or in the present bad condition of the country he will have to go without work. Arrangements already made this year ought not to be disturbed by the military authorities. The right is claimed of punishing minors whose parents will not keep proper discipline over them, and of summarily dismissing for idleness and misconduct adults and those properly dependent on them.

The resolutions were published in the Lynchburg papers of Monday, and on Tuesday morning appeared an order of General Gregg, directing his subordinate in that county to notify the persons holding the meeting that "their proceedings are disapproved, and that their resolutions, or any part of them, will not be carried into effect."

The wages now paid to farm hands in this section of country, under the arrangements with which the citizens of Franklin deprecate interference, are in no case higher than five dollars a month. While some planters allow their servants to cultivate a patch of ground for themselves, others do not. On the very great majority of plantations no tobacco is growing this year. A very well informed resident of the city told me that he knew of but four farms where any attempt was making to raise it, and on those the quantity planted was very small. Of corn and oats the yield will be so large as to be remarkable.

Money, however, is exceedingly scarce, and less business is done in proportion to the size of the place than in Richmond. The shopkeepers are not yet wholly free from the habits of Confederate times, and when one asks the price one is told two prices—so much in gold, so much in greenbacks. But this practice, it is said, becomes less common daily, and less and less gold is seen. "Business will be stagnant," says the general voice, "until we can find out what is going to be done with the thirteenth clause of the Amnesty Proclamation."

To return to my friend on the Southside train:

"I reckon I'll have to wait awhile, till they get things straightened out a little. Reckon my credit 's good at the North. Baltimore men tell me to come on thar and get what goods I want; and I could do it in New York. Don't owe a dollar up thar. I sent one pretty large bill through to a house in New York after the war had begun. But I reckon I'd better stick to the road yet awhile. I'll be ready for trade aginst the people are."

"I suppose when trade begins it won't be long before the North and South are friendly again?"

"Well, I reckon not."

"I have been told that your people are hostile yet in their feelings, and that if the Government was engaged in a foreign war—say in Mexico—the Southerners would be in arms against the North?"

"Well, now, there 's a hundred of 'em working right along with me, and mo'. I hear how they talk, and I know what their feelings are. They don't hate the North. Except the radicals; they hate them. But there 's nothing they 'd like any better than a war with France. England either. Those two nations encouraged us to fight, and then backed out and wouldn't recognize us. North and South together, reckon they 'd make short work down in Mexico. A good many of our people have n't anything else to do, and they 'd like it."

They seem to have nothing else to do. To judge by the numbers of able-bodied men that one sees lounging in the streets and in the bar-rooms, listlessly sitting about the railway stations, and by the difficulty that is experienced in getting white laborers to work on the railroad repairs, there may be some necessity for the recently promulgated modifications of one of General Gregg's orders, "so as to include all white persons found loafing about the streets, without any ostensible means of making a living." The number of idle white persons is much too great, and will account for much of the pilfering complained of by the newspapers.

ENGLAND.—THE TRIUMPH OF THE LIBERALS.

London, July 22, 1865.

What are the synonyms for Liberalism? is a question over which the genius of many writers must have ached throughout the last three weeks. Repetitions of the same word are a defect in writing, of which there exists an almost childish horror in English journalism; and in truth, the late Lord Macaulay would never have been allowed to write in our leading newspapers, if he had proved unable to alter his style. Yet, after all, no other term has yet been invented, except Liberalism, to express the creed of the Ministerial party. "Whiggery" is a doubtful compliment; "Radicalism" is regarded as a term of reproach; and the "cause of progress" savors too much of Chartism and mechanics' institutes. As to "democracy," I need hardly say that it is never mentioned in polite society. Under these circumstances there is nothing for writers on elections to do except to fall back on Liberalism, as neither expressing too much nor too little; and a weary time, I can assure you, many of us have had of it, playing an endless succession of tunes on one single string. Throughout the whole contest there has been presented on neither side any distinct issue or definite policy or intelligible programme. In a general way, the struggle has been between the abstract principles of Liberalism and Conservatism. But abstract ideas have a very faint hold on the British mind; and the absence of any practical test by which the value of these abstractions could be measured told severely against the interest of the contest. A staunch old Whig with whom I am acquainted remarked the other day, that this was the only election at which he had voted for his personal friends without any reference to their politics; and I have no doubt he only expressed openly the thought on which vast numbers of educated men have acted privately. Never, as I think I have written before, has there been an election so influenced by private and personal considerations as the present.

However, as a matter of fact, the Liberals have carried the day. In a speech delivered by Mr. D'Israeli on Wednesday last, the leader of the Tory party admitted that there would be only three hundred Conservatives in the new Parliament; or, in other words, that the Ministry would have a majority of sixty. He tried to console his audience by the hope that several of the Liberal members would be unseated on petition; by the reflection that the Conservatives who had lost their seats were not thick-and-thin supporters of Lord Derby; and by the trite though true remark, that after all the adverse majority might have been larger. Still, all the special pleading and ingenuity in the world will not alter the plain facts, that the Government have won the fight, and won it conclusively. Lord Derby will most assuredly not be reseated in office on the assembling of the new Parliament; but beyond this fact nothing can be absolutely predicted. Mr. D'Israeli, when he uses his own intellect, and does not try to lower himself to the level of his rural supporters, is perhaps the most acute of English statesmen. I own, therefore, to some satisfaction in finding that, in the speech I have alluded to, he forms a similar estimate as to the importance of the advanced Liberals in the coming Parliament, of which I have already spoken in previous letters. With the bitter satire of which he is a master, he announced that the time was past when the Government "could keep Mr. Bright, as the head of the Radical party, like a servant in the pantry or waiting in the hall." With the view of strengthening his own cause, or, more strictly speaking, of annoying his opponents, he represented in glowing colors the difference between the position occupied by the member for Birmingham in the old House, as a political John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness, and that which he would occupy as the leader of "a considerable band, possessing talent, energy, and eloquence." Moreover, he remarked acutely enough that the loss of Mr. Cobden, however serious to the country, would raise the position of his most famous colleague. It is not, I think, unfair to state, as Mr. D'Israeli did, that, during the latter years of his life, the great free-trade agitator, "partly from ill health, partly from the dictates of his mind, acted as a drag on Mr. Bright." Now that Cobden is gone, Bright's position, as acknowledged leader of the ultra Liberals, is admitted beyond the possibility of question. Nor will the party of which he is the parliamentary chief be an unimportant one in the division list, as this increase of the Manchester phalanx is, to my mind, the most important feature in the present elections. You must excuse my dwelling upon it somewhat at length. You will, I think, do so the more readily, because the men who compose this party were known, one and all, with scarcely an exception, during evil times as the persistent advocates in England of the Federal cause, as against the "slave power." The following may be taken fairly as a list of the members in the new Parliament who, on all important questions, will follow the lead of Mr. Bright:

Mr. Wyld	M. P. for Bodmin.
" Forster	" Bradford.
" White	" Brighton.
" Fawcett	" do.
" E. Potter	" Carlisle.
" Torrens	" Finsbury.
" Stansfeld	" Halifax.
" Akroyd	" do.
" Hughes	" Lambeth.
" Taylor	" Leicester.
" Cowen	" Newcastle.
" Gilpin	" Northampton.
" Morley	" Nottingham.
" T. B. Potter	" Rochdale.
" Moffatt	" Southampton.
" Pender	" Totnes.
" Mill	" Westminster.
" Baxter	" Montrose.

Making a fair allowance for the elections not already decided, it will not be too much to say that Mr. Bright will thus have a personal following of some four-and-twenty votes; that is, there then will be that number of members in the House who will require some strong inducement or conviction to persuade them to go into a different lobby from that of the member from Birmingham. Besides this, there are at least as many more Liberal members of the stamp of Mr. Clive or Mr. Neate, who, though not in any way identified with Mr. Bright, would yet vote with him on most political questions.

This knot of advanced Liberals may seem to you a very small one; and so in ordinary numerical calculation it is undoubtedly. The Times, in commenting on Mr. D'Israeli's vaticinations of a radical "régime," remarked with truth that the majority of the Ministerial party were as much opposed to Mr. Bright and his principles as the opposition itself. So it is; and I should deceive you if I led you to suppose we were on the eve of any great radical movement. The time, in my opinion, is not ripe for such an event. All I say is, that the increase of the Manchester party is not only important in itself, but is still more important as the harbinger of future change. For the first time in English parliamentary history, we shall have in the House of Commons a score or so of members pledged to what, in our Old World style, are called "democratic" principles. With regard, however, to the immediate present—not to the remote future—the real question is whether an alliance is possible between the advanced Liberals and the bulk of the party. As long as Palmerston lives and rules, no entente cordiale is possible; but by common consent it seems to be agreed that the Premier cannot last much longer. It is evident that the Chancellor of the Exchequer must be the next Liberal leader, either as Prime Minister or as virtual chief beneath the nominal Premiership of some member of the House of Lords, possibly Earl Granville or Lord Clarendon. Now, in spite of all his High Church leanings and "doctrinaire" proclivities, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is by instinct a man of the people; and as such he has wooed the sympathies of the Whig land-owners to as little effect as his rival, Mr. D'Israeli, has succeeded in winning the confidence of the Tory gentry. If he is to become a political chief, it must be as a popular leader, not as the favorite of a party; and thus, as this conviction has dawned upon him, he has become more and more a champion of the popular cause. The defects which not unreasonably impair his influence in the House—the want of temper, the absence of tact, and a certain strange deficiency of political insight, are not appreciated by the public, who only perceive the splendor of his eloquence and the brilliancy of his statesmanship. From the time I first heard Gladstone speak, when carried beyond himself by the passion of debate, I came to the conclusion that nature meant him for a popular demagogue, and that the scholarlike moderation that his university training had imparted to his habitual utterances was a matter of education, not of instinct.

Now, if this view of Gladstone's character be correct—and it is the one held by many whose means of judging are far more extensive than my own—it will be easily seen how his rejection at Oxford is likely to influence his political career. It was at the grand old university that the son of the Liverpool teacher first made his mark upon the world. It was there that he became a partizan of the political and religious Conservatism of which Sir Robert Peel and Dr. Pusey were at the time the respective embodiments. It was there that he learnt the creed, put forward in his almost forgotten treatise on Church and State, which Lord Macaulay tore to pieces in the "Edinburgh Review," stigmatizing it as the work of a "foolish young man." It was as the typical representative of Oxford, of her High Church reaction, and her Liberal Conservatism, that Gladstone was elected member for the university a score of years ago. Since then times have changed, and both statesmen and Dons have changed with them. Unfortunately, or fortunately, the representative has changed more rapidly than his constituents; and each succeeding year has widened the distance between Gladstone and Oxford. Yet, in spite of the growing alienation between himself and his electors, the Chancellor of the Exchequer clung to Oxford. It was not only that the seat was a very pleasant one to occupy, but that the occupant valued it for its own sake. The friends of his youth, the men who had been the teachers of his mind, were still, for the most part, members of the body which returned him to Parliament. Nobody who has not been a member of our great English universities can quite understand the hold they have in later life on the men who first earn their honors there; and this peculiar attraction was one to which a many-sided mind, to use a German phrase, like Mr. Gladstone's was pre-eminently subject. Certain it is that, throughout the whole of his long political career, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has never been able to break with the traditions of his academic training. Thus he has always hitherto halted between two schools, and has never been able to get altogether on with his new love, because he could never completely get off with his old. But now the act of Oxford has severed the tie between the popular leader and the university. In his own expressive words, on the occasion of his first appearing before his Lancashire constituents, he feels himself "unmuzzled," and the result of this unmuzzling will be, if I am not mistaken, to throw him beyond retrieval into the arms of the Liberal party. It would not be fair, let me add, to assume that the rejection of her late member is an evidence of any Conservative reaction in Oxford; on the contrary, the university is far less bigoted in her adherence to Toryism than she was twenty or even ten years ago. The cause of her apparent back-sliding in the cause of Liberalism is that, first of all, Mr. Gladstone has left her behind by the rate of his mental development; and secondly, that the new system by which non-resident members of the electoral body are allowed to vote by proxy has completely altered the composition of the constituency, and not for the better. Henceforward the members for Oxford and Cambridge will be elected not by the professors and fellows and tutors—a class of whom Mr. Goldwin Smith is not an unfitting type—but by county squires and country curates, who have long escaped from the liberal influences of study and learning.

With the exception of Mr. Gladstone's election in South Lancashire, there has been little in our recent contests to interest any one but home politicians. Indeed, the only two facts I can recall worth mentioning are, that Mr. Beresford Hope, the proprietor of the Saturday Review, has been elected for the borough of Stoke-upon-Trent; and that Mr. Walter, the chief proprietor of the Times, has lost his seat for the county of Berkshire. However, the newspaper position of these two gentlemen had little if anything to do with their electoral fortunes.

Amidst the bustle of election time, even the trial of Constance Kent has passed by almost unnoticed. I should think the rumor of the Road mystery, with which all England was ringing five years ago, must have reached across the Atlantic. In the summer of 1860 a child of four years old was taken one night from its cot by its nurse's bedside, killed and hacked to pieces, while the corpse was carried out of the house to a shed adjoining the father's dwelling. The father was an inspector of factories, a man of good position, holding a Government appointment, and the crime created an excitement perhaps disproportionate to its real magnitude. Every parent felt it to be a personal peril that a child could be murdered in its own home without any clue being discovered as to the authorship of the crime. Repeated enquiries and investigations were held; large rewards were offered for the detection of the murderer; the nurse-maid and the step-sister of the murdered child were given in charge on suspicion, but nothing could be elucidated to substantiate the charge against them. Very general indignation was expressed at the non-detection of the crime, and popular suspicion pointed to Mr. Kent as the murderer. A not unplausible theory was invented to account for the crime. It was said that Mr. Kent had had an intrigue with the nurse-maid, that the child had woke while his father was in the room, that a something had been placed over his mouth to stop his cries, that unintentionally he had been stifled, and that when his death was discovered the child's body had been stabbed and hidden in order to divert suspicion. The story was improbable enough; but still it was less improbable than any other explanation which could be suggested; and the unhappy father undoubtedly was subject to the suspicion of having had something to do with the murder. For months the Road murder was the one topic of conversation in England—the one theme almost of newspaper discussion. At last, however, people grew weary of trying to solve an insoluble problem, and nothing more was heard of it, except that in the flat time for news, the era of giant gooseberries and Methuselatic centenarians, paragraphs used to appear in our journals announcing some domestic incident with reference to the members of Mr. Kent's household. Suddenly, a few weeks ago, we were startled by the announcement that the step-sister, Constance Kent, a girl who was only sixteen at the time of the murder, had confessed her guilt before a magistrate. It seems now that from the earliest period the members of Mr. Kent's family were convinced that Constance was the murderess. She was sent abroad to a convent school, and then removed to a semi-monastic institution at Brighton, beneath the superintendence of a very High Church clergyman, Mr. Wagner. Here, at last, she was induced to confess her crime. On her own confession she was committed for trial; and when she was arraigned yesterday, she still pleaded guilty, in spite of the warnings addressed to her by the judge. Under these circumstances, with our law, there was no option except to convict her of the murder. She lies, therefore, at the present moment, under sentence of death; but there is no doubt the punishment will be commuted to imprisonment for life, in consideration of her sex, her extreme youth, and her voluntary confession. There was a very general wish to acquit her on the ground of insanity, but the medical men who were deputed to examine into her state could find no trace of madness. Altogether, the case still remains surrounded with mystery. How she contrived to commit the crime and destroy every article which could have incriminated her, is as yet utterly unintelligible. Motives, too, for the murder there can be none assigned, except a vague surmise that she may have been jealous of her stepmother and of the preference shown to her half-brother above the children by the first marriage. However, when once people know who did the Road murder, they care comparatively little to learn how it was done; and I do not expect we shall hear much more of the matter.

The week, indeed, has had more than its full share of horrors. We have just learnt the death of three young English gentlemen under very painful circumstances. For the last few years there has been in existence an institution called the Alpine Club, in which the qualification for membership consists in having climbed—I am afraid to say how many thousand feet above the sea. Scaling the Swiss Alps has of late been a perfect mania with our young collegians during the long vacation; and the Club created a silly rivalry as to who should ascend the greatest number of snow-clad peaks. One of the few unascended summits in Switzerland was, till the other day, the "Matterhorn;" and this peak was ascended this week by a detachment of the Alpine Club. The ascent was accomplished safely, but while descending one of the party, Lord Francis Douglas, lost his footing and slid down the snow, dragging his comrades, who were fastened with a rope, after him. Happily the rope broke, but three of the tourists and a guide were carried over a precipice and literally dashed to pieces, falling as they did a height of 4,000 feet. No doubt there is a good side to the Alpine Club, in the manliness and endurance it encourages; but it seems to me rather too much that men of sense and understanding should expose themselves to the risk of being smashed to death, simply for the sake of saying they have been up a peak more or less.

The Great Eastern has sailed at last with the Atlantic cable on board, and is now anchored in Bantry Bay. The old fatal mismanagement seems still to attend any undertaking in which this vessel is concerned. Owing to some unaccountable delay, the steamer having the shore end of the cable, which was supposed to have arrived long ago at Valentia, was met by the Great Eastern on her voyage and had to be taken in tow. Thus many days have been lost; and it is not expected the voyage across the Atlantic can be commenced before Monday. Moreover, during the passage from the Nore to Ireland, it has been discovered that the steam power of the Great Eastern can scarcely move her enormous weight even in calm weather; so that if a storm should come on before she has paid out any considerable portion of the cable, it is difficult to see how she can be manœuvred with safety. Altogether the prospects of the Atlantic Telegraph Company are much depreciated in popular estimation.

SO MUCH THE WORSE FOR THE FACTS.

When doctors disagree, it may be doubtful who shall decide, but all the world has a right to be amused. Not many months since, the French Academy of Medicine was the scene of a debate which, apart from its scientific importance, was of a highly piquant and humorous character. The point at issue was a phrenological one, and requires for its complete understanding a few preliminary remarks.

Whoever is conversant with the origin and growth of phrenology, is aware that it was neither promulgated nor bequeathed by its founder as a full-blown science. The localization of the various organs of the brain was reached by Dr. Gall very gradually, after the most laborious induction and at the cost of frequent mistakes, some of which he corrected or saw corrected in his own lifetime, while others were rectified amid fresh discoveries after his decease. As was predicted many years ago, phrenology has passed its crisis, and having survived the obloquy and opposition which it encountered at the start, no longer absorbs the public attention or excites the professors of physiology and anatomy. Its principles have come to be generally accepted as correct by the medical faculty, and have a certain not despicable practical application, in virtue of which men are aided to a better knowledge of themselves and of each other. Whatever development it is capable of or has received of late years, of course consists in a minuter subdivision of the mental functions and an attempt to fix their seat with greater accuracy.

Now it was the earliest of Gall's observations—made, if we may trust his biographer, when he was only nine years old—that the outward sign of a superior verbal memory was the prominence of the eyes. Subsequent investigations revealed as the cause of this the pressure of a convolution of the brain upon the posterior part of the orbitary plate; and the organ called "language" was accordingly located in this immediate neighborhood. Its place has never been disputed, but has received abundant confirmation of the usual kind. Since 1822 M. Bouillaud, a member of the Academy of Medicine, has entertained the belief that the same anterior convolutions govern the articulation of words. He has collected a hundred and fourteen cases in which a difficulty in the speech has been attended with lesion of these organs. Messieurs Auburtin and Broca, from observations of their own, have gone so far as to affirm that the third cerebral convolution on the left is the precise locality of the power of speech, and M. Bouillaud adopts their position. Consequently when this question arose at a recent session of the Academy, he supported his theory by presenting the list of cases just mentioned. To his surprise they were not deemed conclusive. M. Trousseau could tell of the entire destruction of a frontal lobe while speech was preserved; M. Vulpian, of the total loss of speech coincident with a lesion of the posterior lobes; and M. Lélut, of the preservation of speech when a whole hemisphere was gone. M. Bouillaud met these rebuffs by offering a reward of five hundred francs to any one who should bring him an authentic fact, establishing a serious alteration in one of the two anterior lobes of the brain without impairing the speech. This was the signal for a very lively debate, which we find reported thus in a French paper:

M. Velpeau.—"I am eager to compete for the prize of M. Bouillaud, but am restrained, I confess, by a single apprehension. I have a good memory. I remember that Delpech had proposed a reward of two thousand francs to the person who should show him a case where a fracture in the neck of the thigh had been cured without deformity. As was natural, a good many claimants came forward, but none of the observations adduced appeared to him conclusive. He always contrived to oppose some pretext for not admitting them. At length, one morning the newspapers announced that M. Delpech had in his possession a precious fact against which he had no longer any objection to urge. But he was himself the author of the discovery, and of course he awarded the prize to himself. I am afraid lest it be the same with the prize of M. Bouillaud. I should like, therefore, before submitting myself to the judgment of my colleague, to have him specify his conditions."

M. Bouillaud.—"Although I live not far from Gascony, I do not indulge in gasconade, and I am quite ready to award the prize to M. Velpeau, although he is richer than I am, if he can prove to me that he has fairly earned it."

M. Velpeau.—"I will accept it all the same for the benefit of the Paris Society of Physicians."

M. Bouillaud.—"I have said, and I repeat, that I wanted an authentic case furnished me in which the anterior lobules of the brain had been seriously deranged while the speech had been preserved."

M. Velpeau.—"Well, here is the case required by M. Bouillaud."

It was of a hair dresser, a most loquacious fellow, who in the year 1843 was placed in charge of M. Velpeau, at the Charity Hospital. He was absurdly merry, bright, and mischievous, having possession of all his faculties, a great laugher, an incessant chatter-box, and a nuisance to the occupants of the same ward. He was diseased, but no one would have imagined in the brain. Nevertheless, an autopsy showed that the whole anterior part of the two cerebral lobes had disappeared to within at least four centimetres of the anterior-posterior diameter, and for a corresponding breadth. In its place was a bilobed tumor, each lobe a hen's-egg in size. M. Velpeau continued:

"The observation was noted by my then house-surgeon, M. Delpech, now a member of this academy. I exhibited the brain and the tumor in this very place in 1843. Special works and the journals recorded this exhibition. It appears to me the fact may pass as perfectly authentic, albeit it strikes a rude blow at the theory of the localization of the faculties. What does M. Bouillaud think about it?"

M. BOUILLAUD.—"Let M. Velpeau bring me a second fact like that, perfectly defined, and I will consider the prize to have been won."

M. VELPEAU.—"The question is not about a second fact, but about this one. I shall not amuse myself with running after another observation. That concerns the future. While listening to my honorable opponent, I could not help recalling the reply made to us by the embalmer Gannal. He had been asserting that his liquids would preserve a corpse two thousand years. And when we said to him, You are joking; 'Well, well,' was his answer, 'you shall see! you shall see!' M. Bouillaud objects that the fact has not a sufficiently authentic character. In general, whether the anterior lobes of the brain do or do not control the speech, is indifferent to me. But I cannot have it said that the observation noted is not certain."

Hereupon M. Delpech very magnanimously comes to the support of M. Velpeau, and declares that he took down the observation himself and presented the document to the Society of Anatomy. But a doctor who is backed by a hundred and fourteen cases is not to be "taken down" as easily as an observation.

M. BOUILLAUD.—"Well, then, M. Delpech has seen a miracle. I deny explicitly the fact, and consider it as impossible. I will never admit that such a lesion could be produced without the loss of speech, without even intellectual disorder."

M. Velpeau then reads from the Bulletin of 1843 the observation just as it was there inserted, and remarks that denial is impossible.

M. BOUILLAUD.—"The case of which M. Velpeau speaks merits the profound obscurity in which it has so long remained. It cannot solve a question of this sort. It lacks precision. If you will let me examine a patient, and, after having authenticated the trouble in his speech, you will show me the required lesion ——" (Oh, oh!)

M. GUÉRIN.—"What, pray! must we then kill the patient for M. Bouillaud?"

M. BOUILLAUD.—"Nevertheless I cannot renounce my hundred and fourteen cases which I have mentioned, and which prove peremptorily that it is materially, physically, morally impossible for a lesion of the brain to exist without a functional difficulty."

M. VELPEAU.—"I have no intention whatever of overthrowing the theory of M. Bouillaud; yet I cannot help remarking that the brain is an organ so strange, so complex, so little known, that there is hardihood in attempting to localize this or that faculty. Do we actually know well the point in the brain where the organ resides that governs the speech?"

M. BOUILLAUD.—"Nobody can dispute the truth of this proposition of Béclard, that there can no more be functional lesions without injured organs, than there can injured organs without disturbed functions. For the rest, Mr. President, I beg you to name a committee, and if they shall decide that I ought to award the prize, I am quite ready to perform my agreement."

M. VELPEAU.—"I knew very well I should not obtain the reward."

The debate is closed rather than decided by M. Guérin, who insists that the instance cited by M. Velpeau is decisive, and of itself is a solution of the whole question. Moreover, it unites all the desirable conditions of authenticity, having been established with proper care by competent persons, with no view to contradicting a theory which was not then on trial, and therefore thoroughly truthful and impartial. All it lacks is that it was not collected by M. Bouillaud, who exacts as a condition of accepting future facts, that he must have seen them and been enabled to verify them. This condition is illusory. Such facts are verified only after death, since during life there is a want of agreement between symptoms and lesions. M. Bouillaud builds upon his hundred and fourteen cases, but establishes nothing more than a coincidence. He chooses to assume, without demonstrating, a causal connection and subordination, and travels in a vicious circle when he opposes this theory to a conflicting fact like M. Velpeau's. The latter shows clearly that the two anterior lobes were almost entirely destroyed, without in the least affecting the speech. According to M. Bouillaud, the destruction of the organ considered as a cause implies the destruction of the function considered as an effect. This single fact is therefore the condemnation of his theory—its total and absolute ruin.

Here the report ends rather abruptly, leaving us to infer that the committee was appointed, and that the disputants await its decision. A critical review of the discussion is appended, from which we extract one or two sensible comments. M. Bouillaud is reproved for denying instead of examining carefully the observation adduced by M. Velpeau. He even abandoned part of his vantage. The precise locality of the organ controlling the speech he assigns to the third cerebral convolution on the left. It is not clear that this was invaded when only a portion of the lobes was removed. Furthermore, were the lobes really disorganized, or were they simply displaced, shoved back by the tumor, when they might still have retained their functions?

We may compare an instance, which is cited by Combe, of a gentleman who at the age of eighty-six experienced a total change of character, becoming violent from amiable, and, from being a fine linguist, losing the ability to make use of words. Dr. Abercrombie and Mr. Craig, on examining his brain after death, discovered an abscess in the posterior lobes, and to this they would have assigned indiscriminately the change of character. But Mr. Combe, who was present, remarked that this lesion was in the neighborhood of "combativeness," and therefore only partially explained the phenomenon. He divined that there must be a second abscess, and directed Mr. Craig to it. In fact, another was found in the line of the fibres of the organ of "language." In another case a patient suddenly forgot the names of things, and complained often of pain in his eyebrows. He died after two or three years, when a lesion was found in the left hemisphere of the brain, terminating about half an inch from the surface where it rests over the middle of the super-orbital plate. "It appears to me," says Mr. Combe, "that the lesion being on one side only, accounts for his power of understanding words while he had not the power of employing them." This agrees very well with M. Bouillaud's selection of the left anterior lobe as the seat of the power of articulation.

Not unworthy to be embraced in a general view of this interesting subject are the cases of amnemonomia consequent upon an excess of blood in the brain. Such was the case of an invalid afflicted with cerebral hemorrhage, who could write but had forgotten how to read, and had to be taught the alphabet and spelling anew. Another could never lay hold of a substantive when he wanted it. In asking for his hat, he would say: "Give me my —— what we put on our ——." The missing word "hat" or "head" he could pronounce if it were recalled to him, would repeat it vigorously a dozen times, and then, presto! it was gone again. Still a third could only say "So much the better!" to any remark which might be addressed to him. "There has been a terrible railroad accident in the Rhone valley." "Ah, so much the better!" and the tender-hearted unfortunate would weep sympathetically. Combe knew of the wife of a Presbyterian clergyman at Bath who had a stroke of apoplexy. She recovered, but her power of using words was impaired. She had right ideas, but her expressions were often ludicrously irrelevant. A slovenly minister was on one occasion her guest, and in attempting to ask him if he would have some soup, she blundered into the question, "Will you have some clean linen?"

But we must pause, with a promise to report the end of the difference between the learned members of the French Academy of Medicine, if we chance upon it as we did upon the difference itself.

Literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

A publishing enterprise of considerable extent and importance has just been announced by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, of New York, in conjunction with Messrs. E. P. Dutton & Co., of Boston. It is proposed by these gentlemen—who take an enlarged and liberal view of the capacity to absorb good books latent in the American public—to reproduce the works of the most distinguished theologians and preachers of England previous to the eighteenth century. Under the title of "Library of Old English Divines," they intend to place within reach of American readers the principal writers of Great Britain during the golden age of sacred literature, in a style equal to that of the best English editions, and at a much smaller price. The catholicity and comprehensiveness of the plan may be judged by the list of names of the authors whose works it is proposed to include in the series, though, of course, on this point the publishers will be guided by any future expression of the tastes and wants of subscribers. In it Churchmen of every shade of opinion are found in juxtaposition with Independents, Presbyterians, Baptists, etc. It is as follows: Barrow, Bates, Baxter, Bull, Bunyan, Butler, Charnocke, Chillingworth, Clarke, Cudworth, Davenant, Donne, Flavel, Hall, Hooker, Howe, Latimer, Leighton, Owen, Pearson, Stillingfleet, Sibbes, South, Jeremy Taylor, Tillotson, Usher, and Waterland. It is proposed to publish only complete editions of an author; but should this rule be varied from in any particular instance, a complete treatise will always be given, without mutilation or abridgment. The first issue of the library, consisting of the Sermons of Dr. Robert South, reprinted from the Oxford University Press edition, is in press, and will appear during the current year, forming five volumes octavo, at a cost of $3 per volume to subscribers and $3 50 to all others. The importance of this undertaking is sufficient to draw attention to it, and we trust that the result may be alike creditable and profitable to the projectors and those whose support is enlisted for the plan.

—Among the members new to Parliament returned at the recent general election, one of the most noticeable is the successful candidate for the representation of Brighton, Henry Fawcett, M.A., Professor of Political Economy in the University of Cambridge, and author of a "Manual" of that science, now in its second edition. Mr. Fawcett labors under what is commonly considered as a disqualification for public life—being totally blind. At the meeting of the Society for the Promotion of Social Science, last year, he proved himself, however, to be an effective speaker, and no doubt his peculiar position will insure him an attentive audience. We do not remember any blind speaker in the House of Commons since the famous Colonel Barrè thundered from the opposition benches his attacks on Lord North's measures and the American war. In the preface to his work on political economy, Mr. Fawcett feelingly alludes to his calamity, softened, as it is, by the attention of friends and the good fortune which has given him a most patient and excellent amanuensis in the youth who is to him so faithful an attendant.

—The ethnologist or antiquarian who desires to examine the great collection of aboriginal remains found by E. Geo. Squier and Dr. Davis in their exploration of the Western mounds and earthworks, and described in their "Ancient Monuments of the Mississippi Valley," will be disappointed if he undertakes a voyage to America for the purpose. The work just mentioned forms the first volume of the "Contributions to Knowledge" issued by the Smithsonian Institution. In its museum at Washington or in the halls of the New York Historical Society this collection should have found an abiding place—typical as it was of all the varieties of objects yet brought to light by excavations and researches, and exhibiting in its carvings the highest known achievements of the stone age. Such, however, is not the case, and students must seek it at the quiet little cathedral town of Salisbury in Wiltshire, where it forms the chief attraction of a local museum lately established there by a native of that place. This gentleman, a Mr. Blackmore, is (we have understood) a lawyer in business at Liverpool, and so frequently brought in contact with American affairs. While on a professional visit to New York, two years since, he became acquainted with the existence of this collection, and having long intended to endow his native town with an institution of science and art, he at once secured it, with great liberality, as the nucleus of an assemblage of objects destined to illustrate the development and progress of the inventive faculties of man, in various regions and stages of society. Until another series of researches and explorations is undertaken with the same thoroughness and system as those of Messrs. Squier and Davis, of which there seems now to be no chance, it will be impossible to parallel this collection, and every year the difficulties of doing so increase from the disturbance and destruction that gradually overtake all aboriginal remains. Its loss to the country where it especially belongs must therefore be deplored.

—A striking revival of metaphysical studies has lately taken place in England, where, formerly, sometimes years would elapse without the publication of any book of importance in this department of enquiry. It dates, apparently, from Professor Mansel's attempt to enlist the metaphysical theories of Sir William Hamilton in the service of revealed religion, and has received an additional stimulus from the late work of Mill on Hamilton's pretensions as a philosophic discoverer. Among the books of the present season on the subject may be mentioned "Exploratio Philosophica: Rough Notes on Modern Intellectual Science," by John Grote, Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Cambridge (and brother to the historian of Greece), 8vo; "Time and Space, a Metaphysical Essay," by S. H. Hodgson, 8vo; "Introduction to the Philosophy of Primary Beliefs," by Richard Lowndes, post 8vo; "The Senses and the Intellect," by Alexander Bain, new and enlarged edition, 8vo; "Recent British Philosophy, a Review, including Criticisms and Comments on Mr. Mill's answer to Sir William Hamilton," by David Masson (who seems to have deserted his incomplete Life of Milton for severer studies), 8vo. The metaphysical world in France has also been stirred by the disinterment from the dust of a provincial library of the manuscripts of a certain Père Deschamps, a liberal priest of the last century. They prove him to have been a precursor of the Hegelian philosophy, and to have forestalled Hegel himself in many of the views heretofore supposed to be most peculiarly his own. Deschamps' work has been edited by M. Beaussire, a professor at Poitiers.

—Through all changes of literary taste, graphic accounts of savage life and adventure are always welcome in civilized communities, and some of the most successful books of modern times have been of this character, as all who remember the reception of Herman Melville's "Omoo" and "Typee" can testify. The latest reporter of the "manners" of a people who have not any, is a Mr. Frederick Boyle, who apparently from mere love of sport and excitement has explored the country of the ferocious Dyaks of Borneo, among whom all respectability and social weight arise from the possession of a stock of human heads, without which indeed no young man can hope to obtain a wife. The neighborhood of Rajah Brooke at Sarawak has scarcely leavened the mass of native savagery, and as there is no trace of religious belief among the Dyak tribes, missionaries find it almost impossible to make any impression upon them. Madame Ida Pfeiffer, who ventured into their territories and returned unharmed, was the first to report a good word for this people; and now Mr. Boyle declares them to be, when seen under favorable circumstances, "interesting and harmless." Their chiefs are of a convivial turn, and display a degree of jollity and good fellowship more European than Asiatic in its tendencies. One of the most formidable, "Gasing" by name, must afford a fine study for a painter in his grand gala costume at a three days' festival at which Mr. Boyle assisted. He wore a European consul-general's uniform coat; the top of a dragoon's brass helmet was bandaged round his head, with the horse-hair plume flowing down his back; a brass plate inscribed with the victories of a British regiment ornamented his forehead, and on his stomach was fixed the plated cover of a soup-tureen with a highly embossed pattern; this was understood to be the brightest jewel of his regalia, and the source of great envy and jealousy among the neighboring potentates. The weak part of this costume was the absence of trousers. Mr. Boyle's book shows good nature and sprightliness—giving an impression of the writer's tact and amiability not always found in English books of travel, where an undisguised contempt for the rest of the world is too often the characteristic of the genuine British tourist.

—An important transfer of literary property has recently been effected by the disposal by Mr. William Veazie, of Boston, of a considerable portion of the well known "Riverside editions" (so called from the place of their execution) to Mr. W. J. Widdleton, of New York, successor to the publishing business of J. Redfield. The important addition to his stock effected by this purchase includes the stereotype plates and stock of "Hallam's Complete Works" (Middle Ages, Constitutional History, Literature of Europe), 9 volumes; Charles Lamb's "Life, Letters, Works, and Uncollected Writings," 5 volumes; Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," 3 volumes; Milman's "History of the Jews" and "History of Christianity," each in three volumes; May's "Constitutional History of England" (in continuation of Hallam), 2 volumes; D'Israeli's "Curiosities and Amenities of Literature," 6 volumes; and several others. The same attention will be paid to their manufacture as heretofore, and the series will not suffer in Mr. Widdleton's hands. Among his miscellaneous publications, he has nearly ready "Poetry of the Revolution," by Philip Freneau, a collection of the most striking and characteristic productions of that prolific writer—the Tyrtæus of our Revolutionary War. It is edited by Mr. E. A. Duyckinck, with a portrait and memoir, embodying much new matter derived from family communications. The enlarged edition of Dr. Francis's "Old New York" is also just ready. Mr. Widdleton has in preparation, among novelties for Christmas, Edgar Poe's "Raven," illustrated by American artists.

—In this country we have experienced the evils arising from incompetent librarians and the want of intelligence among those where we most look for it—the custodians of books; but matters have hardly reached the point that they have done at Cambridge, Eng., where, we learn from a work by Dr. Todd, "all the librarians and their assistants at the public library of the university, since 1659, have uniformly though unaccountably declined to make themselves in any way acquainted with the manuscripts under their charge." The natural consequence was that a series of important documents relating to the history of the Waldenses, collected by Sir Samuel Morland, Cromwell's envoy to that people, and deposited by him in the library, have been reported missing for two hundred years. A brisk controversy has been carried on respecting them by Drs. Gilly, Todd, Faber, and others at intervals for forty years past, about the unaccountable disappearance of the documents, and accusations of foul play have been freely ventured on. At last a casual explorer (Mr. Henry Bradshaw, of King's College) laid his hand accidentally on the whole six missing volumes, in the places where they had stood, "under the very noses" of the librarians, for two centuries. The rediscovery has some bearing on the facts of ecclesiastical history. It is proved that the figures in the MSS. have been tampered with, and that the true date of the famous Biblical version in the Romance language, "The Noble Lesson," instead of A.D. 1100, is A.D. 1400.

—We are reminded by an obituary notice that Isaac Taylor, whose decease was mentioned recently in connexion with his writings, had other claims to distinction. His faculties, by a rare combination, were conspicuously exerted in literature, science, and art. A series of Scripture illustrations designed by him in early youth before he abandoned the practice of the fine arts, have been noticed by the few who have seen them as among the most intellectual and imaginative works of the British school. The machinery now in general use at Manchester for engraving patters on the rollers used in calico printing was invented by Isaac Taylor. The plates to his new translation of Josephus (interrupted and left unfinished by the death of his coadjutor, Mr. Traill) were engraved by a modification of this invention.

—No late American book has been received with such frank cordiality by the English reviewers as Mr. D. W. Mitchel's "Wet Days at Edgewood with Old Farmers, Old Gardeners, and Old Pastorals," reprinted in London by Messrs. Low & Co. from Mr. C. Scribner's original New York edition. The Athenæum, usually captious in its judgment of American books, calls it "a pleasant, picturesque, and gossipping volume, which in a most agreeable manner tells the tale of agricultural enterprise from the earliest date in the history of rural economy;" and says "sound common sense, good taste, and sufficient information are amongst the qualities of the writer, who may be regarded as the type of the American country gentleman—a character in whose existence intolerant politicians on this side the Atlantic are slow to believe. His style is pure and polished, and many of his pages are bright with humor." The London Review is equally eulogistic; after quoting a description of a deserted inn in Derbyshire, a leaf from the author's tourist experiences in England, it continues: "This is certainly admirable painting, and there is plenty more equally good throughout the work. The volume is one of the most charming we have opened for a long while. It unites the freshness and open-air vigor of the country with the essence of the libraries; the smell of books and the reflected lights of science."

—A fine example of French conjectural etymology occurs in a statistical work, "Annuaire des Sociétés Savantes de la France et de l'Etranger" (2 vols., Bruxelles, 1865), intended to contain lists of the members of all the learned societies of Europe. The names, etc., of some of the English local societies are a sad puzzle to the editor, Comte d'Hericourt. Desirous of leaving nothing unexplained, he appends a note to the "Geological and Polytechnic Society of the West Riding of Yorkshire," saying, "It is well known that the English word 'ride' means a journey in a carriage or on horseback. It is therefore probable that this society is an equestrian one (société hippique), which, following the example of the British Association, instead of being stationary, travels over a section of the country, and thus extends the region of its happy influence."

—By the decease of Richard Hildreth on the eleventh of July last, American journalism has lost one of the most respectable and indefatigable of its members. Mr. Hildreth had reached his fifty-eighth year, and almost from boyhood had been connected with the periodical press of this country. He was one of the founders of the Boston Atlas, which under his management took high rank as an authority on questions of civil polity. Of late years the New York Tribune was his principal medium of communication with the public. Mr. Hildreth was a bold, vigorous, and fluent writer on current events. Having firmly settled in his own mind the principles that should govern the action of statesmen and legislatures in relation to the political questions of the day, their application to circumstances as they occur was readily made, and he never deviated from forming his judgment according to the elevated ideal always present before him. Though a constant sufferer from ill health, Mr. Hildreth found time for much literary labor. His largest and most important work is the "History of the United States," from the earliest traces of colonization to President Monroe's second administration. It is one of our most valuable books of reference, compiled according to a plan that is adhered to with conscientious severity, and consequently is deficient in the graces of composition that modern readers of history are accustomed to look for. Mr. Hildreth was appointed consul at Trieste by President Lincoln, but was incapacitated by sickness from filling the office, and died at Florence.

—The dispersal of the letters and papers of Joseph Cottle, the true and trusting friend of Coleridge, Southey, and Lamb, has thrown temporarily into circulation a quantity of material illustrative of the early days of those writers that is now "cropping out" in catalogues and periodicals, but will soon be absorbed by autograph and book collectors. A correspondent of "Notes and Queries" gives an account of a copy he purchased of Coleridge's first work, "Religious Musings" (1796), consisting of the original proof-sheets as sent to the printer with the author's corrections and notes. On one sheet, on the margin, Coleridge had written (as if talking to himself) a fragment worth preserving:

"The millennium, in which I suppose that man will continue to enjoy the highest glory of which his human nature is capable, and that all who have endeavored in past ages to ameliorate the state of man will rise and enjoy the fruits and flowers, the imperceptible seeds of which they had sown in their former life, and that the wicked will, during the same period, be suffering the remedies adapted to their several bad habits. And I suppose that this period will be followed by the passing away of this earth, and by an entering on the state of pure intellect, when all creation shall rest from its labors."

After this fine poetic vision he becomes jocose, and on the next leaf gives directions, "Begin the page here, it is absolutely cheating to give such open print;" after another blank space, "Good heavens! what a gap!" A little further on, at some fancied omission, he writes: "The motto, where is the motto? I would not have lost it for a kingdom; it was the best part of the ode."

—The last number of the "Quarterly Review" contains an article which shows conclusively into what insufficient hands the business of periodical writing often falls, even in quarters that have formerly witnessed its highest development. It is entitled "The Great Printers"—the Stephens, that family whose services to classical literature at the revival of letters, and sufferings in the cause of Protestantism, will always give them a claim to the remembrance of posterity. The writer has evidently "read up" his subject in one or two of the leading books relating to it, and details in a slight and sketchy manner, but attractively enough, the changing fortunes of the prominent members of the family. While correcting, however, his predecessors with an air of authority, and assuming a perfect mastery of the literary history of the age, he falls into various remarkable blunders on collateral subjects—blunders that indicate a denser ignorance than they exhibit, and truly remarkable in one who aspires to enlighten the public. The emendation of errors is always dull work, but we give an example or two, as briefly as possible. When writing of Francis I. the reviewer says: "The patronage of the sovereign was exerted, and successfully exerted, to develop the material beauty and splendor of books. Grolier was encouraged to bind, and Robert Stephens to print." He has evidently heard of the volumes, the work of Italian artists, bearing the legend "Jac. Grollerii and Amicorum," that remain, the ornaments of the choicest libraries, to testify to the liberality of that magnificent amateur, but as evidently knew nothing beyond the name, and so transformed the treasurer of Francis I. and his envoy to the court of Rome into a book-binder! Again, apropos to the embarrassments of Henry Stephens, caused by the expense in undertaking his Greek Thesaurus, he writes: "Sweynheim and Pannartz had ruined themselves by Greek," a new and remarkable fact, considering that these famous printers dissolved partnership and gave up printing in 1474, while the first Greek book ever printed—Constantine Lascar's Grammar—was executed at Milan in 1476. This is a fact, within the knowledge of that much quoted character, "every school-boy," though it seems a quarterly reviewer was ignorant of it. Coming down to modern times, he is still incorrect, as when he styles Mons. A. A. Renouard, the publisher and bibliographer, "a practical printer," which assuredly he never was. Errors of this nature would not have been suffered in the palmy days of the "Quarterly," and show a lowering of the standard of authorship upheld during the editorial reigns of Gifford and Lockhart.

—If science progresses much longer at its present rate, it will be difficult to decide on the point where the dividing line must be drawn between intellectual and mechanical operations. Two inventors are now begging for attention through the English papers, one to "The Balance of Nature, an instrument designed as a Calculus of Harmonic Proportions, and to illustrate the Principles of Aristotle's Ethics (!) and the great Doctrine of the Immutability of the Mean," the other to an object of less complex qualities, "The Metabolical Machine, a very ingenious mechanical contrivance for aiding the acquisition of languages." Some public-spirited person should report on the properties of these marvels; they remind one of Robert Stephenson's answer to a person who waited on him with a new infallible project for perpetual motion, "Sir, I will believe it, when I see you lift yourself up by your waistband, and carry yourself out of the room." Professor de Morgan says the principle involved was never more neatly stated.

—A brief account of the last illness of Mr. Waterton, the English naturalist, whose death we mentioned in a recent number of THE NATION, has been received by his old and valued correspondent, Mr. George Ord, of Philadelphia, himself a naturalist of no mean repute. We are permitted to make the following abstract from the letter communicating intelligence of his decease: "He had for some time been growing weaker and weaker, but still not so as to be confined to the house or alter his usual mode of life. He had continually been engaged in one little work or another for the convenience or ornament of this or that part of his property; and on the 25th instant (May), while assisting at putting the finishing hand to some small rural bridges at the head of the water, he caught his foot in a bramble, which tripped him up, and he fell heavily on his right side. He immediately returned home, complaining of very great pain, and expressing his fears as to the result. His medical men declared that he was suffering from severe concussion of the liver; and he gradually sank, expiring at half-past two o'clock this morning" (28th May).

While writing upon this singular man, we are reminded of an anecdote of him told with great amusement always to his welcome guests at Walton Hall. In riding up once to his home from London, he happened to be seated in the cars with a loquacious and literary woman. In the course of their conversation together, she asked him if he were acquainted with Mr. Waterton. He replied that he was. She enquired if he was familiar with his published writings. He answered in the affirmative. She then expressed her opinions in reference to them quite freely, accusing him of gross exaggerations in some, and what seemed to her positive untruths in others, instancing particularly an account which he had given in his last volume of a ride he had once taken in South America on the back of an alligator, which story she pronounced preposterous. At this point in their conversation the cars had reached the station at which Mr. Waterton was to alight, and satisfying himself with merely denying in general and gentle terms the allegations of his fair opponent, he handed her his card, and desired the pleasure of her company at Walton Hall—and she then discovered for the first time with whom she had been travelling. The explanation which he gave of this disputed fact was, that the alligator had been caught alive and been brought to shore, and that, being well secured, he had mounted its back and been dragged along thus for a few feet. It was no wonder that without this explanation the woman had been slow in believing the account. We have not heard yet what disposition Mr. Waterton has made of his very large and valuable cabinet of curiosities in the animal and mineral kingdoms. We wish it might be available to our own students.

OUR TWO GREAT WARS.*

THE subject and the author of this work commend it to the thoughtful attention of intelligent and patriotic readers;—the subject, not only for its intrinsic and permanent interest, but on account of the new light and greater significance which recent events have attached to the War of Independence;—the author, because his previous "Historical Studies," especially those relating to Italian genius and literature, have amply vindicated his claim to excellence as a learned, acute, and accomplished interpreter of the past in its relations to the present and to humanity; and also because, as the direct descendant, in the third generation, from one of if not the most efficient military leaders in the Revolutionary War, he enjoys remarkable facilities for illustrating his present theme by means of the valuable and unpublished documentary evidence in his possession. Indeed, no one can read this "Historical View" without earnestly desiring that the Life and Letters of General Nathaniel Greene, long since ready for the press, may soon be given to the public. No more interesting or important contribution to American history now exists in an unpublished form; and we trust the appearance of the suggestive and attractive volume before us may induce such encouragement as will lead Professor Greene at once to give us the memoir and letters of his illustrious grandfather.

The first thing that strikes us in the "Historical View of the American Revolution" is the admirable method of the discussion. It resembles a modern and masterly French work in the lucidity of its arrangement and the chaste precision of its style. It deals strictly with facts, and is utterly free from those rhetorical exaggerations and generalized speculations which mar the unity of so much of American writing on national subjects. To borrow Matthew Arnold's phrase, it is wholly free from "the provincial tone;" it is the work of a patriotic scholar, whose mental discipline prevents him from indulging in any vague inferences, and keeps his thoughts calmly and clearly on the line of truth and in the sphere of philosophical deduction. Each salient topic of the Revolution is treated by itself. We have chapters on the causes, the Congress, the army, the diplomacy, the finances, the literature, etc., of the epoch discussed; all the essential facts are narrated and considered under their respective heads; and the result is that we have a fresh impression, a distinct idea, and a more comprehensive and correct view of a subject whose very familiarity is apt to confuse our perceptions. We do not think any reader of insight can fail to clarify and emphasize his knowledge of the American Revolution by the perusal of this "Historical View." It appears at the right time; it is calculated to enlighten as well as intensify patriotism; and it is an admirable illustration of the principles and commentary on the course and results and the war for the Union, which has just ended in the triumph of that faith and freedom whose initiatory and thrice-hallowed struggles and sacrifices are herein described and elucidated.

In every phase of the first Revolution we find parallels of the second. We here see that "had the rulers of England been statesmen," the war would have been avoided; George the Third, North, and Grenville wanted money, and devised the stamp act, just as the blind and wicked politicians of the South wanted slavery, and under-estimated the patriotic vigor of the North. The first period of the War of the Revolution was "a series of reverses and humiliations"—as was the first period of that just triumphantly closed. 1771 was a critical year for America, then, as was 1863; 1778–81 was a brilliant era, as is 1864–5. In the first war the committees of correspondence did very much the same kind of voluntary patriotic work recently achieved by our Union League Clubs and other private associations. Robertson and Adam Smith saw independence as a logical result then, as did Bright and Cobden the triumph of the Union in our times. Congress blundered then as now; but at last saw what was required, and did it. They passed a resolution that gave birth to our navy, since so illustrious. The same misrepresentations and calumnies attended the career of the purest and most patriotic. Washington was vilified as Lincoln has been; and General Greene charged with being a Cromwell, because he exercised a necessary authority in an exigency of the public service. In winter quarters our army suffered similar privations to those which our soldiers have lately endured when prisoners of war. The people then, as subsequently, had been accustomed to self-government, were familiar with legislative habits, and municipal rights, division of power, trial by jury, and popular authority; in a word, they were self-dependent and self-controlled, and so redeemed the errors of those in authority, cheerfully sacrificed self to country, and wisely worked out the problem of their own salvation, just as they have so heroically done in the war for the Union. Then, and now, we had "financial experiments," entailing much loss and trouble, but eventually working their own cure. Then, as now, short enlistments proved nearly fatal to the cause. The war, at first thought to be of brief duration, was prolonged for seven years, and this error produced the same disastrous consequences as attended a like mistake in our day. Then, as now, "zeal cooled until the day of expedients was passed." Then, as now, Congress "boldly adopting some measures, timidly shrinking from others." Independence "loomed gradually on the turbid horizon," as emancipation did with us. In short, this impartial and emphatic record reveals an almost identical series of crises, experiments, failures, successes, hopes, fears, discouragements, blindness, foresight, resolution, dismay, defeats, and triumphs which mark the course of the fierce struggle of the last four years.

The representatives of the people in both eras obeyed the impulse of public sentiment—"reasoning justly, reasoning falsely, but borne on by a current no human science could measure, no human strength resist." There was the same "social equality opposed to military discipline;" the same "slow Congressional co-operation;" the same "morbid attachment to State rights;" it "delayed the formation of the army;" but then, as now, was demonstrated "the vital importance of the Union." Political ambition played then the same base game of defamation and intrigue; the Conway and Gates cabal of Washington's day have had their parallels in ours; there was the Jersey Prison-ship to correspond with Libby and Andersonville, the old Sugar-house with the Tobacco Warehouse; there were the Tories, analogous to our Copperheads; there were men who only cared to make money out of the war, men who faltered in the true path, men who basely compromised their manhood and sympathized with the enemies of their country, precisely similar in poltroonery and selfishness to their prototypes of our day; and (thanks to God!) then as now there were brave martyrs, true patriots, consistent heroes, and intelligent and loyal people, by whose self-sacrifice, wisdom, faith, and courage the republic was established as the same noble types of humanity have now preserved it. The most remarkable lesson of this "Historical View" is perhaps its demonstration, from the past, of the necessity then realized of a "central power." The work completely annihilates the doctrine of State rights by its pregnant and practical illustrations of the fatal effect of their assumption and the miraculous benefits of their renunciation.

One other lesson of the hour it sadly teaches, and we trust not in vain—the want of gratitude and care towards the surviving veterans of the war. The army of the Revolution, we are told, "was disbanded without éclat," and traditions and graves only left to attest the services so coldly recompensed. The welcome now given our returned regiments, and the honors paid to the memories of our patriot martyrs, indicate a more just and generous spirit, which we trust will make ample and benign provision for the disabled soldiers of the republic. Meantime, we advise all students of American history who would trace intelligently the progress, process, and principles of civil liberty on this continent, as he ponders the "Rebellion Record," to consult and compare the "Historical Views of the American Revolution."

ON THE CAM.*

IN our grandfathers' days it was such a phenomenon for a young American to become an English university student, that one branch of a well known New York family actually adopted Cambridge as a Christian name from the fact of an ancestor having been educated there. Still, during any year since the war of 1812, two or three American students might be unearthed by the curious among the cloisters of Oxon and Granta. They were mostly Southerners at first, and generally preferred Oxford. It is hardly necessary to add that they belonged rather to the "rowing" (ow as in cow) than the "reading" portion of the academic population. In later years, the few representatives of Yankeedom have been more usually Northerners, and have affected Cambridge. Some of them made themselves more or less conspicuous as "reading men," i. e., hard students. It is rather singular that the one who ought to have caused quite a furore at home, and to have been, for some weeks at least, "one of our most remarkable men," was never heard of. How many Americans, or English either, to say nothing of the rest of mankind, know that we once had a senior wrangler from New York? Yet such is the case. On reference to the work profanely and popularly called by Cantabs the "Freshman's Bible," properly and officially the "Cambridge Calendar," it will be seen that the Mathematical Tripos of 1849 was headed by Dominus Pell of St. John's College. Now, "Pell of Johns" was a son of the late Gilbert Pell, of New York, and, what is more to the purpose, had received all his education in this State till a year before entering the university. And what became of Pell of Johns? Alas! the "unnatural old parent" incontinently annexed him, tempted him by the principalship of a college in Australia, actually shipped him off to the antipodes among "black savages," adding insult to injury, and so we lost our senior wrangler. Here it occurs to us that some of our readers may not have a very clear idea what a senior wrangler is, wherefore we hasten to inform them that he is the man who graduates (not is graduated) first in pure science—the first man of the first class in mathematics at the final university examination.

A rule which we laid down for ourselves in the first number of this paper prevents us from saying anything about Mr. Everett personally. Our business is only with his book—those who want to know what he did at Cambridge from 1859 to 1863 must consult the "Calendar." Appointed on his return home to deliver a course of twelve lectures before the Lowell Institute (Boston), he took his alma mater for subject. The lectures were rather imperfectly reported at the time in a Boston paper; we are extremely glad to see them now collected in a neat volume of nearly four hundred pages. They were altogether too good to be lost, not merely for their literary merit, though that is considerable, but for the information which they contain about the English universities. We have few accessible and trustworthy sources of such information; yet it is highly desirable that we should know exactly how the ruling classes of so great and so peculiar a people as the English are educated. It is desirable, even if, after knowing it, we should condemn the system altogether. We may say nearly the same of the other great Western-European nations. But in the case of England there are these special reasons for curiosity—first, that the English university system is quite unique, altogether different from any other academical model now or formerly existing; secondly, that extraordinary respect is paid in England to the instructing class. We make a great fuss about our teachers sometimes, call them "educators" and other names of doubtful propriety, dub them professors and doctors on small provocation, but, in fact, the English teacher is much better off. His remuneration is more generous, his social position is better, his opinions have more weight.

Considering how much Mr. Everett had to say, and how limited a time he had to say it in, his work is remarkably well done. After touching briefly on some popular errors regarding the universities, he proceeds to explain their "complicated system, so different both from the pure university system of Germany and from the pure college system of America," terminating his illustrations with the analogy of our Federal Union, an analogy which, as he says himself, must occur to every one, though every one could not have expressed it so neatly. He then, after a brilliant historical review of European learning, and an enthusiastic defence of classical studies, unfolds the general principle of instruction at Cambridge and Oxford—written examinations in public prepared for by private tuition. Not that there are no public lectures, both university and college, but these always occupy a subordinate place. In this connection comes in appropriately a spirited defence of competition and emulation as means of instruction. Next we have an account of the valuable pecuniary incentives to study; then a sketch of the Trinity undergraduate's daily life; then a boat race—for of course there can no more be a description of English university life without a boat race than there can be one of German university life without a broadsword duel; then a general topographical view of Cambridge, showing how the different colleges are strewn up and down in that queer, straggling, picturesque (pace Mr. Everett) town of Cambridge. Next comes a muster-roll of Granta's great men from early times down to the present day; then a chapter on the relations of Cambridge to the English Church; finally, a number of pros and cons on the system, with a discreet and generous peroration on the mutual necessities and interests of England and America.

Mr. Everett's style is graphic and elegant, abounding in passages of great rhetorical brilliancy, which remind one of his lamented father. For these passages he thinks it necessary to apologize, as "better suited for a lecture than an essay." The apology is unnecessary, although we can well understand a scholar's distrust of anything epideictic after the popular misuse and abuse of ornate writing. But this is the very reason why a scholar should rather go out of his way to do a bit of rhetoric now and then, if it were only on the principle that Plato wrote his "Menexenus" on, to show that a man can do that sort of thing without being an arrant humbug. The objection to rhetoric is that impostors use it to cover their poverty of matter by show of manner. This objection does not apply to it when founded on and illustrated by real knowledge. The gorgeous façade is a deception then, and then only, when there is no building or a mean building behind it. Who objects to Macaulay's decoration? Who does not wish that Grote could somehow force a little ornament into his style?

Of course Mr. Everett likes Cambridge. We say of course, because the state of things there is so peculiar that no foreigner who did not like it very decidedly would ever stay there three years and a half. An Englishman can't help himself; he has to stay—to break off his university course before finishing it would be disreputable to him socially and injurious to him professionally. And much as we detest, on principle, all tyrannies of public opinion, we should not be sorry if a little of the same feeling prevailed here—if young men were not allowed to leave college according to their own sweet will, at whatever stage of the course they please, without their friends or the public thinking the worse of them. Probably a foreigner who likes the English university life enjoys it more even than a native, because his worldly prospects are less dependent on success or failure in the examinations. Our idea of Cambridge is that it realizes the conception of a republic of letters or literary guild more nearly than any institution that has ever existed. Many things tend to this—the scholastic air of the place, the large number of graduates in residence, many of them entirely devoted to general literature, the somewhat advanced age of the undergraduates, the thorough way in which they work up their specialties, giving the followers of any particular specialty an esoteric bond of union among themselves (a Cambridge mathematician once divided mankind into two classes, those who had, and those who had not, read geometry of three dimensions), and other influences which we cannot stop to discuss.

Mr. Everett has much to say then in favor of English university studies. What that much is we hope our readers will see for themselves in his book. At the same time, he does not seek to ignore what he considers the objectionable points. These (putting aside some that depend on external causes, such as the awful recklessness with which young men sometimes assume the responsibilities of the Christian ministry) he considers to be chiefly three—the vested rights and perquisites of the college retainers, the general expensiveness of living, and the preference shown to men of superior ability, often discouraging the inferior ones into giving up work altogether. The first of these is hardly anything more than a particular illustration of the second; the second he correctly assigns to the dearness of the whole country and the uneconomical habits of the people. On the third we differ from him in toto. So far from the Cambridge system being worse for inferior men than our own, we think it better, because every student can find tutors and examinations suited to his capacity. It is true that our system gets more nominal work out of the average men, by making them attend more recitations and chapels, and here we believe is the source of an error which has misled most writers on this point. Owing to the greater freedom from college roll-call, the idleness of idle English students is more ostentatious and visible. We see the same thing illustrated even more thoroughly in the case of the German universities. That a great deal of downright, sapping, grinding study is done in Germany, we know from the results; but if we trusted to the current literature on the subject, or the superficial impressions of travellers, should we suppose that the burschen did anything under heaven but fence with broadswords, smoke leathery tobacco, drink (very) leathery beer, and howl that utterly monotonous and stupid chorus about the Leathery Fox?

On the other hand, Mr. Everett has omitted to emphasize as such one very serious fault of the system, the almost entire absence of viva voce, making the men awkward and unready in verbal communication of their largely accumulated knowledge, and greatly contributing to their irrational horror of "rhetoric," by which they mean all facility in public speaking, from mere fluency to real eloquence.

And now, having agreed to disagree with Mr. Everett on one point, we will just go on to hint that there are a few things in his very pleasing and generally accurate lectures which are not quite incorrectly stated, perhaps, but stated so as to give incorrect impressions. Thus, pp. 83: "The mathematical treatises are all based on the forms of Euclid and Newton." Surely this assertion is somewhat too broad. Are conic sections, for instance, read geometrically at Cambridge, as they used to be, perhaps still are, at Yale? Are they not, on the contrary, treated analytically throughout? In his remarks (pp. 84) on the comparative classic-historical knowledge of English and American students, he seems to overlook the immense amount of "cram" got up by candidates for classical honors at Oxford. (P. 348): "The extreme High Church or Tractarian fever affected her [Cambridge] but slightly." Alas for human glory! Has the memory of the Camden (the ecclesiastical, not the literary Camden) entirely faded away? Does Cambridge no more remember the rows it used to kick up, culminating in that Homeric contest over the altar of the Round Church, whose architectural beauties so impress Mr. Everett?—a contest immortalized (as we fondly supposed) in a couplet and a triplet of Ingoldsby somewhat to this effect:

"Condemned as Papistic in form, and on this count
With Judge Herbert Jenner Fust justly at discount.
Vide Camden Society Cantabrigiensis,
Vs. Faulkner, tert. prim., Januarii Mensis,
With judgment reversed, costs of suit and expenses."

If so, surely our venerable friend the Archdeacon must have left the world in disgust, and found use for the epitaph which a saucy student once manufactured for him:

This 'ere corpse
Is Tommy Thorp's.

Afterwards shortened to

Thorp's Corpse, forming, in this amended version, the shortest poem in the language, except the poetical title to the works of our great medical poet:

Holmes' Poems.

Within the last fifteen years, some of our largest colleges have partially adopted, with a wise discrimination, some of the best features of the English system. About which changes we should like to say more, but are almost afraid of having said so much.

MONTALEMBERT.*

Many an American desirous of learning the opinion of distinguished Europeans on the course of events in his country, but whom the powerful distractions of the last years prevented from observing the often changing stand-points of foreign political characters during that period, will open with doubt the pages of Count Montalembert's last pamphlet, bearing that inviting title, "The Victory of the North." For the imposing figure of this French writer and parliamentary debater comes up to most memories in a dubious light. Every one remembers the dazzling eloquence with which he defended Poland; but few have forgotten the sinister attitude which he presented to the friends of unlimited democracy in the debates of the Assembly in 1850, when the fate of European freedom seemed to tremble in the balance of oratorical encounters. His motto was once: Le pape, et le peuple, and under this sign he fought most of his brilliant parliamentary duels. Will the friend of Lamennais this time, we might have asked, be found on the side of the slave and his liberator, or the ultramontane defender of the Sonderbund again denounce the victorious cause of the majority? Little reading, however, will suffice to dissipate that doubt. The versatile and spirited Frenchman stands unequivocally on the side of the Union, of the republic, of liberty for all.

"It is well known," he says, on the second page of his pamphlet, "that we are not in the habit of strewing incense to victory, of applauding conquerors. We do it now for the first time in thirty years; be sure, we shall not abuse this novelty; it shall not become our habit. Allow us then to enjoy this rare pleasure without reserve, connecting our present emotion with those days, so rapidly vanished, when the Charter of 1814, the deliverance of Greece, the emancipation of the English and Irish Catholics, the conquest of Algeria, and the creation of Belgium, successively adorned the youthful era of this age, gladdened all liberal hearts, and marked the stages of true progress. Now, after so long an interval, we have again a happy victory. We see, for once, evil vanquished by good, force triumphant in the service of right. We have the rare and supreme enjoyment of witnessing, in this world, the success of a good cause, served by fair means and won by honest people."

You see it at once: sympathy with the people here drowns the sympathy with the Pope, although "a mighty and invincible, but perhaps involuntary, instinct has ranged on the side of the slaveholders all avowed or secret partisans of fanaticism and absolutism in Europe; all open or secret, political or theological, enemies of freedom." He remarks with pain how often liberty is checked by "opinions falsely religious and blindly conservative, such as in 1821 sided with Turkey against Greece; in 1830, with Holland against Belgium; in 1831, with Russia against Poland; and now sides with the slaveholders of the South against the abolitionists of the North." He grieves over the fact that, excepting Dr. Brownson, he can discover no champion of negro emancipation among the Catholics of the United States, and he marks with loathing the sacerdotal character in the anonymous author of "De l'esclavage dans les Etats Confédérés, par un Missionaire," a "shameful book," inspired by a "perverted moral sense." He regrets that old and instinctive aversion for America so wide-spread among Catholics, the origin of which may be traced back to the powerful influence of de Maistre, "a great man, who is indebted for his renown more to his exaggerations than to his great mind, and whose paradoxes have gained more success and fame than his genius and good sense." It is he who, speaking of the young American republic, said contemptuously: "Laissez grandir cet enfant au maillot."

"Well," our author exclaims, "this child has grown up; it has become a man, and the man is a giant. That despised, ridiculed, and slandered people has shown, in the most formidable crisis through which a nation can pass, an energy, a devotion, an intelligence, a heroism, confounding to its enemies and surprising to its most ardent friends; it now takes a foremost rank among the greatest nations of the world."

We stop quoting here, as it is our object to introduce not only the pamphlet but its author to our readers. What he says of our republic, our people, our late contest, its cause and its issue, is more forcibly, more strikingly, more concisely and brilliantly said by him than, perhaps, by any other friend of the American cause; but it is not new, and can be instructive to intelligent Americans only as a recapitulation. His comparisons with the actual condition, and even with the historical character, of France, so flattering to this country, will be novel only to the French. His sarcastic allusions to the "saviours" of European society—the Cæsars—who, in reward of their services, "demand only honor and liberty;" the corporals so eagerly proclaimed "Messiahs" by "servile nations, who cannot be reassured or consoled by a temporary dictatorship, and find their ease and shelter only in abdication"—those sparks of republican ire may produce electric shocks in France, to us they are but flashes of esprit.

The son of a royalist count, who fought under Wellington against the armies of Napoleon, and was chosen to announce to Louis XVIII. his accession to the throne, Charles Forbes Montalembert was a youth of twenty when the catastrophe of July, 1830, drove the Bourbons into a new exile. Nursed in the faith and veneration for religious authority which had been revived after the terrible storms of the Revolution, and covered with so much new lustre by de Maistre, de Bonald, and Chateaubriand, but growing to manhood in a period when royalism was again daily losing its prestige—disfigured as it was by the littleness of Charles X., and the alternately sneaking or obstinate spirit of his tools or advisers—ardent, imaginative, and impetuous, he naturally became a disciple, and subsequently a co-laborer, of Lamennais, who, in October, 1830, raised his democratico-ultramontane banner in the Avenir, for "God and liberty, the Pope and the people." Lacordaire, who had independently reached the same range of thoughts, but could still be designated by some as "the best of Lamennais' works," was among their associates. The Avenir was a constant fiery protest, in the name of faith and universal conscience, against oppression and materialism, against caste and individualism, against inequality and centralization, against Gallican hypocrisy and state education. It fought the new dynasty, the university, the Gallican Church, and all foreign powers. Poland, Ireland, the liberty of conscience and instruction, were the principal themes of Montalembert. With Lacordaire and de Coux he also opened a free school, without permission from the university, in order to combat the more openly the contested rights of the Government to interfere in matters of education. The school succumbed, but the trial of the teachers proved a moral triumph to the accused. Montalembert having, in the meanwhile, inherited from his father the rank of peer, brilliantly pleaded his cause before the High Chamber on the eve of the abolition of hereditary peerage in France. At the same time, in November, 1831, the publication of the Avenir was suspended, owing to the general clamor raised by the Jesuits, as well as by the bishops, whose Gallican privileges were assailed; but the three principal editors repaired to Rome, in the hope of winning over the Pope to their doctrines. But Gregory XVI. was a different man from Leo XII., in whose oratory Lamennais had found his portrait, seven years before, and who had called him the last father of the church; and the Lamennais of 1831 was himself a different man from the Lamennais of 1824. A covenant between him and the Vatican was an impossibility; declared submission or declared opposition were the only alternatives. Lamennais chose the former with a reservation, his associates without any; the Avenir was condemned by a papal encyclical, and ceased to exist.

The three pilgrims returned to Paris, sadder, if not wiser. Lamennais retired into rural solitude, from which he issued, as a prophetic-like tribune, the author of that terrible revolutionary chant, the Paroles d'un croyant, and the boldest foe of both state and church, which he remained to the end of his career. Lacordaire, with the same intensity and ardor, verged to the other side, resigned all other guidance than that of the Roman Church, began to preach, returned to Rome, openly renounced the doctrines of the Avenir, entered the order of the Dominicans and the convent of Minerva, and finally we see him, a white-robed friar, with shaved head, in his chair of Notre Dame, in Paris, or travelling through the cities of France delivering glowing sermons, full of peculiar charm, to enthusiastic audiences, and re-establishing his order throughout the country. Montalembert held a middle ground between his two friends, according to circumstances leaning more towards the one or the other, but in the main preserving his former attitude. Decidedly more Catholic and orthodox than before, and inclined to religious pastimes in literature, among the numerous fruits of which is his renowned "Life of St. Elizabeth of Hungary," he became, as member of the re-organized Chamber of Peers, the untiring champion of unlimited freedom in matters of religion and education, as such the most vehement enemy of the university, and finally the recognized leader of the Catholic party; but at the same time he defended with equal ardor and with noble eloquence the perfect freedom of the press, the rights of the poor, the cause of oppressed nations, not only of Ireland against Protestant England, but also of Poland against Catholic Austria on occasion of the annihilation of the Republic of Cracow, which procured him one of his greatest oratorical triumphs. Comparing Poland to the fabulous giant buried under Etna, he exclaimed, "They thought to destroy a people; they have created a volcano!" The cause of the Swiss Sonderbund he zealously advocated, not only as Catholic, but as that of the weaker party, but it was far from being popular, or having the appearance of liberalism. Neither did he hesitate to eulogize the Jesuits. The Revolution of February, 1848, which he predicted, gave a new turn to his career.

In the spring of that year we find our three friends, formerly of the Avenir, united as members of one National Assembly, the Constituent, but divided by benches, which represent opinions. Lamennais has elaborated a radical constitution of his own, which is rejected by the committee as visionary, and which he refuses to modify. He protests by his silence against the doings of others, and being returned to the Législative leaves his Mountain bench only on the fall of the republic. Two benches from him sits Lacordaire, in his Dominican habit, but, despairing of finding listeners to his peculiar theories on the reconstruction of state and society, soon resigns his seat. Far from them, on the extreme right, we see Montalembert, who has declared himself a republican, but has also become a member of the reactionary "electoral committee of the Rue Poitiers." The spectre of vandalism, against which he formerly often struggled in matters of state and church combined, evidently frightens him now in the stormy political arena, appearing to him in the shape of socialism, communism, and red republican anarchy. Many another former friend of liberty sits near him, and occasionally they cast together a liberal vote. He, too, is returned to the Legislative Assembly, and it is here, chiefly after the signal victory of the socialists in the supplementary elections of March and April, 1850, that we see him in the full prominence of reactionary leadership. He speaks with the same flaming eloquence for the restriction of universal suffrage with which he formerly struggled for the equality of all. Victor Hugo is his antagonist, but hardly his equal in debate. Their duels are tremendous shocks; the Mountain and the Right, the "peuple" and the "bourgeois," applaud alternately. Neither is victorious in the assembly or in the nation; the wily prince president uses one against the other, and, overthrowing the constitution, makes himself sole master.

After the coup d'état of 1851 Montalembert protested against the imprisonment of the legislators, but allowed himself to be appointed a member of the consultative committee, which position he resigned, however, soon after. He was subsequently elected a member of the French Academy, and shortly after to the Corps Législatif, in which he sat till 1857, being for a time almost the only opponent in that body of the imperial Government. His hostility to the latter, the oppressor at the same time of the people in France and of the church in Rome, became from day to day more pronounced and intense. The "red" spectre had vanished; Bonapartism alone, which assumed even some of its features, was now the foe of everything sacred to Montalembert; he dared defy it. Tried for attacks on the constituted authorities, in the shape of a pamphlet eulogizing the English Parliament, he was condemned, but pardoned by the Emperor; he spurned his pardon, but remained unpunished. He returned to his former democratic convictions, though without renouncing his Catholic sympathies or allegiance to the see of Rome, even the temporal rights of which he defended against imperial or Italian encroachments. Defeated as candidate for re-election to the legislative body, he became more active as a pamphlet writer and contributor to literary and political periodicals. One of the fruits of that activity, always full of life, warmth, and vigor, is the excellent pamphlet before us.

In this we see him more decidedly democratic, and less Catholic, than ever. He still cherishes his former predilections; he speaks with tender fondness of the progress and services of the Roman Church; he still glorifies La Vendée and mourns Louis XVIII.; he still repeats his bitter denunciations of the violent suppression of the Sonderbund; he even defends the companions in arms of Lamoricière in the battle of Castel Fidardo, fought against Italian unity. But all this sounds like an echo of former convictions, like a remembrance of ancient loves. His really heartfelt sentiments are all for republican freedom, equality, justice, and humanity. His detestation of imperialism, slavery, constitutional or religious falsehood, is expressed in words well worthy of a true friend of Lamennais. He stands now nearer to the latter than to Lacordaire. His Catholicism does not restrain him from giving the palm for wisdom, virtue, and even religious greatness to a Protestant nation, Protestant statesmen, and Protestant presidents. He does it without reserve, often with passion. He speaks calmly, and mingles words of severe truth and censure with those of admiration; but warm affection is the prevailing sentiment. He has compassion, and even admiration, for the South; but he is convinced that "at no epoch of history has a great political struggle been carried on—has a political cause triumphed—with so little cost to justice, humanity, or the human conscience." "Liberty, civilization, democracy, have not the slightest reason to blush." The abolition of slavery, achieved by this Protestant nation, together with the abolition of the slave-trade, carried through by another, is to him "the chief conquest of contemporaneous civilization—its claim to redemption and eternal honor."

But, in conclusion, let the author, in a few passages, define himself his present political position, his political creed:

"The American Federation ranks now among the greatest powers of the world. All eyes will henceforward be turned towards it; all hearts will be agitated by its destiny; all minds will be illumined by the light of its future; for this future will be more or less our own, and its destiny will perhaps decide ours. . . . . We all belong to an irrevocably democratized society, ... though it is true that nations, like individuals, preserve under all régimes their free will, and remain responsible for their destiny. How to use this free will in the midst of the impetuous and apparently irresistible current of the tendencies of the time—this is the great problem. In order to solve it, we must, before all, comprehend these tendencies, be it to combat, to follow, or to direct them, according to the laws of conscience. . . . . The study of contemporaneous facts is not a matter of preference, but of instruction. We are not made to choose between things which we like or dislike, but between the things that are. I will not argue with those who have not yet done their mourning over the political past of the Old World—with those who still dream of a theocratic, monarchical, or aristocratic reconstruction of modern society. I understand all kinds of regrets. I share myself more than one of them. I honor some of those I share not. I have as much as others of the religion, perhaps of the superstition, of the past; but I reserve to myself the faculty of distinguishing the past from the future, as much as death from life. . . . . The modern world has become allotted to democracy, and there remains only the choice between two forms of democracy, but two forms differing as much from each other as night and day; between disciplined, authoritative democracy, more or less embodied in one all-mighty man, and liberal democracy, in which all powers are restricted and controlled by unlimited publicity and individual liberty; in other words, between Cæsarean and American democracy. . . . . My choice is made."

DISCOVERIES AND INVENTIONS.

A CHEMIST of this country has patented a new ink from the residuum of petroleum refineries, or the so-called waste product. Inks for printing have been made since the origin of printing from linseed oil and resin, and many substitutes have been tried with indifferent success. Linseed oil and resin have been very dear, and will continue so for some time, and any improvements in the printer's favor will be welcomed by the press. The present invention consists in taking the residuum, deodorized, and carbonizing it with the waste acid, thereby making a sort of wax for the foundation of the ink, which requires but little resin or lamp black. The ink is said to feed well, does not fill the type, and leaves a fine color without staining the paper. The price, as estimated by the cost of ingredients used, should be about half that of linseed oil inks. Some fine colored inks from the aniline colors are also said to be cheaper and more brilliant than those made from vermilion. We have also a fine specimen of "white beeswax" made from petroleum, besides "tanner's oil," "pure sperm oil," and "sperm candles" from the same.

—Linoleum, or artificial india-rubber, is the subject of a new patent taken out in England. It is made from linseed oil, or rather linseed oil is converted by some chemical action into a jelly quite like rubber, and is said to be as impervious to acids and water.

—A new mode of engraving has just appeared in France. The metallic surface to be engraved is coated with a thick solution of chalk; when dry, the figure or lines are drawn on this chalk with an oil ink or thinned printers' ink. A soft brush is then used to bring the lines out in relief, and the whole is finally brushed over with silicate of soda or liquid glass, when it becomes as hard as stone.

—A chemist at Buffalo, New York, has patented a process for making soap which retains the emollient properties of glycerine. He puts the ingredients into a retort, and, under great pressure, combines the alkali and oil so readily that but one boiling is required. It is said a ton of soap can be made in five hours, and with a saving of some ten per cent. in material utilized above the old process. An addition of twenty-five per cent. quartz introduced into the retort with the other ingredients forms a fine silicated soap with the utmost ease.

—The manufacture of Waterbury brass, which is now a heavy business, employing several hundred hands, commenced with an ingenious mechanic making some coat buttons from sheet brass. Then a neighbor wanted some, and finally he constructed a simple machine for making them, by which he and his heirs got wealthy, and now a million dollars are invested in machinery in his native town.

—Theine dyes, even if made from tea, can be made as cheaply as the aniline colors, and equally as brilliant. So says a chemist who is perfecting arrangements for manufacturing them on a large scale in Europe. The demand for the aniline colors is remarkable, and the demand bids fair to exceed the supply.

—A new and cheap material for making paper is found in the esparto, or Spanish grass-hemp. It is asserted to be as good as manila, and grows on the plains of Spain in great abundance.

—Fleitman's new method of making oxygen, professedly with great economy, is as follows: Take a strong solution of chloride of lime, the stronger the better, and then add one part of peroxide of cobalt to one thousand parts of chloride of lime. Heat gently, and connect with gas-receiver. Pure oxygen gas is so necessary for chemists, and of such incalculable benefit in the arts, that any cheap method for generating it will be a most important discovery. The Drummond light can be made for light-houses very cheaply, and the principle of supplying oxygen in large enough quantities to support flame and fuel from common air may be put to practical uses. We should not be surprised if oxygen could be economically supplied to petroleum, to do away with the chimneys, as the insufficient supply of this gas in common air seems to be the reason why chimneys are required.

—A French chemist has invented for summer use a fuel of this description: Ground charcoal four parts, starch one part, made into paste-balls, which are dried. When kindled, they will burn without smoke or flame a long time, with intense heat. A four-ounce cake will boil one gallon of water, it is said.

THE PROPOSED DESIGNS FOR THE CENTRAL PARK GATES.

At the exhibition of the National Academy of Design were five large drawings, illustrating designs by Mr. R. M. Hunt for four entrances to the Central Park and for a terrace in connection with one of them. These drawings were named in the catalogue as if their "subjects" were already objective, for instance: No. 106, "Central Park—Entrance at corner of Eighth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street," and No. 112, "Central Park—Rear View of Terrace at Entrance corner of Fifth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street." Photographs of these drawings are now for sale; the title of each picture is lithographed on the card-board on which it is mounted, and after each title are these words: "Designed by Richard M. Hunt, architect, and adopted by the Board of Commissioners of the Central Park." It seems, then, that the four southern gateways to the park are to be built after these designs. As the southern wall of the park is nearly completed, and is only waiting for the gateways, and as it is already a very long time since gateways were first talked of and reported about, it is probable that the work will soon be begun. These designs, therefore, demand the notice of all who care about the character of our decorative architecture.

There will be about twenty gates in all, but it is intended to build first the four at the southern end of the park at Fifty-ninth Street. It is for these four that Mr. Hunt has prepared his designs. We propose to criticize them briefly; and as the photographs are sold only at an extravagant price, and as the designs contain so many details that no memory could carry away any exact picture of the work, we shall describe as concisely as we can.

Of the four designs for entrances, that for the corner of Eighth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street is much the best. In its general character it is simple and well adapted to the purposes of the entrance. There is this natural advantage in favor of this over the other main entrance on Fifty-ninth Street—namely, at the corner of Fifth Avenue—that the roads of the park, as they were originally laid out and built and still remain, are at this point the more naturally arranged, and lend themselves the more easily to help out a good design. The most is made of this advantage by the really successful adaptation of the architectural structures to the carriage drives and foot-path.

Two carriage drives enter the park at this place, one running nearly parallel and close to Fifty-ninth Street, the other running nearly parallel and close to Eighth Avenue. Between each of these drives and its neighboring street or avenue is a footpath. These drives and paths enter the park from an open area, given by the park from off its south-west corner, of the general shape of a quarter circle; and they seem to radiate from the centre of that quarter circle, one path and one road northward, one path and one road eastward. Now the natural way to place the gateways for this corner of the park is the way which, in the case before us, the architect has adopted. Across each foot-path, at its beginning, swings a double iron gate, hinged to high posts, apparently of marble, and not heavier than is necessary to bear the weight and swing of the valves. These posts take up none of the width of the walk, which, when the gate-valves are swung back, is quite uninterrupted. In order to separate the footpath entrance from the carriage entrance by something more than the thickness of a gate-post, and, at the same time, to take up nothing of the needed width of road, the carriage entrances are advanced more out of the park than the others; one post of each carriage gateway is set directly in front of the adjoining post of the footpath gateway, and a panel or bay of iron fence, like the gates in design, connects these two gate-posts, completing the enclosure of the park. This arrangement is much better, both in appearance and in convenience, than if the two gateways were immediately side by side. To each carriage drive are two gates of two valves each, so that the central post which divides the exit from the entrance gateway carries two gate-valves, one on each side. From a proper feeling it is made much larger than the others, not twice their size, only, but many times larger; and is treated, architecturally, in a very different way, being used for the pedestal of an equestrian statue. Between the two carriage gates is a part of the low enclosing wall of the park, here arranged with a continuous seat of stone.

The drawing which sets forth this design (it was No. 106 in the catalogue of the Academy of Design Exhibition) is a view from a great elevation, as from a balloon or high tower, of the whole site and surrounding of this entrance. It is probably not an isometrical drawing, as it seems at first, but rather, if we have rightly observed, an ordinary perspective view taken from a point of sight high above the ground. Owing to the nature of the drawing we have been able, in describing the general character of the design, to speak with as much confidence as if a map or plan of the whole were in question. The praise we have given the design it evidently deserves. But owing to the small scale of the drawing, it is impossible to see all the architectural detail, the minuter portions being lost. Thus it is evident that Ionic capitals are used, but whether they are good Ionic is not so clear. Indeed, there is some uncertainty whether these capitals crown pilasters in every case, or whether some of them belong to three-quarter columns. This uncertainty in regard to some of the details is the more to be regretted, because what is visible of this detail is not good. The design of the gate-posts, for instance—whether it is of four pilasters or of four engaged columns that the body of each is made—is very inappropriate. Each is a clustered pier, cruciform in plan; there is a base, in plan a Greek cross, and very high, about five feet high it seems to be; upon this stands the cluster of pilasters or parts of columns; four halves of Ionic capitals look four different ways; and upon these rests a full classical cornice, which breaks around and into the twelve angles of this cross about four feet in greatest dimension, as if around the corners of a temple. The whole pier is about fifteen feet high, and upon each pier is placed a globe with a spread eagle perched upon it. The design seems as bad as it can be, until we find a worse one at another gate. The classical order could hardly be more improperly used than by this assembling together of its strength, four-fold, to hold up an eagle, while the blacksmith fastens into the face of the pilaster and into the base-mouldings or the plinth the iron hinges for the heavy gates. On the other hand, a worse gate-post could hardly be designed than by this selection of the least beautiful of the classical orders, and the use of it at considerable expense, where a granite block or a square brick pier would have been in every way better. The large central piers which support equestrian statues are each decorated with eight of the Ionic pilasters, leaving sunken panels between them. These larger piers are more graceful in shape than the small ones, but their details seem to be the same. They serve well for bases for the statues on them; as well, at least, as high, narrow, and isolated pedestals can serve, that is, they hold the statues up where they can be seen. Of course the worst place for a portrait statue is in the open air, and raised so high that the face cannot easily be seen. And these statues we suppose to be portraits. It is hard to say from the look of this design which of the four rather forced and fanciful names given to the Fifty-ninth Street gates may belong to this one, but it must be either the Scholars', the Merchants', the Artisans', or the Artists' Gate, and these horsemen must be portraits of persons eminent in one or another of these departments of human industry, since they certainly cannot be allegorical figures. Along the quarter circumference formed by the piece of wall which joins the two carriage gateways, and standing on little pedestals which rise just above this wall, are more statues, though these are on foot. Seven statues of marble or bronze (they seem to be marble), two equestrian statues, and eight eagles and globes! Truly the Commission should be very confident that they are using their statues in the best way—that they are setting them up where they can best be seen and enjoyed, most safely preserved and most useful to the park—before they spend the fifty thousand, sixty thousand, or seventy thousand dollars which this collection of them will cost.

The principal entrance to the park has always been that at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street. Almost all New Yorkers know the arrangement and connection of the roads and paths at this entrance. There is an open area, given by the park from off its south-east corner, rectangular in shape and about two hundred feet wide by three hundred long. From the northern end of this five gateways open into the park, all side by side and in a line running east and west. The outer one on each side is for a foot-path, between are the carriage entrance in the middle, the carriage exit to the west, and the bridle-path gate to the east.

There are two drawings which illustrate the design for this entrance. One is a bird's-eye view like that of the Eighth Avenue entrance; the other is called "Rear View of Terrace near the Entrance at corner of Fifth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street," and shows, besides the terrace itself, the gate-posts from one side in ordinary perspective. The drawings differ slightly as to the statues upon these gate-posts, but not as to their character. In all other respects, except a minor one, they seem to agree. The gate-posts, then, are built of solid stone or marble, with slightly sloping sides, quite plain except for a Doric cornice at their tops. As the sides slope inward, in order to get a vertical "hanging-style" for the gates to swing from, a sort of pilaster is built up from the base to a sufficient height in the middle of each side. In height these piers seem to be about fourteen feet. The two which divide the foot-paths from the drives and rides between are about five by ten feet in size of plan, the others are about five feet square. All are used as pedestals for statuary. The two larger ones support what seem to be copies of the popular and much copied groups known as the "Horses of Marly." The smaller piers hold single statues of men or groups each of a man and a dog. But the statuary is not clearly made out, and it would be hard to give to this gate its distinctive name from this alone or from anything which this drawing shows. Passing the sculpture, then, we find the gate-posts themselves certainly much better than at the Eighth Avenue gate. There is nothing deserving of special praise—they are only solid and suitable piers; nor is there anything deserving of blame, if we except what seems to us the degradation of the Doric cornice, thus put, with all its triglyphs, to do duty eight feet above the eye, and to answer no purpose except partially to conceal the sculpture above it.

The most remarkable feature of this entrance is the terrace near it, a structure which, if it should ever exist except in drawings, will be more entirely an addition for the purposes of ornament than anything about the park. It continues the open area outside the gates, projecting out over the low banks of the lake to the westward. The top is semi-circular, and raised a few feet above the level of the footway at this point, with two flights of steps going up to it, and a dwarf wall and continuous stone bench for parapet. So it shows from the Fifth Avenue side. From the park it shows as ornamental water-works: the semi-circular structure that supports the terrace above rises out of a double flight of water-steps—little cataracts one above another, with spouting fountains to each step. Below we have a circular basin, into which these cataracts pour, and a fountain in this also. There is an archway in the circular wall of the terrace, and out of this and into the basin of the fountain rides a bronze Neptune in his car, drawn by seven (or six, the large fountain obscures the view) bronze horses, who, in the large manner of the equipages of the marine gods, prance and bound in seven different directions.

This terrace, with its accessories—itself an accessory of no value at all—would cost a great deal of money. Useless as it is, injurious, as Mr. Vaux has shown it to be, to the meaning and purpose of that part of the park, expensive as it must be, the city would bear the cost of it with a little more grace if it were only beautiful. But it is very ugly. It is bare where it needs ornament, and covered with badly-designed and false ornament where none is needed. Feeble and worthless details are bad enough where we need the structure they are of, and must accept them for lack of better; but here, parts of an excrescence that nobody wants, and which would please nobody to see built but the architect and contractors, every one of them is an injury and an offence. Here is the old stock-in-trade of modern French pseudo-classical ornament, emblematic, all of it, no doubt, crowded with meaning; if only it were not such bad art, if only the meaning were not so commonplace. The bronze vuglarities have their ruling group, also of bronze, on the top of a tall column of poor design, namely, the coat-of-arms and its supporters of the city of New York "in the round"—an heraldic device not familiar to heralds, and certainly not ornamental. But if the presence there of that group is intended to dedicate the whole gate and its surroundings to the city of New York; if this is to be "the New York Gate," and if all the gods, men, dogs, horses, griffins, lions, eagles, and splashing water are in any way emblematic or representative of the city, the citizens should seriously protest, and beg the Commissioners to re-adopt the name they gave it before.

We have been in doubt which of the four names of the four Fifty-ninth Street entrances might belong to the Fifth Avenue, which to the Eighth Avenue entrance. But there can be no doubt as regards the other two. Easily recognizable marble personifications are sitting about each. The Sixth Avenue clearly leads to "The Artisans' Gate;" the Seventh Avenue to "The Artists' Gate;" and there is no doubt or dispute possible.

The Sixth Avenue entrance is graced by the presence of six goddesses or genii (the word genius must needs be of epicene gender when we talk of allegorical personages), who evidently have charge of the mechanical arts. They are raised on huge and high pedestals, each decorated with moulded cornice and base, round pediments, and sunken panels filled with slabs or bas-reliefs. They are colossal; yes, many times larger than life. They sit in an eternal calm, as goddesses should, having nought to do but to guard the sledge-hammers, driving-wheels, and other utensils which they bear as their attributes. The Seventh Avenue entrance has but four muses in attendance, but each of the four has in charge the little naked boy who is usually found at the knees of any personified Fine Art. The "hard-grained muses" of the mechanical arts at Sixth Avenue are comparatively modern conceptions; if little boys had been sent to learn of these, they perhaps had been clothed; but it is a sacred tradition that the pupils of Sculpture and Painting shall be nude. The goddesses here, too, are recognizable by their attributes; at least, she on the left with the Ionic capital must be Architecture; she with the sphynx must be Sculpture; she on the right next the gate may be Astronomy, but the presence of her colleagues indicates that she is Painting; that the flat tablet is a drawing-board or a stretched canvass, and that the apparatus below is not, as it seems, a globe.

The worship of personified virtues and arts and natural forces is the worst form of archaic superstition that exists, paralyzing the arts wherever it has influence. The day of such vanities is gone, never to return. The only art that is good for any people is an art that has reference to things the people are interested in and understand. If there is anything in which the American people are not interested and which they do not understand, it is the mythological repertoire of the modern classical artists. Even the personifications of the Pilgrim's Progress are less familiar than they were, and are less alive since the literature of the nineteenth century began its reign. The stock allegories of art are interesting to us only as we are a little antiquarian in our tastes, or very much under the influence of the artists of the sixteenth century.

The Seventh Avenue entrance has for its gate-posts two high, square piers, with colossal busts upon them, made to look a little like the popular Greek abstraction of Hermes. And, if this artists' gate is to be Greek in design, our very limited knowledge of Greek allegory and glyptic art will hardly supply a better emblem. But it should not be a gate-post; that much we think is evident; and it should be Greek and not French Greek, modern Greek, sham Greek, as these are. So with the Victory or Fame, who, perched on a lofty Ionic column, overlooks the scene and holds out crowns to the artists who are to throng this gate; a good statue of Victory or Fame is as good an emblem as we can get if we must have emblems; but the top of a high column is no place for it, and so badly designed a column as this, so clumsy, such a caricature of the Greek order, has no place on earth. And so at the Sixth Avenue entrance, the symbolism is not the worst thing; the worst things are the bad architecture, the poor and feeble bronze columns with composite capitals upon them and spiked globes for finials upon these, the little brackets branching out of the motley shaft, to hold lanterns and help carry the gates, the poverty of the details so plainly visible even in these small-scale drawings, the meaningless introduction of flagstaffs and "gonfalons," and the alteration of the whole face of the ground thereabouts, for the purpose of gaining a little commonplace "effect" on entering.

It is noticeable that Mr. Hunt has almost perfectly well conceived his subject. It is evident that he has grasped the whole matter in hand and can handle it. The accessories are all provided and set down as if already "in the form" somewhere. And this fact makes us the more sorry for the unmistakable badness of these designs and the more afraid of them. For it is clear that these are the designs themselves, matured and thought out and finished, and by no means crude and hasty sketches. The architect and the Commissioners know what they are about, it would seem, and are satisfied to go on and add these gateways, just as they see them in these drawings, to the beautiful Central Park.

For the community's sake we hope that something will prevent such a misstep as that. The fine arts in New York can hardly bear so severe a chill as that would be; they are not hardy enough yet. The people need no more examples than they already have of bad architecture and misapplied ornament. Let us have gates as plain as those of a farm-yard, unless the ornament shall be appropriate and the design beautiful.

FINANCIAL REVIEW.

SATURDAY A.M.

SINCE our last weekly notice, the Secretary of the Treasury has caused to be published the official state of the public debt of the United States, of all descriptions, as on 31st July ult. The following are the condensed figures:

PUBLIC DEBT OF UNITED STATES, JULY 31.

5-20s original	$514,780,500
5-20s new	91,789,000
6 per cents, 1881	282,961,450
10-40s, 5 per cents	172,770,100
Old 6 per cents	19,339,592
Old 5 per cents	27,022,000
Total gold-bearing	$1,108,662,642
7-30 per cents	$830,000,000
6 per cents, compound	212,126,470
5 per cents, notes	39,954,230
6 per cent. certificates	106,706,000
6 per cent. stock to Pacific Road	1,258,000
Deposits on interest	99,116,845
Total currency-bearing	$1,289,156,545
Greenbacks	$433,160,569
Fractional	25,750,032
Requisitions	15,736,000
Total free of interest	$474,646,601
Less on hand	116,739,632
Net Currency	$357,906,969
Debt past due	1,527,120
Total of all Debt	$2,757,253,276
Annual Interest in Gold	64,521,837
Annual Interest in Currency	74,740,630

The total debt of the United States on the previous statement of May 31 was $2,635,205,753, and it is generally admitted, since the appearance of the last exhibit, that the increase of $122,048,523 in the two months is much less than could have been reasonably expected from the extraordinary closing settlements with the army on the occasion of its being disbanded. The sudden cessation of the war in April and May devolved on the Treasury a large sum total of requisitions for June and July, which would have been otherwise spread over the fall months.

It will be noticed with much pleasure that the balances on hand in the Treasury, on 31st ult., are unusually heavy; so that, after providing for the extra requisitions referred to, the Secretary has ample resources to conduct his finances hence to the meeting of Congress, by the economical employment of his cash balances and accruing revenues and the judicious use of his 6 per cent. certificates of indebtedness. His cash balances are:

In gold	$35,337,857
In currency	84.401,775
Total	$116,739,632

It is probable that Mr. McCulloch will not suffer his gold balances to accumulate further at present, as his gold interest for three months to come is very light, while he will require $10,950,000 in currency to pay the 15th of August interest on the first series of $300,000,000 of 7.30 per cents, which sum he can readily derive from his surplus gold customs, by the gradual sale of seven or eight millions of gold, now believed to be going on. His accruing customs and revenue for August, September, and October, all in gold, may be estimated thus, including the out-ports:

August	$13,000,000
September	11,500,000
October	10,500,000
Together	$35,000,000
Present balances as above	35,337,857
Total	$70,337,857

His gold interest, to be paid:

September 1, on 10-40s	$4,319,252
November 1, on 5-20s	18,197,085
		22,516,337
Gold surplus after November 1 interest,		$47,821,520

The gold customs for July turned out $9,908,000 at New York (being almost 72 per cent. of the whole) and something like $3,850,000 at the out-ports; making a total for the month of $13,758,000. For the first four days in August our customs at New York are more than equal to the daily average of July, but are scarcely expected to run so throughout the month.

The accruing currency revenues from internal taxation are coming in quite freely, and will afford in August an average of nearly a million of dollars per day; most of the revenue taxes being made payable every month.

The outstanding certificates of indebtedness, at twelve months' date, bearing six per cent., amount on the present statement to $106,706,000. This time last year they amounted to $180,591,000, and on the meeting of Congress last December to about $250,000,000.

Altogether, the present exhibit and prospect of our national finances afford ground for increased confidence in the conduct and security of our large public debt, and also reflect credit on the practical skill and sound management of the present finance minister of the Government. It would be desirable to have such plain, straightforward exhibits of the state of the Treasury and the condition of the public debt at the close of every month in place of every sixty days.

Business during the past week has been very active among the dry goods importers. They have paid customs on over three and a half millions of goods in value, and are said to find a free market for nearly all descriptions. The foreign general merchandize import entries are also on a liberal scale. The gold customs on the dry goods and general merchandize market will exceed two and a half millions.

The export trade has not improved on the present week's return from the Custom House, but we learn that a large amount of cotton is in the course of shipment for Liverpool, not yet cleared at the Custom House, but which will appear in the next or succeeding weekly returns. The breadstuffs export is not encouraged by the latest news from the European crops and markets. The orders for shipment previously on hand were interfered with by the rumors of last week of bad harvest weather in some sections of the West, which induced a sudden speculation in wheat for home account. As these rumors are now found to have been grossly exaggerated, the market has become quiet.

The receipts of cotton for the week are over 15,000 bales. The estimates of the stock of old cotton remaining in the South continue very unsettled, but the freedom of the recent receipts at New Orleans, Mobile, and Memphis has induced greater confidence in the estimates of about 1,500,000 bales at the close of the war.

The European demand for United States 5-20s was active early in the week, and amount transmitted this week nearly two millions—last week nearly three millions. This operation appears to keep down the rate of exchange on London, notwithstanding the firmness in gold and the large calculations indulged in by the gold speculators that the current heavy importation of goods must throw the foreign balances against us.

The firmness in gold is not so marked at the close of the week as in the beginning, and the quotation is 143½ as against 145¾ last Saturday.

Money is dearer to the brokers and at one time difficult to borrow at 7 per cent., but on Friday and this morning the disposition to lend at this rate is quite equal to the demand from borrowers on call. Mercantile paper is 7 to 10 per cent. per annum.

UNITED STATES SECURITIES.

The U. S. 5-20s, old issue, rose to 107 per cent. at the beginning of the week on a very heavy order from London, but subsequently returned to 105½ to 105⅝ per cent. At the close they were 106 for the old and 105 for the new. The 6 per cents. of 1881 have slightly declined from 107¼ to 107; the 10-40s are the same as last Saturday, 97¼ per cent.

The 7.30 per cents (Currency Loans) fell to 98¾ for the second series early in the week on a momentary pressure of some large parcels from Government contractors, who subscribed to the loan last spring, and hypothecated the notes in bank for four months. The price is now 99¼ per cent. Treasury certificates are 97½ to 97¾ per cent. for the issues of 1865. The issues of last year have mostly found a resting place in bank, and cannot be had much under par value, as they are fast running to maturity.

STATE SECURITIES.

There is not much business in New York State stocks or in Border State bonds this week. Tennessees are 70½ to 71 per cent.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The mortgage bonds of most of the leading roads are firmly held, and but seldom offered at the stock exchange. The bidding is about as follows:

N. Y. Cen. 6s, 1883	92⅛	Chi. & N. W. S. Fund	91

Erie shares this week declined from 98 to 87, and then went up to 90¼ to 91 per cent. New York Central is now sold ex dividend, and stands 93 to 93¼ as against 95½, including the 3 per cent. August dividend. Reading is 107 to-day, the same as last Saturday; Hudson River is 113 per cent.; Michigan Central 109, same as last week; Michigan Southern declined from 67¼ to 66¼; Pittsburg 72¾ to 71; North-West firm at 28; North-West preferred advanced from 62⅝ to 63¼ per cent.; Fort Wayne declined from 98½ to 97¾ per cent.; Rock Island 108¾, same as last Saturday. Market rather tame this morning.

MISCELLANEOUS SHARES.

The changes not important since last week.

GOLD AND EXCHANGE.

Gold 143¼ to 143½; bills on London 108 to 108¼ for gold.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

THIS journal will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with care, has started on a journey through the South. His letters will appear hereafter every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

It embraces among its regular or occasional contributors the following names:

Henry W. Longfellow,
James Russell Lowell,
John G. Whittier,
Samuel Eliot (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford), Professor Torrey (Harvard),

"THE MAGIC."

MOODY'S PATENT SELF-ADJUSTING HOOP SKIRTS.

It is the only article of the kind manufactured that is never in the way either in the narrow church-pews, on horseback, or in any crowded place.

The new Trail Skirt of this peculiar manufacture is particularly recommended to ladies, as the flexible joints enable her to fold it about her person with much greater ease than a small one of the old style. Ladies are well aware that there is no article of dress which has heretofore caused so much trouble and annoyance as hoop skirts, and they should at least examine "The Magic" before purchasing.

THE BEST SEWING-MACHINES IN THE WORLD.

THE WEED MACHINES,

With all their valuable improvements, entirely overcome all imperfections. They are superior to all others for family and manufacturing purposes, simple in construction, durable in all their parts, and readily understood. They have certainty of stitch on all kinds of fabrics, and are adapted to a wide range of work without change or adjustment, using all kinds of thread. Will hem, fell, bind, gather, braid, tuck, quilt, cord, and, in fact, do all kinds of work required by families or manufacturers. We invite all persons in search of an instrument to execute any kind of sewing now done by machinery to inspect them, and recommend all parties engaging in the sale of sewing-machines to make sure they secure the best by examining the WEED before purchasing. They make the shuttle-stitch, which cannot be excelled for firmness, elasticity, durability, and elegance of finish. They have received the highest premiums in every instance where they have been exhibited in competition with other standard machines. The company being duly licensed, the machines are protected against infringements or litigation.

The Week.

THE week is garnished with a first-class defalcation—in the Phœnix Bank of this city, involving a large number of accomplices, a suicide, and an exposure of private immorality suited to the most corrupt taste; a first-class accident—the culpable collision of two steamers on Lake Huron, by which the Pewabic was sunk in five minutes, and nearly a hundred lives sacrificed; and a first-class failure, unless there be really a chance that it is not a failure—that of the Atlantic Cable, which, according to our latest intelligence, had been visited with a third total loss of insulation, at the end of twelve hundred miles. That the other defects have been repaired, however, still affords ground for hope.

The Union State Convention of Maine was held at Portland on the 10th. Its resolutions were clear and outspoken. They assert it to be the duty of Government to hold the rebellious States under provisional rule, so long as they cannot be safely trusted with the power of a free republic, and to demand as conditions of reconstruction the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment, the removal of all disabilities on account of color, and perfect equality secured to all. They urge the punishment of the Confederate civil and military authorities, and before all Jefferson Davis, for the crime of treason. They recommend an amendment of the Constitution to make the representation to Congress equal and uniform. They declare the national honor pledged to confer on the people of color in fact as well as in name all the political rights of freedom. On the first ballot for Governor, Gov. Cony, the present incumbent, received 553 out of 564 votes, and was then unanimously nominated.

CERTAIN citizens of Oberlin have addressed a letter to Gen. J. D. Cox, the Union candidate for Governor of Ohio. They enquire, feeling somewhat afraid of a reply in the negative, whether he is in favor of amending the State Constitution by striking from it the word "white," and of giving the freedmen the privilege of suffrage. The very long letter which they elicit may be summed up briefly enough. The General believes that there is an insurmountable antagonism of races at the South, and that the only hope of a homogeneous population there lies in colonizing the blacks in a territory carved out of Florida, Georgia, and one or two adjacent States. This he would organize as a dependency of the United States analogous to our Western Territories, allowing full political privileges to the inhabitants. He thinks that thus the people of color will be enabled to develop their capacity to the utmost, and no longer be as at the North lawyers without a brief, or doctors without a patient. To tolerate the present commingling of blacks and whites he conceives to be the preservation of confusion, which the bestowal of the ballot upon the former would but make worse confounded.

A GANG of ruffians in Greenwich, Conn., on the night of Saturday week, attacked the house of a peaceful and respectable colored citizen named Davenport, for the purpose of outraging the persons of himself and wife, who happens to be a white woman. This marriage took place some two years ago, but the parties were obliged to retire to this city until the prejudices roused by the occurrence should be allayed. A few weeks ago they returned, and the riotous demonstration followed. It was headed by a notorious blackguard and dangerous character, who had worn the army blue without honoring it, and was a worthy member of the "Hellfire Club." The attempt of the mob to intimidate the inmates of the house was seconded by an onslaught with various missiles. They persisted, against the warnings of Davenport's aged mother, and she fired twice at them with an old-fashioned blunderbuss. The returned soldier fell, not undeservedly, and his supporters fled. Davenport was duly arrested, a coroner's jury empanelled, and a verdict of "justifiable homicide" correctly rendered. The prisoner was, of course, discharged. The most extraordinary part of the whole proceeding was the remarks addressed to Davenport by two of the jurymen, after their verdict had been announced. A Mr. Philander Button, deacon of the Congregational Church, instead of branding with infamy the disturbers of the peace, reproached their intended victim for marrying a white woman. This he conceived to be "doing a great wrong to the community." To be sure, it was not forbidden by law, but it was a great impropriety, and tended "to excite the strong disapprobation of citizens." As a friend, he advised Davenport to leave the town. While he stayed, he should be protected as he just had been, but he would be in danger, and had better go. He would not ask Davenport to abandon his wife; unfortunately that could be effected only through the laws of divorce. He acquitted him and his mother of all blame in this matter, but thought him deserving of severe censure for his behavior in other respects. Dr. Hoyt said ditto to Deacon Button, and was shocked to find that the prisoner seemed to glory in the act of self-defence by which a fellow-creature had been slain. "We must," he added, speaking for the jury, "by the usages of society and the laws of decency, disapprove of your life." The inhabitants of the town, however, think themselves well delivered of Ludlam Chard, and appear to have lost no particle of their former respect for Davenport, who is a sober and worthy man. Nevertheless he has prudently left Greenwich again, and, as a sad termination of the affair, his father has gone insane. We hear of no prosecution of the cowardly offenders.

GOVERNOR PARSONS, of Alabama, has issued an address to the people of that State, providing for the appointment of State officials, and the resotration of the civil authority. He is emphatic in his acknowledgment that "there are no more slaves in Alabama," and that "the Slave Code is a dead letter," and that "they who were once slaves must be governed by the laws of Alabama as free men." The address is in most ways unexceptionable, but the loyal Alabamians are, nevertheless, not satisfied. We have received a letter from a captain of the First Alabama (Union) Cavalry, now in Montgomery, in which he says:

"President Johnson has unjustly appointed an out-and-out rebel as Governor of Alabama (that is not the only State so served, either). Gov. Parsons, of Alabama, introduced a bill into the Legislature of that State, while a member under the Confederate régime, to outlaw every Alabamian who enlisted in the Federal Army, striking at twelve hundred men of my regiment. Now he is appointed Governor under Federal authority, and that regiment reports to him. Many of the officers, including Colonel and Brevet Brigadier-General Spencer and myself, immediately mustered out, refusing to serve any longer.

"We go home to live under laws approved and enforced by a man whom we have been fighting for four years."

Mr. Stanton recently authorized a statement to be made that he had, since Lee's surrender, sent 790,000 men to their homes from the Government employ. On being asked how many remained, he answered that the close of the war found 1,000,000 in the service. It is hard to say which is more remarkable, the skill and energy displayed in raising, organizing, clothing, and feeding such enormous hosts, or the skill and promptness displayed in breaking and scattering them. And in what other nation could such a host have been disbanded without communicating even a tremor to the body politic?

Three or four hundred soldiers paraded the streets of New York on Friday last in procession, to let the world know that they were in want of employment, and that the public was not dealing fairly with them. Considering the object they had in view, they cut a sorry figure; for, as far as we could see, they were all well dressed and able-bodied. The fact is, that many of these gentlemen are a little over particular about the kind of situation they will take, and display an unreasonable fondness for city life. Anywhere out of New York they can find work in abundance, and it is scarcely fair to blame the merchants here for the overcrowding of the labor market in this particular spot wrought by the laborers themselves. The shocking condition in which so large a proportion of the poorer classes live, is two-thirds due to their dislike of the country.

It is difficult to keep pace with the numerous official and unofficial reports of the condition of the freedmen. The municipal authorities of Washington have evaded a law of Congress directing them to provide for the education of the blacks at the Capital. The Eastern Shore of Virginia has lost in the course of the war two-thirds of its able-bodied black men and one-fourth of their women and children. The capable men who remain are earning ten dollars a month, with board and lodging, as farm hands, and are hired by the year. Nobody could believe, without unquestionable evidence, that the attack of the colored on the white railroad laborers at Acquia Creek, on the night of August 1, was wanton and unprovoked. The latest version of the affray traces the difficulty to an altercation between a negro and a white man, in which the former met firmly the threats and intimidation of the latter. The gang of whites conspired to seize and flog the negro, which they did unmercifully. The black gang undertook to avenge their comrade. An examination has resulted in sending the ex-Confederate soldiers, for such they were, to the chain-gang of Petersburg, imprisoning the superintendent who encouraged them, and reinstating the black laborers. In Stafford County a slaveholder named Allsop attempted to retain his slaves by force, until compelled by the military to set them free. The potency of the President's Proclamation ab initio—a point to which we alluded in our last—is to be tried in the person of John Minor Botts. He has refused to pay the wages of a negro servant whom he owned and held up to the time of Lee's surrender, though the slave had abundant opportunities to escape. An interesting case has just been decided at Norfolk. A colored woman sues for her hire as a cook since the occupation of the city by the United States troops, May 10, 1862. Defendants assert that she did not comply with the bond, and that the relation of master and slave had been so disturbed by the presence of the military that they were unable to compel her labor. Plaintiff denies that the status of the colored people was changed until the date of the Proclamation, and even then Norfolk was specially excepted from its operation. As no proof was adduced of a failure to comply with the bond, the verdict was given in the woman's favor. The hostile feeling between whites and blacks is said to be abating in Norfolk. At Fortress Monroe the Freedmen's Bureau of the district recently disposed of grain, lumber, and cotton, the products of the freed people, amounting to upwards of $15,000. Renewed abuse of the colored people has broken out in Richmond, so as even to elicit from them a petition to Gen. Terry. The colored men are forming a Loyal League, which is likely to be a numerous body. The colored schools in Richmond have closed for the season. From North Carolina we have more stories of violence, including the murder of four colored men in a manner that strongly recalls the worst enormities of the border-ruffians in Kansas. Some conflict has arisen between the civil and military authorities in regard to jurisdiction, with the usual result. The disarming of the negroes under an old State law has been stopped. In the interior of South Carolina the contract system is making some headway, and, as an experiment, is moderately successful; unless supported by troops, it would be nullified by the bad faith of the planters. The black colonists of the islands are doing well, as ever. Gen. Canby has informed the persecuting whites of Louisiana that the enforcement of State and local laws which discriminate against the people of color will not be permitted, and that the United States courts alone have jurisdiction in respect to the latter. Every county in Mississippi has now some officer of the Freedmen's Bureau. More than 10,000 contracts have been signed and registered by more than 50,000 freedmen. The crops look well, and the laborers are industrious. Not a dozen freedmen west of Little Rock, Arkansas, are receiving aid from Government, but all are self-supporting. Gen. Swayne writes from Mobile in high praise of the behavior of the freedmen of that city. They are subjected to the ill-will of the rabble, and to extortions by the city authorities. Gen. Fisk exposes the unnecessary distribution of rations to the people in his district, and calls for a reform. He has already cut off all "professional" refugees. The present system is promotive of ignorance, idleness, and crime. A case of downright bad faith—a three-fold breaking of contracts—on the part of an ex-slaveholder, has been brought before the court of the Freedmen's Bureau, in Nashville. Kentucky has furnished 28,818 black troops to the national army. They are all retained in the service, and a part have been sent to Texas. 24,000 women and children have been freed by their enlistment, under the law of Congress. The war has freed altogether 100,000 persons in Kentucky.

Another Southern bishop manifests scruples about praying for the President while military rule is exerted in his diocese. Bishop Green, of Mississippi, charges the clergy under him to await the restoration of the civil authority before they pray for the head of the nation. Like Bishop Wilmer, he hopes that the Church North and South will be kept as distinct as they have been made by the rebellion.

The only three Provisional Governors who are acquitted of all complicity with rebellion, are those of Florida, Texas, and Tennessee. Gov. Marvin, of the first named State, has undoubtedly the easiest task before him. He has been preceded and is supported by a judicious military rule, and the people are submitting quietly to the social revolution. His appointments are said to be discriminating, and not all in favor of a reaction. Gov. Hamilton, of Texas, is one who was expelled for his loyalty from the district to which he returns a potentate. He made a speech soon after his arrival in Galveston, elaborately contraverting the doctrine of secession. In a proclamation issued from that city on the 25th of July, he announces the registration of the loyal as preliminary to any election, and lays down the oath which must be taken. The convention to be assembled will be empowered to alter and amend the present Constitution of the State, or frame a new one—an important alternative, which we do not remember to have seen suggested by any other governor. The absolute, irrevocable destruction of slavery is dwelt upon. "The negroes are not only free," says Gov. Hamilton, "but I beg to assure my fellow-citizens that the Government will protect them in their freedom." How much is meant by a subsequent sentence we will not venture to predict:

"Candor compels me to say to the people of Texas that if in the action of the proposed convention the negro is characterized or treated as less than a freeman, our senators and representatives will in vain seek admission to the halls of Congress."

It may be remarked here that there is no mention of color or reference to State laws in the qualifications required of voters. Gov. Brownlow can congratulate himself on the orderly conduct of the Tennessee election of the 3d, even if only four loyal candidates out of eight were chosen to represent the State in Congress. Horace Maynard is one of these. Emerson Etheridge was defeated.

THE Kentucky election on the 7th resulted in the choice of at least five of the nine Union nominees for Congress, Rousseau defeating Mallory in the fifth district. Louisville showed what can be accomplished even in a slave State by a press from which the gags have been taken off. The city gave a handsome majority for Rousseau, and elected all her candidates to the State Legislature who were favorable to the Amendment. The Union party has overcome the pro-slavery majority of the last election, but it is doubtful if the Amendment will be ratified.

THE White House has been condemned as a summer residence, from the experience of the present and a long series of years. A Presidential mansion is to be selected on Georgetown Heights.

GEN. THOMAS said at Elmira, on the 10th, that "Maximilian would have to get out of Mexico, or we would hurry him out. The Monroe Doctrine must be enforced." We hope he had some better reason for this undertaking than that "we are now in a condition to hold our own against the world." It is easier to hold our own than to hold somebody else's.

WADE HAMPTON, who was one of the most determined of the soldiers who served under Gen. Lee, has written a letter to the editor of a Southern journal, in which he warmly urges all rebels not to think of leaving their country, but to take the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government. This, he says, is the course which he intends himself to pursue. As no one is so weak as to believe that Mr. Hampton has become a loyalist, or that he has changed his political opinions in any respect, it would not be difficult, even had he been silent on the subject, to guess his motive of action. What that motive is he frankly states. He looks to a renewal of the old struggle in the Union. Having done his worst for slavery as a soldier in rebellion, he submits to the decision of arms, and purposes, not to accept the issue as final, and behave like a man of peace, but to fight as hard as ever he fought, but with the weapons that are adapted to political warfare. He is not without hope that the cause lost on the field may be retrieved at the polls. Knowing the country well, he is aware that "a united South" would hold out great inducements to a party in the North to come to its aid. Should the South become as one community, and the colored population remain disfranchised, it would be sure to regain its ancient position, could it prevail upon even less than a fourth part of the North to coalesce with it as firmly as they did in 1856. But it would much lessen the prospect of the South becoming united, were many of the disbanded rebels to leave the United States in disgust, either for Mexico, or Brazil, or any other country. Hence Mr. Hampton earnestly advises them to give up all thoughts of emigration, and to trust to the future and to the Democracy for bringing about the return of better days—that is, better days for the country's enemies, but decidedly worse days for the country. How far his ideas of restoration extend we have no positive means of ascertaining, but judging from the well known character and opinions of the man, we think we do not go too far when we say that probably he looks to the restoration of even slavery itself. There is nothing new in this. Partisans of a restoration are the most extreme of extremists. The hottest of liberal radicals is a man of ice compared to them. There were men in the first Parliament of Charles II. who would have restored even the Star Chamber and the High Commission Court; and it is not quite fifty years since la Chambre Introuvable would have restored the old monarchy in France, including the Bastile and lettres de cachet. We think it is Lamartine, himself a royalist of those days, who describes that chamber as being "like another France dug out of the ruins and the ashes left by invasion." We do not believe it would be possible to elect a Congress in the United States that would closely resemble the French Chamber of Deputies that met immediately after the second Restoration; but such men as Hampton and those who think with him would think it possible, and their labors would be governed by their belief. The effect would be to keep the country in a state of constant fever. Repose would be unknown. A new revolution would eventually take place. The struggle between parties would be not unlike to that which characterized French politics from 1815 to 1830. The Revolution of July was an effort on the part of the thinking men of the French nation to get rid of rulers who were determined that there should be no quiet in their country until it should consent to resume its old chains. We should have a similar struggle here, and the second rising against the slaveocracy would be fatal to them, unless they should chance to be victorious. The contest would have to be fought under flags that should indicate that no quarter could be granted by the victors.

ONE hardly knows whether to rejoice or to be amused at the honors now paid at the South to Labor, that hitherto much abused and despised divinity. The New Orleans Picayune says the demoralization of the negroes of Louisiana has led the whites to take hold vigorously and industriously of the necessary work, and, in consequence, they have produced some of the best crops now growing. The Southern Cultivator (of Georgia) shows the advantages that will accrue to the household from the mistress attending to it herself. Her æsthetic sense will no longer be troubled by a shabby row of negro shanties. She will not be responsible for the nurture of babies not her own. There will be no sick to attend to, nor idle and quarrelsome servants to keep busy and peaceable, nor any more cutting-out of "vast piles" of negro clothing. And domestic theft can now be easily traced and fastened upon the delinquent, and, "with the gang of little negroes turned off," there may be some fruit left in the orchard, and perchance some vegetables in the kitchen garden. In town, to be sure, the duties of the mistress will be considerably increased. But then, what a gain it will be to call upon her children for help! We may venture to say, that, for the girls to take care of their own chambers and the family rooms, yea, and even to be required to do it, "will be a life-long benefit to them." More yet: "If they have to pick up and arrange what they have carelessly scattered, to remove the dirt and litter they bring in, they will soon be educated to neat and orderly habits." After this, no wonder that the Lynchburg Republican can declare: "Labor is a duty every man owes to himself as well as to the community in which he lives," or quote Carlyle: "Consider how, in the meanest labor, the whole soul of man is composed into a kind of real harmony the instant he sets himself to work!"

THE sight of a cruel instrument for punishing and preventing runaways at the South, suggests the importance and historic value of a collection which shall for ever remain a mute yet powerful witness of the horrors of American slavery. The Tower of London might be rivalled in this department. We suggest to Mr. Barnum that he has here a field worthy of his best energies. But he must be active and betimes, for between the self-condemned slaveholder and the emancipated slave the evil vestiges of the late barbarism will fast be destroyed.

STILL further intelligence from South America acquaints us with the sanguinary progress of the war on the Plate River. On the 11th of June a naval engagement took place on the Paraná, near Riachuelo, a short distance below Corrientes. The Paraguayans had a fleet of eight steamers and six floating batteries, carrying forty-seven guns, besides a land battery of thirty guns. The Brazilian fleet consisted of nine steamers with sixty-two guns. The conflict was desperately waged from 9 A.M. till 4 P.M., the Paraguayans making the attack and being terribly defeated. Only four of their steamers withdrew. Their land forces, however, have been more successful. The army which was threatening Rio Grande crossed the Uruguay below San Borja in the face of slight opposition, and afterwards entered that place, which was abandoned by its garrison. The army invading Corrientes has been largely reinforced, and it seems doubtful if the Argentine commander

Gen. Urquiza, can check it. President Flores, of Uruguay, had arrived at Buenos Ayres with three battalions on his way to the field.

JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE has arrived in England. The friends of Bishop Colenso presented him with £3,330 on the eve of his setting out for Natal. It is rumored that Lord Palmerston will retire from office before the new Parliament assembles. Prussia is agitated with questions of free speech and free meetings. The working-men of Berlin have provided for a monster gathering to assert the latter right. The proposed banquet to the liberal deputies at Cologne was broken up by the military on the 22d. On the following day the members were reunited at Oberlahnstein, and were not interfered with till near the close of their proceedings, when the hotel was cleared and some arrests are reported to have been made. The cholera still infests the Mediterranean. Malta has suffered to an alarming extent, and by non-intercourse is now more than ever isolated. Spain has been invaded.

IT appears by the English emigration returns, that seven persons out of ten of those who leave British soil come to the United States. This is the strongest testimony that could possibly be offered of the general security and prosperity enjoyed in this country—evidence which no other kind of statistics could possibly refute. There are immense tracts of fertile waste land in Turkey, Russia, and the Danubian provinces, but who thinks of emigrating to those countries?

FOUR men have at last lost their lives in making the descent of the Matterhorn, and as one nearly lost his life last year, it is to be hoped that the "Alpine Club" will now subside for a while. The practice which Ruskin stigmatizes of using the Alps as "a greased pole" for young men to exhibit their dexterity upon has had a fair run, and neither the health nor character of the English youth is at all likely to suffer by their confining themselves during the next few years to the safer peaks and passes.

IT was one of the grievances of the old order of things in this country, that colored seamen from the North were detained in jail as long as their vessels tarried in many if not all of the Southern ports. Samuel Hoar was expelled from Carolina for attempting to contest the legality of this regulation, in behalf of certain citizens of Massachusetts who had been unjustly restrained by it of their liberty. Nor was any other effort to obtain redress effectual. We learn that complaints against the same iniquitous practice in Cuba have been laid before the French marine and colonial minister. In a circular to the chambers of commerce, dated June 30, he says that he is informed from the French consulate at Havana that the measure complained of is a general one, and has been often protested against to the Spanish authorities, without success. There is, however, a way to avoid the rigor of the law. Captains can retain their colored seamen on board by giving bonds, which are never exacted in money, the affidavit of the consignee being accepted instead. We hope, if any case shall arise involving the rights of a colored citizen of this country, that our protest will be vigorous enough to be respected. The world has got beyond being bullied by a slaveholding aristocracy, whether its head be in Richmond or Madrid.

AN immense Saengerfest has been held at Dresden, beginning on the 22d of July. More than fifteen thousand singers congregated there from all parts of Germany, besides representatives from the societies of London, Paris, Lyons, St. Petersburg, and New York. Each society had its banner in the grand procession, where more than a thousand of them waved together. At the concert given on Sunday, the King and Queen of Saxony, several princesses of the imperial family, and many ministers were present. When the performance was over, the seats were converted into tables, and the rest of the evening was spent in drinking toasts and making speeches.

AN international agreement was signed at Geneva on the 22d of August, 1864, and ratified at Berne on the 22d of June last by the representatives of France, Baden, Belgium, Denmark, Spain, Italy, the Netherlands, Prussia, and Switzerland. The preamble sets forth the desire of the powers in convention to mitigate, as far as may be, the evils inseparable from war, to suppress useless rigors, and to ameliorate the lot of wounded soldiers on the field of battle. Ten articles follow, guaranteeing the neutrality of military hospitals and ambulances, so long as they contain either sick or wounded, and remain unguarded by a military force; also, of all those persons legitimately connected with them during the exercise of their functions. In case of occupation by the enemy, these persons may continue to discharge their duty under neutral protection, or may rejoin the forces to which they belong, at their option. If they prefer the latter course, they shall be forwarded to the enemy's outposts by the army of occupation. The property of hospitals remains subject to the laws of war, but those who withdraw from them shall retain their private property. Ambulances will be entirely released. The inhabitants of the country who shall bear succor to the wounded shall be respected as neutrals, and shall be so forewarned by the generals on either side; and whatever house receives a wounded soldier shall have in him a safeguard, nor shall any troops be quartered upon it, nor any war-tax exacted of it. The sick and wounded shall be collected and cared for without regard to their nationality, and commanders-in-chief may forward to the enemy's outposts his wounded during the conflict, when circumstances permit and both parties consent. Those who, upon recovery, are found to be incapable of service shall be returned to their country, and the remainder on condition that they will not take up arms while the war lasts. Evacuations, and the persons directing them, shall be covered by an absolute neutrality. A distinctive and uniform flag shall be adopted for hospitals, ambulances, and evacuations, to be accompanied in all cases by the national standard. An armlet will also be admissible to protect the neutrality of persons, but the bestowal of it shall be left to the military authorities. The flag and armlet will bear a red cross on a white field. The details of the execution of this agreement shall be left to the commanders of the belligerents, subject to the instructions of their respective governments. Other powers are invited to join those who have already contracted. Great Britain, Sweden and Norway, Greece, and the Duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, have already signified officially their adhesion. Portugal, Hesse, and Wirtemberg only await certain necessary formalities before following suit. No doubt our own country will make haste to do the same. The Government acted constantly throughout the war in the spirit of this beneficent agreement.

PRIOLEAU, the partner in Liverpool of Trenholm, the late rebel Secretary of the Treasury, holds the bills of lading of a quantity of cotton consigned to him by the rebel government in its last hours, to be disposed of on its account. The cotton has arrived in Liverpool; he is out of pocket in consequence of his dealings with the "young nation" to the tune of £20,000, and consequently he holds on to it. The United States Government, as the legal owner of the effects of the Confederacy, has moved in Chancery for an order to restrain him from disposing of the cotton or bills of lading, and the cause was argued July 26, before the Vice-Chancellor. His decision is a curious one, but as it decides nothing, the order being simply interlocutory, there is not much to be said about it that would interest anybody but a lawyer. He holds that although the United States take the property of the defunct government, they take it subject to its contracts; and he has therefore allowed Prioleau to hold the cotton, as security for his debt, until the hearing two months hence.

THE length of the Mont Cenis Tunnel will be 12,200 metres. At the close of last year 4,083 metres, or a good third of the whole, had been pierced from both ends. To this has been added, between January first and June tenth of the present year, 654 metres. The boring machines are now greatly retarded by encountering a stratum of granite and quartz. This had been accurately predicted by M. Sismonda and other geologists, who assigned 2,000 metres as its probable distance from the exterior of the mountain. M. Sommeiller (who is evidently no sleeper) meets with it after advancing 2,090 metres.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.—REDUCTION OF CURRENCY.

THE recent statement from the Treasury put at rest, quite suddenly, the wide-spread predictions of embarrassment which followed the closing up of the last 7.30 per cent. loan. It was said that the borrowing power of the Secretary was at an end until the meeting of Congress; that his wants through the ensuing four months would be great; and that nothing short of "forced loans" or discreditable postponements would save the Treasury from bankruptcy. So confidently were these rumors assumed as facts, that in at least one instance the opposition press in this city urgently advised the President to call Congress together, insinuating at the same time that he could do nothing else to save the public finances. There was more said of even a less charitable nature. The public debt was represented as having grown so rapidly since the termination of hostilities that the Secretary dare not make his statement to the country. The idea that he could control or command the money market to his "necessities" through the fall months was sneered at as something altogether out of the question. Even some of the leading spirits of the New York bank parlor were casting about —and we are not sure but a few of them still indulge the fancy—to see how and when they could serve Mr. McCulloch, expecting very soon, of course, to be called upon, and be sought, like old Trabois, in the "Fortunes of Nigel," to "come down" with a small loan "for a consideration!"

It is not within our present purpose to notice all the "plans" of bank "accommodation" which were supposed to be in embryo near the close of July, though some of them would, perhaps, be amusing enough to the financial if not the general reader. That they have not been matured, or, if matured, asked for by the Secretary, is one among many proofs that the official statement of July 31 is a surprise, and in more senses than one.

The condition of the Treasury established the fact that the Secretary is master of the situation. His debt was swollen by the sudden heavy requisitions made after the close of hostilities to pay off a disbanded and disbanding army and navy, of course, but not to the extent by one or two hundred millions which the wild and (some of them) wicked rumors had given out. The total for two months had been increased only $122,000,000, and his requisitions had been paid off almost to the last dollar. The remnant of claims in the Department, awaiting the proper audit or proper receipt, was less than sixteen millions, and he had one hundred and sixteen millions in his till, of which thirty-five millions were in gold. He had not used his power (which, by-the-way, is unlimited) to issue certificates of indebtedness as rapidly as he had paid off the old certificates maturing in the sixty days by twenty millions of dollars. The outstanding total of this class of paper had been reduced in the course of his five months' administration of the Treasury nearly one hundred millions, and to a point one hundred and fifty millions below the maximum of last November, on the eve of the meeting of Congress. It is also found since the statement appeared that the internal revenues of the Government are bringing into the Treasury from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 per month in currency, and the customs revenue from $11,000,000 to $14,000,000 per month in gold. From the last named source alone it is calculated that he could derive seventy millions in currency, if need be, from the sale of his surplus customs at any time before the 1st November, and yet leave a balance of $18,000,000 or $20,000,000 in gold, and the whole of the November customs, for the half-yearly coupons to be presented in the course of that month on the 5-20 loans.

It is thus seen that the ways and means for the four months to come are as ample as the progress of the public debt, and the prompt liquidation of the claims growing out of the close of hostilities is signally gratifying. In round numbers, the Secretary's cash balance to begin with is over a hundred millions, gold and currency, while the revenues for the four months should be, and we have no reason to doubt will be, over one hundred millions in currency and fifty millions in gold to the first week in December, when Congress will convene, while in addition to his power to employ new certificates to meet any deficiency, he has some unexhausted remnants of old loans, amounting in the aggregate, perhaps, to eighty millions, of which over half is authorized in compound legal tender notes. We do not know that he will resort to any of these balances. We are almost sure he will not increase, but rather seek gradually to diminish, his interest-bearing legal tenders. This will probably be his first step looking to a contraction of the currency. He has the assured ability to do so, by his present independent command of the money market, so far as his own finances are or were supposed to be dependent upon it; and while we look for nothing rash or precipitate from Mr. McCulloch, we believe he has the purpose to set about the gradual but certain contraction of the currency in the direction referred to.

Such a policy might check speculations in gold and railway stocks and in the commodities of the corn exchange, but it would conserve, if not advance, the public stocks of the Government. The real credit of these stocks undoubtedly rests, and their market value should rest, on the thorough soundness and security of the public finances, and not on the mere fact that the interest is paid in gold, and made by the high price of gold more valuable for the time than most other sources of income. While, therefore, the real or substantive attraction to these stocks is their solidity and security as an emanation of the public faith, amply backed by taxation, every holder should feel, as most of them did after the battle of Gettysburg in 1863, and after Lee's surrender last spring, that his bond is more valuable to him, and its credit a greater source of pride, with gold at 120 or 130, than while speculation, on the pretext of a redundant legal tender currency, holds it firm between 140 and 150 per cent. in the midst of peace.

The war loans of the Government were popularized from the start, with a very few unimportant exceptions. They were placed directly among the people, without sacrifice to the Government. They were subscribed for at par, and are still held for the most part, and will continue to be held, irrespective of the contingencies of ordinary speculation, whether on the stock or gold exchange. It is not too much to assume that they will rise in credit with the gradual fall in the volume of what is now played upon by speculation as a redundant Government currency.

The public debt, having passed through the fiery trials of the war against rebellion at the South and the menaces and misrepresentations of a discontented opposition at the North, seeking, through the Presidential canvass of 1864, to seize the reins of government, is now being rapidly cleared up for the peace establishment. Its assumed total of three thousand millions has ceased to be a terror to the loyal masses, as it was made to appear in the whirl of party politics and vicious gold gambling last fall. It has almost ceased to furnish aid to the demagogue and comfort to the disaffected. It is found that the burthen is not too great to be borne, in its amplest measure, nor too unwieldy to be diminished, year by year, by taxation and the development of the taxable resources, until the close of the next decade shall find the principal less than two thousand millions and the rate of interest no greater than five per cent. Beyond that period we shall not undertake to forecast the movement of our so-called war debt, which, even at its maximum, is less by a thousand millions than the war debt of Great Britain after the general peace of 1815. The difference in population and resources between Great Britain then and the United States now we need not comment upon. It is sufficient to know that we are as able to bear the burthen of interest, and even more solicitous to set about liquidating the principal. The cause in which both debts were incurred was too sacred for the thought of repudiation, even if our burthen were greater than it is, and the instincts of both peoples too honest as well as too practical and persevering to halt by the way under any discouragement. Such is the experience of the British debt for the past fifty years; such, we are assured, will be the experience of the public debt of the United States for the next fifty years, should it be suffered so long to remain unpaid, which we are far from believing.

INDIAN BLOOD.

Deacon Button's remonstrance addressed to the negro in Connecticut the other day for not letting himself be mobbed quietly for having married a white woman, suggests some enquiry as to the reason why the intermarriage of negroes and whites should be popularly considered so very outrageous, and even criminal, while the intermarriage of whites and Indians is considered either not blameworthy at all, or only an offence against taste. For Mr. Button, it must not be forgotten, is simply a specimen of a large class, and when he blurted out his sermon to Davenport, he simply expressed at an unfortunate time a feeling which is entertained by thousands of the same mental calibre, though more reticent than himself. If Davenport had been an Indian, Mr. Button would probably have said his say in his behalf, in his stupid way, as heartily as anybody, and been just as indignant over the attack on his domestic quiet as the more intelligent and Christian members of the community have been.

Now, why are the Buttons of the country less horrified by matrimonial alliances between whites and Indians than between whites and negroes? Or, to put the question more strongly, as well as more correctly, why is it considered not only no disgrace, but something to be boasted of, for a white man or woman to have Indian blood in his or her veins? Why do a large number of very respectable families throughout the country mention this as one of their genealogical claims to respect? Why is it that if one of Mr. Button's ancestors had married a squaw, he (the present Button) would probably mention the fact with a chuckle, and neither see in it, nor expect you to see in it, any impropriety beyond what might arise from the squaw's want of familiarity with the usages of genteel Caucasian society?

It must not be forgotten that as between the personal appearance of the Indian and the African, according to our notion of beauty, there is really either nothing to choose, or the negro has decidedly the advantage. The long-faced, eagle-nosed, gentlemanly-looking ragamuffin who figures as the "Indian warrior" in illustrated editions of Cooper, we need hardly say, has never been found anywhere else. The "stern reality" was always a flat-nosed, high-cheek-boned, low-browed, large-mouthed, heavy-jawed, villanous, and stupid-looking person. In mere expression, that most important attribute of the human countenance, there has probably never been an Indian who could be compared to two-thirds of the American negroes. The Indian, as we find him, and have always found him, wears two looks, neither of which is matrimonially prepossessing—the one of utter vacuity, the other of devilish ferocity. Most negroes, on the contrary, who have ever been relieved from the bestial drudgery of the plantation, have faces which, if homely in outline, at least light up, if not with high intelligence, with social instinct and sympathy.

In character it is difficult to rate the Indian too low. There is no proof that he ever raised himself above the condition of a hunter, and all attempts made to civilize the race by influences brought to bear from without, have proved such utter failures as to lead many to doubt whether it is capable of civilization at all—the very worst charge that can be brought against a race. He has lived for ages in the same condition, or, in fact, a rather worse one, than the tribes in the interior of Africa. The arts in which he has excelled are those in which all savages excel. He has displayed considerable skill and courage as a fighter, but his mode of warfare has always been of a kind for which the civilized world has little esteem. Of the possession of soldierly qualities, in the civilized sense of the term—amenability to discipline, sense of the value of subordination, mutual confidence, self-forgetfulness—he has never given any proof. His personal habits are dirty, his whole appearance revolting, and the defects of the race are, as usual, more marked in the women than in the men. Yet to have sprung from the loins of a cut-throat of this sort is actually considered to this day by the Buttons of America as, if not a feather in their cap, at least nothing to be ashamed of. The negro, on the other hand, even if we take him as his enemies describe him, has always had in this country a social value far beyond any that has ever been assigned to the Indian. He has proved himself capable, if not of the highest order of cultivation, of a very high degree of civilization. He has founded and carried on more than one political organization, which, even if imitative, is in every way respectable. He has filled most of the humbler spheres amongst ourselves with efficiency and credit. He was in the last century in nearly all the States a citizen. He is singularly facile in temperament, and takes what is called polish of exterior with remarkable readiness. His countenance is pleasing, even when ugly, and he has proved himself, in this country at least, as capable as large numbers of the whites of comprehending and acting upon the leading social and political ideas of the age. And he has submitted on the battle-field, both in our service and in that of other countries, to that supreme test of soldiership—standing in line or advancing under fire on open ground—with complete success—a test to which we venture to say no Indians were ever exposed or could be got to submit.

That there are objections to intermarriage between whites and negroes we freely admit, and it is not a part of our present purpose to examine them; but there is not one of them which may not be urged with equal force against intermarriage between whites and Indians. On moral and political, psychological and physiological, grounds, as well as on grounds of taste, there is just as much to be said against one as the other. Not that the Buttons ever go so far into the matter as this. Their objection to negro marriage is simply one of feeling. The word "nigger" contains in it something that inspires loathing, they cannot very well tell why; the word Indian does not.

The fact that so many negroes have been slaves will not account for this preference for the Indian. Men of other races have been enslaved without damaging the matrimonial prospects of their descendants, or making alliances with them seem an ineffaceable disgrace. The real ground of the preference amongst the Button genus, we think, is to be found in the greater ferocity of the Indian, and if it be the true one, it furnishes a curious commentary on what is called Christian civilization. Attempts to enslave, mob, rob, or maltreat Indians, they have generally met by cutting the throats of the perpetrators, and dashing out the brains of their children on the first favorable opportunity, while the negroes have usually submitted, if not peaceably, without much show of resistance. If the spirit of Christianity in practice pervaded our thoughts and feelings, and exercised as much influence on our judgment as it does in theory, this, instead of lowering the negro in our estimation, would have raised him. As it is, not only has it destroyed all respect for his rights, but it actually so completely blunts the moral perception of an ordinary man, that a Congregational deacon is led to consider his marrying a white woman of his own rank in life a good reason for depriving him of the protection of the laws.

The evil suggests the remedy. Instead of advising Davenport to leave Greenwich, which we believe he has been compelled to do, we should advise him and all others like him to stay where they please, and cause it to be clearly understood that attempts to commit violence on their persons and property would be repelled by force. Unless the negro can manage to infuse into his composition a little more of that strong feeling of resentment for injuries received which the Indian has in excess, and which nevertheless has atoned for most of his crimes, and made Caucasians consider him a good match, and which in the moderate and reasonable degree in which it is found in the Anglo-Saxon communities is really the foundation of social order—the basis on which governments rest and must rest—the work of elevating him will be greatly increased. No government can put a policeman behind every man's chair or at the head of his bed. The work of maintaining order and protecting private rights is done in the main in all communities by the thorough understanding which prevails that most men will defend life and limb, house and wife and children, with the first weapon that comes to hand. Flogging and knocking down at the South will never entirely cease as long as there are men who will submit to be flogged and knocked down. And there will always be Buttons who will lecture blacks for defending their homes against marauders, as long as there are not more blacks ready, like Davenport's mother, to shoot people who attempt to break their houses open and to murder or mob them.

PROBABLE EFFECTS OF SOUTHERN FREE LABOR ON NORTHERN INDUSTRY.

It has become evident that among the great changes which must result from the late war will be changes in the relative industry of the different sections and in the channels of trade. Some of these changes will have been hastened by, but cannot be wholly attributed to, the war.

To begin with New England. A few years since, New England had a large population which was engaged in general farming—in the cultivation of large farms. The families of the farmers furnished operatives for the factories, the daughters constituting the larger proportion of the weavers in both the cotton and the woollen mills. But for many years it has become evident that New England must yield to the West in the cultivation of all the great staples of food, reserving only the raising of stock, of wool, and of the hay crop, occupations requiring but few hands. The farming population decreases in number, and this decrease will be vastly stimulated by the knowledge of other sections of the country gained by the New England soldiers. At the same time, the demand for skilled labor in printing-offices, in book-binding, and in the immense amount of work done by the sewing-machine, has gradually withdrawn American girls from the factories to these better paid and more independent branches. This change has been greatly stimulated by the war demand for clothing and material, and it seems probable that such has been the increase of population, and the consequent increase of demand upon those whose business it is to put the textile and other fabrics into a form for use, that even in times of peace all the females who have been thus employed will continue to be.

The factories are therefore obliged to change from a set of workers drawn from the surrounding country, to family help not living in boarding-houses but occupying separate tenements, men, women, and children all employed in the mill—a resident population, skilled in the operations to which they have been brought up, but in nothing else. There are material advantages in this system to the employer, but great dangers to the community. Such a population is almost exclusively foreign, and consequently ignorant. Much of the mill work being within the ability of children even as young as eight, the tendency of ignorant parents is to force the child into the mill rather than to send him to school. And even a conscientious employer cannot resist this tendency, for while factory laborers are scarce, he cannot refuse to employ the child, because he would lose the parents. Thus in Rhode Island, where there is the largest amount of factory work in proportion to the population, and the system of family help has been the longest established, there is the most ignorant population, with a system of open bribery at elections disgraceful to the community. There are laws to compel the attendance of children at school, but little attention is paid to them, and they are not uniform in the different States.

Thus it seems that the tendency of New England will be to a sparse population in the country, engaged in special branches and not in general farming, and to a dense population in cities and towns, largely foreign, employed in extremely subdivided labor, and needing wise and vigorous legislation to prevent ignorance and vice from increasing rapidly. And this tendency, if not actually induced, will have been greatly stimulated by the war. And while there are dangers in this, New England has also the assurance of maintaining her supremacy in manufacturing. The profit in manufacturing in ordinary times consists in the small saving and minute economy rendered possible by having every facility immediately at hand. The cotton or woollen mill in Lawrence can produce goods in ordinary times and undersell the isolated mill in the South or West for three reasons:

1st. Very few spare hands need be kept under pay, a population skilled in all the branches being at call in any emergency.

2d. Every particle of waste in the principal process is used up in some minor branch, either by the same concern or by some other. If a cotton-mill has no paper-maker to purchase the ropes, and bags, and floor-sweepings, and threads, it cannot be run in competition with one that has such a resource.

3d. All the small articles requisite in the main process can be had of those who establish themselves in a manufacturing community, but for which special and expensive workmen must be kept by an isolated mill.

Thus, while a radical and somewhat dangerous tendency affects New England, a change as great and much more desirable must affect the Middle and the Western States. The Eastern soldier, brought up in boyhood upon a farm, then developed in the mill or the workshop into the skilful artizan, has by his own observation of the South, and by his intimate companionship with the Western soldier, learned the great opening which exists for him, and he will carry to Virginia, to Maryland, Tennessee, and Kentucky the better method of farming pursued in Vermont, New York, and Pennsylvania. He will carry to the West the skill of the artizan, to be applied not to the establishment of great factories, but to the thousand smaller branches which are carried on in the workshop and at the forge or lathe. He will establish by natural methods that diversity of employment at the West which is sure to follow individual enterprise and skill, and which is far better than the forced growth induced by protective legislation. And at the South, who can foresee the changes? The Eastern and the Western man, alike attracted by the immense profits sure to follow the application of improved methods of agriculture, must buy out the planter, and give employment to the freedmen, and to the foreign emigrants who will soon be attracted there. He will save the waste, like that of cotton seed, which in the hands of a Yankee would yield value almost equal to the fibre. And as the population thus changes, and new wants are developed, the artizan must follow, the village must begin to have an existence, the city must become one in fact as well as in name.

And this brings us to the influence upon the channels of trade. As population increases, new harbors and centres of commerce must come into use. Any one familiar with the want of facilities now existing in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, from the mere narrowness of the business streets and the crowded condition of their docks, must feel that when the population has increased from thirty to fifty millions, as it soon will, the mere want of room will force commerce first to Baltimore, then to Norfolk, then to Port Royal and elsewhere. And as the freight moving on Southern railroads changes from the coarse and bulky but easily stowed freight of a barbarous slave community to the million articles required by civilized men, new lines of railroad must be built. Between the Southern rivers flowing into the Atlantic, Western freight must find its way to the market. Soon will come the demand for a road from the Ohio River through Cumberland Gap to the noble harbor at Port Royal, and from Galveston north through the fertile country of the Red River, and thence through Arkansas to the Mississippi. But to think upon the future of the South is to become bewildered before the possibility of development such as even the West has not yet given us in her onward course.

DIVIDE AND RULE.

Against the policy of allowing the colored people of the South to vote, it is urged that they will vote for their former masters. There could not be a stronger argument in favor of such policy. It is undoubtedly true that slavery was the cause of the rebellion, and yet the rebellion was not the act of the slaveholders as a body; on the contrary, a very large portion of those who could be called planters were utterly opposed to secession, and were dragooned into it by the necessity of their position. The ownership of slaves being necessary to position or influence in a slaveholding community, the ambition of every non-slaveholder is to become one. Demagogues and politicians took advantage of this desire "to own a nigger," and used it as an incitement to rebellion, advocating the reopening of the African slave-trade, and holding out the idea that thereby human live stock might become so cheap that even the poor whites could become planters. For many years the planters supported the politicians and the demagogues, never intending that at last they should take the bit in their teeth and drag them to utter destruction. But such has been their fate. They lost the control of the demon they had helped to raise.

Yet very many of these planters have been and are men of ability and intelligence. Many of them have been aware for years that their system was wasteful and destructive to general prosperity, even if they did not think it wrong. The system of which they formed a part was absolutely despotic, even in its rule over themselves, and they have been unwillingly dragged to what seems at first to be their ruin, but is really their opportunity.

As a class the former planters are now without power. A beaten slaveholder, with his slaves emancipated, must be entirely without prestige among the non-slaveholding whites, and the latter will be left to be led by demagogues as before. We know them to be ignorant and embittered, and that they will continue to be so until Northern settlers shall have proved to them the superiority of free institutions. At the beginning they must elect to Congress a delegation which will be a unit for all purposes of dangerous legislation, and as such, although a minority, their delegation will be powerful for evil.

If, on the other hand, we grant the franchise to the blacks, and they shall vote to some extent for their former masters, and elect them to Congress, what class of men shall we thereby get into Congress? Only those whose humanity was superior to the infernal system which encircled and has apparently ruined them. We shall have the ablest men of the South—men who, still possessing property in land, will have a positive interest in the prosperity of the whole country—men who will be the first to see that free labor is the true interest of the South, who can rejoice at, and who will foster, the prosperity of the country, knowing that their own prosperity depends on that of the whole. We shall have men whose minds will have been educated, even if to this time educated under the limits of a bad system—men who can reason logically, and who have proved their power of guiding a community well by the very power they have exhibited by guiding the South so long in a wrong direction. We may expect the most honest converts to free labor among those who have been the most successful in conducting slave labor.

But the chief benefit will be that the dangerous unity of the South as a section will be broken. Parties will thereafter arrange themselves upon what may be called national divisions and no longer upon sectional ones.

For instance, in past times Louisiana has been for protection because of her sugar interest, while South Carolina was for free trade; yet on all Southern questions Louisiana and South Carolina were knit by bands of iron. But in the future it may be that Louisiana sugar-planters will be chosen to Congress by the votes of their slaves, for the very nature of sugar-planting required humane treatment and plenty of good food, while any one familiar with the culture of cotton on the worn-out lands of South Carolina, and the necessarily scanty supply of food and clothing to the negroes, will have little dread of South Carolina planters appearing in Congress by negro votes. The representatives of South Carolina will be of the demagogue order for some time to come. Then by the force of a common interest in protection, Louisiana may unite with Pennsylvania, while the only State with which South Carolina can claim any fellow-feeling must be New Jersey —at any rate, until New Jersey emerges from the darkness of ignorance, and ratifies the Constitutional Amendment.

AMERICANS AND MONEY.

The fighting being over, many of those European critics who during the last four years have been troubled by our bloodthirstiness now begin to be troubled once more by our love of money—the American devotion to the "almighty dollar." Those foreigners who are friendly to us, while they do not deny that these charges are just, excuse our faults on the ground that they exist from the necessity of the case. "What have Americans to worship but money?" they ask. "There is no peerage in America, no society, no high honor for any high pursuit, no literature—nothing but politics, which 'the best men' shun. Hence their energies must be directed to acquisition, and no wonder that they love what they labor so hard to acquire. By-and-bye, when America shall have become very rich, Americans will enjoy what their predecessors accumulated, and there will be careers opened to all kinds of talent, and American life will be as various as that of other civilized countries." The excuse is as foolish as the charge is unfounded. We do not mean to say that Americans do not love money, or to deny that often they seek it shamelessly, recklessly, and knavishly; but it is not the fact that these are peculiarly American characteristics. The love of money that is here displayed, and the wickedness that is exhibited in modes of acquisition, belong to human nature and not to American nature. That desire for wealth which is here so general, and which converts so many men into rogues, belongs neither to this country nor to this age. It is common to all countries, and it was felt in the earliest times of which we have any knowledge. The classic Greeks, who used to be models, and whose literature furnished and yet furnishes the intellectual food on which Christian youth are chiefly fed, were the greediest of acquirers, and would have sold their souls for money had there been any party ready to buy them. The Spartans, whose heads and hearts were as hard as their iron currency, loved gold like so many misers, and could be bought at cheaper rates than any other men in Greece. The Romans, those models of patriotism and valor, loved gold even more than they loved blood, and much preferred picking an enemy's pockets to cutting his throat. The Roman, it has been bitterly but truly said, "who would have died for his country, could not help thrusting his hands into her pockets." There never was a people who excelled the Romans in all the arts of money-getting. The English are not a bad people, but they are mammon-worshippers from the highest to the lowest of their number. Even Sir Philip Sidney, who is held to have been the very incarnation of all noble sentiment, thought of going on a gold-hunting expedition, which, had he carried out his design, would probably have been neither better nor worse than that voyage on which Sir Francis Drake went round the world, plundering "as he sailed"—the Kidd of an earlier day. Algernon Sidney took the gold of Louis the Fourteenth. Such men as Marlborough and Wellington were rewarded with gold, and they deserved all that was given to them; but it ill becomes their countrymen to taunt Americans with being a money-loving race when the history of Washington is known to the world. America was well able to bestow a fortune on Washington, who was by no means a rich man when he left the presidency; but he would have considered himself insulted had he been asked to accept a sum of money, or a pension, or a sinecure. Was there ever a more greedy, rapacious, close-fisted body of men than Napoleon and his marshals, who plundered whom they conquered with as much skill and as few scruples as ever were displayed by the princes and marshals of the old régime? The French, who are ordinarily spoken of as being peculiarly a chivalrous people, and whose language has furnished so many of chivalry's terms, are a money-loving, a money-getting, and a money-saving race. We may add that the times of chivalry were the reverse of generous, and that the knights of those days would hold on to a pound of silver with as much tenacity as Shylock persisted in his demand for a pound of Antonio's flesh.

The late Mr. Cooper, who was not in the habit of sparing the faults of his living countrymen, never would admit that, as compared with other peoples, they were a money-loving race. He pointed to the great numbers of Americans who embark in politics—notoriously not a profitable pursuit—as evidence of their not being wedded to mere acquisition of money. He was right. There is no country in which money will accomplish so little as it will accomplish here. It would be easy to purchase ten Frenchmen, or five Englishmen, where it would be difficult to purchase one American. Foreigners themselves virtually admit this, for they bring against this country another charge, one that contradicts their assertion that we are given up to mammon-worship. They say that property is not safe here, and that men of ample means cannot live in the United States as they wish to live, but have to go abroad for freedom and enjoyment. The two charges cannot both be true. If the first were true, rich men would have their own way in every respect, and would live as they please. If the last, then we do not worship money, but persecute its possessors. Neither is well founded. We have the failing that is common to humanity, and set a very high value upon money, but as an agent, and not as something that is peculiarly desirable in itself; and there is no country in which the rich are more safe than they are here, none in which "the dangerous classes" have so little influence, because, out of one or two large cities, they have scarcely an existence. Rich men do not live here as wealthy Jews and Christians once lived in Mohammedan countries—meanly, because afraid of tempting their enemies to plunder them. As to their visits to foreign countries, they are made on pretty much the same principle that Englishmen used to make the grand tour, and which yet tempts so many of them to all parts of the world. They are made to gratify a laudable curiosity by some, and by others they are made at the dictates of fashion. A rich and educated American has the same desire to visit Italy and Greece, France and Spain, and other countries of continental Europe, that is felt by a rich and educated Englishman; and he visits England, in most instances, because it is the mother-land of his country, in which every American must feel an interest, if he be not a churl. Some of them extend their travels to Asia, and particularly to Palestine, so attractive a country to all Christians. The thing is very simple, and has nothing to do with our social state, American tourists not being exiles. American travellers are few in comparison with English travellers. There are whole colonies of English people settled at different places on the continent of Europe, to which, as Thackeray says, "they take all their prejudices and all their sauces." Are we to infer that in England persons of property cannot live according to their tastes, and that property is there so unsafe that its holders transfer it and themselves to those orderly lands, France and Flanders, Italy and Germany?

THE PRITCHARD CASE.

We used to flatter ourselves that poisoning was an obsolete institution, belonging emphatically, like alchemy and astrology, to the Middle Ages. Especially was it regarded as eminently an un-English practice. When we read that, in Mantua, it was "death to any he that uttered" the deadly drops that Romeo asked for, or when we saw Lucretia Borgia on the lyric scene commend wine of the celebrated Borgia brand to the lips of her insulters, whereby they incontinently made a swan-like ending, we congratulated ourselves that this venefical turn was limited to the Latin races, and was foreign to Anglo-Saxon blood. To be sure, the fair Frances Howard, Countess of Essex and Somerset, did put a stop to the impertinent prying of Sir Thomas Overbury into her private affairs by a craftily qualified potion. And the charming Miss Blandy, about the middle of the last century, made an example of a perverse and disobedient father who objected to her marriage with Captain Cranstoun, by a like composing draught. And "Donellan, of bad renown," gave his brother-in-law, Sir Theodosius Boughton, a dose of laurel-water as the readiest way of settling some family money matters. But these were rather exceptional cases that proved the general rule. When Wainwright, the poisoner, whom Charles Lamb knew so well, and whose crimes are set forth at large by Talfourd in his Life, claimed the insurance on the life of one of his victims, and was opposed on the ground of foul play, the judge on the bench was so horror-stricken at the hypothesis that he caused the jury to reject it. And when Bulwer thought it worth his while to write a romance, with the moral that it would be improper in the courteous reader to resort to poison to rid himself of unpleasant relatives and disagreeable connections, it was thought an odd use to put his genius to.

Within the last few years, however, there have been proven cases enough to show that men are not much better in the nineteenth century and in England than they were in Italy in the thirteenth; that "succession powder" is not yet out of date nor "poisoning" one of the lost arts. The instances of Palmer, the surgeon, who poisoned his friend Cook with strychnine for his money, and who was hanged, though no traces of the drug could be detected in the dead man; and that of the fair Madeline Smith who did to death, in cruel agonies, her worthless lover, who threatened to expose her love-letters if she broke off her connection with him to marry an honest man, must be fresh in every one's memory. This last dangerous damsel, indeed, escaped the gallows by means of the Scotch verdict "Not proven," though there was not the slightest moral doubt of her guilt. And now the cup of horrors is crowned by the double poisoning committed by Dr. Pritchard, of Glasgow, a regularly educated physician and surgeon, who expiated his crimes on the 28th of last month. This case has excited an interest throughout Great Britain not inferior to that caused here by the murder of Dr. Parkman by Dr. Webster, from the social position of the criminal and the good general character he had maintained among his acquaintances.

The strangeness of the murders lay chiefly in the want of apparent motive to provoke them. This exemplary physician had been for a considerable time engaged in poisoning his wife gradually by small doses of antimony. In February her mother came to visit her in consequence of the illness thus induced. She dies suddenly, and unquestionably of poison, as the autopsy proved. Early in March Mrs. Pritchard dies also, under circumstances which excited enough suspicion to demand an investigation, the result of which was to cause the arrest and trial of her husband. The proof on the trial was overwhelming against him. No one could have administered the doses excepting himself or an ignorant servant-girl of seventeen. The scientific precision with which they were exhibited made this last hypothesis absurd. The money which was to pass in consequence of these deaths was too inconsiderable to make it worth while to procure them. That he had illicit connection with the servant-maid was admitted, and that he had promised to marry her in case his wife died. But that he should seriously intend doing so, under these circumstances, is hardly to be credited. It was shown that Mrs. Pritchard was cognizant of this intrigue, and the only conceivable object her husband could have for getting her out of the way was to be rid of the observation and perhaps the reproaches of the injured wife. And the same reason may have operated to incite to the murder of her mother. It was a curious chapter in the metaphysics of murder.

And the conduct of Dr. Pritchard from his arrest until his death has also furnished a study in morbid psychology. Up to the time of the trial, of course, he denied all knowledge of the poisoning, attributing the deaths to natural causes. When his fate was sealed he made what he called a confession, in which, with the desire to make himself out to be less black than he had been proved to be, he showed himself to be a bungler in lying as well as in murder. And this in the face of irrefragable facts. It having been proved beyond question that the poisoning was antimonial, continued through a long time, he confesses that he killed his wife on a sudden impulse, arising from the presence of Mary Macleod, the maid, by giving her an over-dose of chloroform, denying any knowledge of the poisoning of Mrs. Taylor. After that he confessed that he was guilty of this other crime, as well. In fact, the only reason to suspect that the man did not commit these crimes must lie in the fact that he said he did. So Dr. Webster in his confession admitted that he killed Dr. Parkman, but in a fit of sudden rage, accompanying the statement with a minute detail of the particulars, almost every one of which was demonstrated to have been physically impossible. Liars should have good memories, and recollect that other people have excellent ones. A very remarkable thing connected with this trial was the development of what we must hope to be a morbid case of professional delicacy. Dr. Patterson, who had been called in as consulting physician, swore that he knew from the symptoms of Mrs. Pritchard's case that she was undergoing a process of antimonial poisoning; but that he was prevented by professional etiquette from interfering with Dr. Pritchard's patient! It sounds like a bitter gibe from Molière rather than an extract from a Scotch criminal trial.

We have had but too many instances of this hideous crime in our own country to be able to cast a stone at our mother country as more guilty than we. The poisonings of husbands and wives, of children, of lovers, and on a larger scale, like that at the National Hotel at Washington five or six years ago, are but too fresh in our remembrance; not to mention the sublime conception of poisoning all New York by the infection of the Croton Aqueduct, and the partially accomplished plot to disseminate the virus of the yellow fever, as parts of legitimate warfare, by the rebels. It seems as if this crime, like suicide, were contagious, and that one act suggested another.

But though the science of toxicology has favored the arts of the murderer by its teachings, its very perfection makes them the most dangerous that can be resorted to. So exact is its knowledge of symptoms, so delicate its tests, so certain its perquisitions, that the bowl is a much more dangerous instrument of murder to the murderer than the bullet or the steel. Murder speaks with most miraculous organ through the skill of the anatomist and the chemist. Science, like Divine justice, searches and finds out the poisoner in spite of the most ingenious precautions and devilish craftiness. The dead speak with her voice, and bring the awful secret to light with the most absolute certainty and perfect exactness. The grave cannot hide it, nor corruption hinder it from being brought to light. Of this we shall speak more fully, however, in our next number.

SLAVERY AND THE SLAVEOCRACY.

THERE is no remark more common that this, that "slavery is dead." In the North it is difficult to find even a Democrat who supposes that that institution which was all-powerful but six years ago is not now in the list of vanished things. At the South most of the Provisional Governors tell their subjects that slavery no longer has an existence; and though there is not so pronounced a unanimity there as we find in the North on this point, it is clear that the general opinion is unfavorable to the revival of that system of labor which was to have been extended over North America, had Southern statesmen been endowed with a larger portion of the wisdom of the serpent. Even the least hopeful of men among liberals can go so far as to say that slavery, if not dead, is doomed to die.

But, while slavery is, taking the least favorable view of affairs, under sentence of death, and there is neither power nor wish to stay the execution of a sentence so just, we ought not to forget that the slaveocracy is not dead or even dangerously ill. That is almost as vigorous as it was before the war, when, through its alliance with a strong party in the North, it was able to rule the republic, and lost its ascendency only because it became blind through its long success. Prosperity has the same effect on parties and interests that it has on individuals, causing them to see not what exists, but what they would have exist; and the slaveholding ascendency of 1854–60 committed the same error as that of which Napoleon I. was guilty in 1807–12, when he thought he could dictate law to all Europe. The Emperor overrated his own power, and underrated the resisting power of his foes; and American slaveholders believed themselves irresistible, and their opponents feeble and cowardly, because they never had failed to accomplish any purpose upon which they had set their hearts. They made their Russian campaign in 1860, and that being followed by other reverses of a yet severer character, their fall was apparently complete, and complete it would have been in fact had we not waived our rights as conquerors. Because of the folly into which the victors fell, they may have to make a Waterloo campaign, in which to complete work that would have been better done had it been done earlier.

The slaveocracy exists to-day in almost as much force as it existed before a shot had been exchanged between the parties to our great civil war. True, the secession armies have been defeated, broken up, and dissolved. True, the original leaders in the rebellion have incurred all the disgrace that proceeds from failure in a cause whose advocates were certain of success; and most of those leaders are in their graves, or in prison, or in exile. True, the flower of the Southern adult male population has been cut down and cast into the furnace of war, and there consumed. True, slavery is under the ban, and can no longer claim a legal right to live. But, for all these things, the power that made war in the Union, the "order" of men that decreed the war, "still lives," and hopes to renew the conflict in which it has been worsted under circumstances and conditions that would give it assurance of victory. In one respect the slaveocracy is even stronger than it was before it made its appeal to arms. Its spirit is fiercer and more bitter than it was before the war. In ante-secession times it claimed to be the better class of the nation, and its claim was allowed by the rest of the nation, which permitted it to rule. Its claim being conceded, it never had occasion to doubt the soundness thereof or to feel wounded by resistance. But now it has been not merely resisted, which might have been borne with, but beaten everywhere and forced to lay down its arms. The appeal of battle has gone against it, and it feels as the chivalry of the Middle Ages would have felt had it been "coerced" by the churls who figured in the Jacquerie. Absurd as Southern aristocratical pretensions appear to us, we cannot doubt that they existed as strongly as if every Southron had been a genuine Norman. No greater mistake can be made than to suppose that all the members of a patrician class must necessarily possess the sentiments, the habits, the manners, and the education of gentlemen, taking this much-abused word in its best modern acceptation. We know that English country gentlemen, who are undoubted aristocrats, were a peculiarly coarse class of men down to a recent period; and Niebuhr correctly remarks that the sentiment of political exclusiveness can exist as strongly under the smock-frock of a yeoman of Uri as under the velvet mantle of a Venetian nobleman. Our Southern slaveholders that were, and who still retain the slaveholding spirit without keeping the slaves, formed as complete an aristocracy—perhaps it would be better to say oligarchy—as ever existed, though the great majority of their number were vulgar and illiterate fellows, and not much above the "the poor whites" in appearance and attainments. Now, nothing is better established than that an aristocracy does not readily submit to a conqueror. It may be exterminated, but it cannot be made to yield merely because it has failed in a battle, or in a campaign, or in a war. Apparently it may submit, but it does so only to obtain time in which to regain strength, that it may renew the conflict that must be fought out to the destruction of one party or the other. Our aristocrats are not only animated by the general sentiment of their "order," but they are peculiarly enraged by the circumstances of their failure. They have been whipped by Yankees—by men whom they believed incapable of fighting! The knight has been flogged by the peasant, the horse and his rider have gone down before the villain, the Norman has been overthrown by the Saxon! All this may seem sufficiently ridiculous to us, but it is sober reality to that large class of men in the Southern States who ruled America for more than seventy years, and who thought they ruled because of their superiority in every respect that entitles men to govern their inferiors. Had they been beaten by men whom they considered their equals, they might have accepted the event, and have made no attempt to reverse it; but they never will submit to those who are now victors. The fact that never before were they beaten, will dispose them to attribute their reverse to accident, and create the belief that it is their duty to set aside a decision so palpably subversive of the purpose of Providence. We have before us, therefore, a contest that will be quite as difficult as any one of those contests that have agitated the nation, and in all of which we were beaten but one, and that a conflict of armies. It ought to make those men reflect, who anticipate a renewal of political warfare, that we never were successful in political contests, and that our solitary success was wrought, not by the ballot, but by the bayonet. Are we prepared for war on every occasion in which a stubborn aristocracy shall refuse to accept the event of a constitutionally conducted election? For we assume, what indeed is self-evident, that the Southern aristocracy, though beaten as to its late purpose, and baffled as to the occasion, is not destroyed, nor even dispersed. Save that it has lost its slaves, and in that way and for the moment its revenues, it exists to-day almost as strongly as it existed in 1860; and these losses and the spectacle of a great mass of freedmen will have the same effect on it that is produced by recollection of its defeat in the field. They will animate it to those exertions which shall promise to bring about a change and to effect a restoration of its ancient supremacy.

Those who argue that the losses of the South in men will indispose it to such action as might lead to a renewal of civil war, ought to bear in mind that every day's passage weakens the sense of those losses and helps to increase Southern strength. Those males who were boys when the war began are now men, or soon will be men; and sectional feeling is by far the stronger with the young than it is with the middle-aged and the old. As old men die—men who were brought up as Unionists—their places are taken by men who never were Unionists, or who have rid themselves of all Union feeling. The younger the men of the South, the less reason have we to suppose that they will be under the dominion of national sentiment. But, though we think a renewal of war far from impossible, it is against the eventualities of a political conflict that we would have our countrymen on their guard. It is probable that the Southern aristocrats will labor to unite their "section," and then re-form that alliance with the Northern Democracy which formerly they found so useful, and from which they never, for their own sakes, should have departed. A third part of the North combined with the South would suffice to restore that old state of things which was removed by the war, and by that only. We are by no means sure that it would not suffice to restore even slavery, by maintaining that every State has the right to order its own affairs after its own fashion, and that it would be better that the blacks should live in slavery than be exterminated by the action of cruel laws, enacted for the end of removing them from the face of the earth.

MR. GLADSTONE'S REJECTION

By the University of Oxford ought to be matter for congratulation instead of regret. He has been growing in the grace of liberalism for almost twenty years; but during most of that time he was one of the members of the House of Commons for the University of Oxford—an honorable post, no doubt, and highly so in English estimation, but which operated as a drag on his movements. He was first elected in 1847, and until 1865 Oxford bore with the waywardness, as she must have regarded it, of her brilliant son. His talents did her honor, and she condescended to overlook his political liberalism in consideration of his thoroughgoing attachment to her ecclesiastical sentiments. She allowed him to coquette with the "state" because of his fidelity to the "Church," of which he had been a chosen champion from his youth upward. But this state of things could not be permitted to endure. The bigot in religion must become a bigot in politics, and the remark is peculiarly applicable to corporation bigotry. At the late election Mr. Gathorne Hardy, a promising Tory, or Conservative, was pitted against Mr. Gladstone by those Oxonians who could no longer countenance a gentleman who had said something that approached to an approval of universal suffrage only last year. To be sure Mr. Gladstone had explained away most of his suffrage speech, but the Tories preferred to take what he had said in the heat of the moment to his explanations after he had become cool. They were right, if their object was to ascertain what his opinions were, for he is one of those men who "speak right out" when excited, and then it is that such men are sure to make no secret of their views. Mr. Gladstone had gone so far in the direction of liberalism in 1864, that his avowal of advanced sentiments on the suffrage question at that time would have surprised no intelligent observer of British politics; but it was the last drop that filled the cup of Oxford's objections to him, and caused it to overflow. He could be spared no longer, and he was not spared. Faithful to her ancient standard, that of aristocracy and intolerance, the venerable university refused longer to have him for one of her members of Parliament, and he was compelled to look to South Lancashire for a seat. This was not going so far as Mr. Fox had to go in 1784, when it was thought that he might be beaten in the most famous of Westminster contests, and was brought in for the Orkney and Shetland boroughs, which enabled Mr. Pitt to taunt him with having been forced to take refuge in Ultima Thule, because of the part which he had had in the well-known coalition.

Mr. Gladstone, we have no doubt, feels his failure very bitterly, but the cause of that bitterness is one that very few Americans can understand; and still fewer can sympathize with the mortified statesman. Eminent Englishmen love to represent the university to which they belong. It is considered a very high honor to be chosen one of the representatives of either of the two universities, and correspondingly great is the sense of failure, when, after having long sat for a university, a man of distinction is beaten when he seeks a re-election. When the younger Pitt first came forward for Parliament at the age of twenty-one, in 1780, nothing less than a seat for the University of Cambridge would suit him—a piece of presumption, as it was considered, that was rebuked by his being placed at the bottom of the poll. In 1784 the same university was glad to elect so distinguished a man, placing him at the head of the poll—but then he had become Prime Minister, which made all the difference in the world in the estimation even of university Dons. It is almost sixty years since Lord Palmerston made his first attempt to become one of the members for Cambridge, which was his university; but he was beaten by Lord Henry Petty, who died but a year or two since as third Marquis of Lansdowne. A little later Lord Palmerston was chosen one of the Cambridge members, and kept the seat for many years, leaving it because of his support of the Reform Bill. Mr. Peel—he was not then Sir Robert—was one of the members for the University of Oxford when, in 1829, the project of Catholic Emancipation was adopted by the Government in which he was Home Secretary; and as Oxford did not approve of that measure, he resigned his seat, and stood a contest, in which he was beaten by a majority much greater than that by which Mr. Gladstone has been dismissed. The majority against Mr. Peel was 246, that against Mr. Gladstone but 180. Mr. Peel had to buy, from a Jew, the privilege of being chosen for Westbury, his father then sitting for Tamworth.

Though Mr. Gladstone must feel much mortification, what has happened to him is the best thing that could have happened to him. It has unchained him, and he, like a liberated eagle, now can take a full flight toward the sun. It was but yesterday that he was resisting claims of the Dissenters to equality of treatment in the matter of education, and all to soothe his venerable mother, who has closed her breast to him, by way of acknowledging his labors in behalf of her bigotry. But there has come an end to such servility, such slavery, and the statesman can now proceed to round and complete his career as an English statesman of the nineteenth century should round and complete it. If he has half as much wisdom as talent, he will now rejoice over his defeat.

MISSOURI.

Just before the rebellion, the Free State element in Missouri had begun to develop the resources of the State, and the attention not only of this country but of Europe was being drawn to her wondrous mineral wealth; but the vortex of civil war swallowed up all industrial interests in the Border States, and Missouri had to bide her time. The people, however, have not forgotten the Iron Mountain, situated about a hundred miles from St. Louis, directly south, nor its neighbor, Pilot Knob, made historical during the past year by one of the bloodiest battles of the war. The public have been told years ago, but perhaps will not remember now, that Iron Mountain is 228 feet high, and that its base covers an area of 500 acres, which gives 1,655,280,000 cubic feet, or 230,187,375 tons of ore, above the surface, saying nothing about the amount beneath the surface. Pilot Knob, a mountain six miles south of Iron Mountain, is 581 feet high, and is a solid mass of iron, covering an area of 360 acres. The amount above the surface cannot be less than 13,972,773 tons.

These introductory figures speak more eloquently than can any language of the boundless resources of Missouri, which, under the influence of slavery, remained for so many years undeveloped, while her industry was all devoted to the raising of tobacco and hemp, the commingling of white and black manners, language, and blood, and the stemming of the tide of civilization. To own and work a field of tobacco or hemp, to drive a "nigger," whether owned or not, to walk and talk like a negro, to indulge in luxuries known only south of Mason and Dixon's line, and, finally, to curse the Yankees, constituted the sum total of human existence among the Missourians under the old régime. With the introduction of the Nebraska-Kansas Bill into Congress commenced a new era in Missouri, the fulness of whose dawn is witnessed to-day. Slavery and manufactures never prospered side by side; and when the manufacturing interest began to be developed in Missouri, the vitality of slavery began to ebb. There came flowing gradually into St. Louis an element from New England—Boston capitalists—that constantly threatened to gain for industry and free labor a predominant influence in the State. This, united with that other and ever-civilizing element, the German, asserted its political supremacy at Camp Jackson, where the incipient rebel army of St. Louis was captured by the heroic Lyon. Under whatever guise the old spirit of slavery has since appeared, whether clothed in "Confederate," "Democratic," or "Conservative" garb, the loyal, radical, free State, free labor element has triumphed. Governor Thomas C. Fletcher was elected last fall by forty thousand majority over Thomas L. Price, the former being an abolitionist of fifteen years' standing, and the latter a pro-slavery Bourbon of the most approved stamp.

The new Free State Union Administration has a gigantic work to perform. The State has to be reorganized, reconstructed. Schools have to be established, the courts have to be remodelled on a loyal basis, the disloyal people have to be taught that there is no way for them but to submit to the changed condition of things, and the population, subject for four years to perpetual alarms, has to be quieted and assured of protection and security. The constitution recently adopted is a bitter pill for the rebel portion of the population, disfranchising every man who has said or done anything in favor of the rebellion; but, bitter as it is, it must be swallowed. The convention which adopted this constitution ousted, by ordinance, all the officers of courts of record in the State, and among them the three supreme judges. These incumbents refused to obey the ordinance, and the Governor went into the court-room one day and ousted them at the point of the bayonet, and installed the judges whom the convention had authorized him to appoint. This attempt, thus frustrated, to deny constituted authority is probably the last gasp of disloyalty in Missouri. Unionism, loyalty, freedom, are dominant in every department of the State government, and the new civilization is asserted.

And it is a grand State, indeed, that is thus redeemed. Let us look further at some of her natural resources, alluded to above. Her mineral wealth is almost beyond computation. To give some idea of its extent, we give the following table:

There is iron in	34	counties,
" lead in	31	"
" coal in	36	"
" copper in	22	"
" silver in	5	"

as far as discovered, besides gold, platina, nickel, cobalt, manganese, emery, marble, alabaster, etc.

The most extensive lead mine (at Granby, in the south-western portion of the State) yielded, before it was abandoned at the outbreak of the rebellion, a thousand dollars' worth of ore per day. Other very prolific mines, about fifty miles from St. Louis (at Potosi), now give employment to hundreds of laborers; but arrangements are being made by which the Missouri lead mines will be worked with Eastern capital, on a scale far exceeding anything known in the past.

There are vast prairies in different parts of the State, the soil of which is as fine as that of Illinois; but these prairies have been neglected, for they are admirably adapted for wheat, and wheat and slavery never could thrive well together. But the New England farmer, and the New York farmer, and the Pennsylvania farmer, are now taking hold of these garden-spots of nature, and in a few years they will be gilded with thickly strewn grain-fields.

THE FRENCH SUCCESSION.

The Prince Imperial of France lately had a severe fit of illness, and had the attack been fatal the effect would have been great on that country over which his present hope is to reign; for it would have placed Prince Napoleon so near to the throne that he would have become a first-class European character by position, as already he is through the force of his talents. It may be that he is the man destined to continue the imperial line. Most men are more or less superstitious, and there is enough in the history of succession to the French throne to make many of us believe that the Prince Imperial is destined never to become Emperor of the French. It is now two hundred and twenty-two years since a French monarch was succeeded by a son. Louis XIII. died on the 14th of May, 1643, and the throne passed to his eldest son, Louis XIV.; but since that day, no one who was born directly to the French throne has ever filled it, whether Bourbon, or Bonaparte, or Orleanist. Louis XIV., who reigned more than seventy-two years, and survived more than two generations of subjects, was succeeded by his great-grandson, Louis XV.; and the latter by his grandson, Louis XVI. Louis XVI.'s successor was the sovereign people, who cut off their predecessor's head. To them succeeded the first Napoleon, who was not their son, but the son of his own works, few of which were of a popular character. Napoleon I. was followed by Louis XVIII., a brother of the sixteenth Louis. Charles X., the third of these brothers, was the next king; and he and his dynasty were made to give way to another king and a new dynasty, Louis Philippe, and the House of Orleans. Had Louis Philippe died in the purple he would have had no son for a successor, as his eldest son was killed nine years before the Revolution of 1848, leaving two boys, the elder being that Comte de Paris who is occasionally mentioned. But Louis Philippe was not succeeded by any member of his race. The sovereign people were again inaugurated, soon to be displaced by another Bonaparte, Napoleon III., who yet rules as well as reigns. He has only one child, a son in his tenth year, and yet liable to be taken off by some one of the many diseases incidental to childhood. No wonder that many should think that Napoleon III., like another usurper, the slayer of the gracious Duncan, is not to have a successor of his own creation. The Comte de Chambord, who is the legitimate Henry the Fifth, and who acts as if he thought he were never to become king of France and Navarre, is a childless man; and, should he obtain his inheritance, he would not be succeeded by a son. If we go back beyond the time of Louis XIII., we find that but three French kings, including Louis XII., were succeeded by sons for more than a century and a quarter. Charles VIII., son of Louis XI., who died in 1498, after a reign of fifteen years, was succeeded by the Duke of Orleans, a distant relative, who became Louis XII.; and Louis XII. was followed by Francis I., another distant relative. Francis I. was succeeded by his son, Henry II., and he by his son, Francis II.; but after the last-named monarch's death, in 1560, no son succeeded a father on the French throne until 1610. Francis II.'s successor was his brother Charles, ninth of the name; and Charles was followed by Henry III., his brother, in whom the line of Valois terminated. Then came the Bourbon line in the person of Henry IV., who was succeeded by his eldest son, Louis XIII. Thus, since 1559, on the death of Henry II., and the succession of Francis II., but two French kings have been succeeded by sons—Henry IV. and Louis XIII. Should the Prince Imperial not follow his father, men might well be excused for believing that there is something like fatality in the matter, and that to be born to the French throne is the surest way not to get it. It may remain in the same family, and the line continue unbroken, but the law of primogeniture would seem to be set aside in a summary manner by the fates.

To give to the Prince Imperial a fair chance of the succession, his father should live until the Prince reaches to man's estate in full. Then, if he be a man of talent, he will be able to do something for himself, and keep what his father made for him. But if he should be like "that foolish Ishbosheth," Richard Cromwell, he would fall. A very commonplace character serves for a prince of an established dynasty, but the son of a usurper ought to be almost as able a man as his father. Richard Cromwell succeeded as easily to Oliver Cromwell, as ruler of the British Isles, as Charles I. had succeeded to James I.; but he could not keep what fell so quietly into his lap, and went down before the first adverse gale. So it may be in France, should the Prince Imperial, at a mature age, succeed to his father. No weak man can reign long in France. Burke's idea, that the French sovereign, if a restored Bourbon, would have to be able and active, applies with double force to an illegitimate king of the French.

ELSA.

Sweet Elsa hath listened to living words,
She hath seen a heart like a flower unclose;
And yet she would almost hide the truth,
And shut the leaves of the blushing rose.

For the spell of enchantment is broken now,
And all the future is seen so clear,
That she longs for the very longing gone,
For the restless pleasure of hope and fear.

She stands so close to the painting now
That its smallest failings are revealed—
Ah, that beautiful picture, that looked so sweet,
By the misty distance half concealed!

"Alas," she says, "can it then be true
That all is vanity, as they preach—
That the good is in striving after the good,
And the best is the thing we never reach?

"Are not the sweetest words we can speak:
It is mine, and I hold my treasure fast?
And the saddest, wrung from the human heart:
It might have been, but the time is past?

"I do not know, and I will not say,
But yet of a truth it seems to me,
I would give my certain knowledge back,
For my hope with its sweet uncertainty!"

CLASSICAL STUDY IN AMERICA.

To the Editor of The Nation:

In the flattering notice of my pamphlet on "Classical and Scientific Studies" in your last number, there is one misconception of my meaning, occasioned by a want of clearness in my own statement, which, as it concerns a point of great importance in reference to American education, perhaps you will allow me to make the text of a few brief remarks. In commenting on the passage in which I propose a course of study in our colleges from which Greek shall be excluded, you say, "We do not readily understand, nor would we readily accept, Mr. Atkinson's complete exclusion of Greek from the course of school studies. If the language is ever to be known, its rudiments may best be learned in youth. Perhaps it is not well to insist upon it as a universal qualification for admission to college, but that it should at least remain as an alternative qualification we believe, and we cannot believe that Mr. Atkinson himself would differ from us in this opinion."

You are entirely right in this last supposition. It was as far as possible from my intention to give the impression that I wished to exclude the study of Greek altogether from our college curriculum—indeed, in other parts of my pamphlet I believe I have made this sufficiently evident—but no one can be engaged in the preparation of boys for our colleges without seeing the absolute necessity of an alternative course of study, such as I describe, which shall omit Greek altogether, and substitute therefor a more thorough study of science and of modern languages. No part of my pamphlet has been so much criticized as my motto—"Mutato nomine de te fabula narratur." It has been urged, and urged with much truth, that in this country we are to a great extent free from the trammels of old tradition, and that the extraordinary picture of the results of English school classical education by no means applies to America. I recognize the truth of all this; but yet I am prepared to maintain that in New England, at least, and more especially in Boston and at Harvard College, the force of English tradition is still quite strong enough to justify my line from Horace. The evil is felt far more in our classical schools than in our colleges. In the latter, so much freedom of choice is now given, and so much more is taken ungranted by the students, that a young man has a tolerably good opportunity of fashioning for himself a course of study suited to his own wants and peculiar talents. He may indeed have to do this at the expense of college rank and college honors, but that is a consideration of such infinitesimal importance that perhaps it may be altogether neglected.

But it is in our schools, Mr. Editor, that I feel myself fully justified in maintaining that the English system is still quite too prevalent. In a note in my pamphlet (p. 70) I have said: "In the case of most, if not all our American colleges, while a greater number of Latin and Greek books must be read for admission than are required at a matriculation examination at Oxford or Cambridge, the young men may, and usually do, enter entirely ignorant of the elementary principles of physics or of any branch of natural history." I believe this is true, though I can speak from personal knowledge of only one of our colleges, though that is perhaps the most influential, Harvard. There, year by year, the examination in the minutiæ of Latin and Greek grammar has been made stricter and stricter, while I will undertake to say that of the hundred and odd young men who have just passed the examination successfully, not a tenth part could pass the most elementary examination in physics or natural history. Not being required for admission, while so much Latin and Greek is required, these studies are almost wholly neglected. The consequences in respect to the after study of physical and natural science are very disastrous. Unprepared by an early training of their observing faculties, the young men do not know how to study physical science, and the consequence is, that the excellent instruction which they can now have after they enter college is thrown away on them for lack of a foundation. The mischief does not end here. Disgusted with the premature cramming of Latin and Greek grammars, the carefully prepared candidates of our city schools are too apt, when the iron restraints of school discipline are exchanged for the greater freedom of college, to throw up study altogether; and I am ready to venture the assertion that it is this class that furnishes the greatest number of the most idle and the most turbulent of our college students. It cannot be wondered at. Instead of being interested in study, they have been disgusted. They have studied simply to pass an examination, and, that accomplished, they throw aside all care for the subject as completely as a lawyer will throw aside the perplexing details of a completed law suit. Indeed, it is the very just observation of an acute friend of mine, that there is such a thing as an "occasional memory," enabling a man to get up a subject for a special purpose, and, when that purpose is accomplished, all trace of it shall depart from his mind. I maintain that the classical study of American schools is much of it little raised above the character of such cramming, and fully justifies me in the use of my motto.

Now, I would be the last to complain of the rigid exaction of thoroughness and accuracy in classical study. So far from that, I maintain that unless classical study is thorough and accurate, it is utterly worthless. But the error lies in exacting this degree and accuracy of scholarship at the wrong period. Boys will not and cannot be interested in school in what, if made the subject of professorial teaching, might be made both interesting and instructive. I will not weary you with quoting the long array of authorities I might summon against the absurdity of beginning the study of languages, living or dead, with the cramming by rote of all the minutiæ of grammar, yet at famous schools I might name, which are held up to the teaching profession as models, that cramming is carried almost to the pitch of English absurdity.

The practical remedies for this state of things seem to me very simple. They are first to diminish the maximum amount of Latin and Greek required for admission to our colleges by at least one-third, and to substitute therefor a very stiff examination in physical science. Such a change as this would immediately react upon our classical schools, compelling them to give attention to subjects now wholly neglected. The omitted third of classical study I would by no means have neglected, but I would relegate it to the care of the professors instead of the schoolmasters. Then would the schoolmaster who loves his Virgil or his Cicero be saved the torture of having them murdered by careless schoolboys, while the young professor, by interesting prelections, would have the opportunity at the same time to create a love for classical literature in his hearers, and to employ the learning which he has perhaps acquired in Germany.

But further than this, no man can have been employed much in teaching without being fully convinced that there is a class of minds on which much classical, or indeed grammatical and linguistic, teaching is as good as wasted—minds in which the observing faculties take the lead, and which are born to devote themselves to science. For such minds I would have the "alternative" course of study you speak of—a course in which such students should be wholly relieved of the study of Greek as much as of the study of Sanskrit, and full play should be given to the natural bent of their genius. Language studies should be represented by the elementary or the more complete study of Latin, by the mastery of the mother tongue (who masters it now-a-days?), and by the practical study of modern languages. If this alternative course were placed on an equal footing as regards honors with the classical course, I think we should see large numbers of minds gravitating towards it. Indeed, in regard to our system of common school education, I am convinced that it must be shifted from a literary and linguistic to a scientific foundation, by the better teaching of "common things" and of the sciences of observation, before it will ever be thoroughly successful.

These thoughts, Mr. Editor, would admit of much illustration and expansion, but I have already trespassed further than I intended upon your pages, and will only sign myself, Your obedient servant,

The Author of "Classical and Scientific Studies."

THE NEW RULING CLASS SOUTH.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Bulwer has found at last a devoted disciple in the President of the United States to his popular and "cardinal" doctrine that "the pen is mightier than the sword." What General Grant could not accomplish by his artillery, President Johnson essays with his goose-quill. With one fell swoop, or by one fell stroke, of his pen he has tried to sweep out of existence, as a political power, the great class that has ruled the South from time immemorial. He has done or tried to do more. He has sought to achieve the proud boast of Canning, by calling up a new world, if not to redress the balance, to occupy the position of the old.

Perhaps the President may hold that other doctrine of the didactic dramatist, that "there is no such word as fail." But I venture to assert that he will discover, ere "the experimental policy" has cast off its swaddling clothes, that with the best intentions and most inflexible will to support a plan, there is such a thing as failure. I predict from my long knowledge of the South that the poor whites cannot be counted on to form a more stable and harmonious Union; and, furthermore, that except by expatriation it is impossible to disfranchise the old ruling class.

I will give the reasons of this my unbelief in the Executive programme the facts on which they are founded; and I will gather them chiefly from around the home of the President, and call as my leading witness an officer of his own appointment.

I was in Nashville last fall. The President at that time was Military Governor of Tennessee. In November I met Mr. Oviatt, the first Superintendent of the Home for the Refugees. During the previous year his voluntary labors in aiding the white refugees, who then began to arrive from the South, attracted the attention of Governor Johnson, who, in September (1863), appointed him as an agent to attend to these people exclusively. He held that office up to April, 1864, a period of seven months, during which he received about 10,000 persons, the poor whites of Tennessee, Georgia, and Alabama.

I took notes of his testimony at the time, and submitted them to Mr. Oviatt for correction, and thus amended I now reproduce them. "It was pitiable," he said, "before the office that he filled was created, to see the listlessness and extreme poverty of the refugees, who, during his term, were of the lower class almost exclusively. The men who accompanied the parties would sit down on their miserable and rude furniture with a stolid apathy, as if they had no interest in life and no motive for exertion. They paid no attention to anybody or anything, until their women came back and told them that they had found a place to go to until they could leave the city. The thought never seemed to suggest itself to them that it was the duty of the husband to go and search for a shelter for his wife and children." Mrs. Oviatt, who had lived in the South for fourteen years, and who had seen a great deal of the life of this class, added to her husband's statement that it was precisely the way in which they acted at home. "They depend for everything on their wives," she said. I asked her: "What did these men do, then?" "Oh! go fishing and hunting, and drink whiskey when they can get it," she responded. "The women do pretty much all the hard labor." I asked if they could read, and what proportion of them? Mr. Oviatt replied that their ignorance was "beyond anything we can conceive of in the North." "It was amazing. There is not one per cent. who can read." I enquired concerning their morals, and was told that nearly all the boys of eight and nine and upwards were smokers; that "they all swore and lied without any exceptions," and "so do all the women," he added. "They all swear and they all smoke or chew tobacco or dip snuff, and sometimes all four!" I had heard enough along the military railroads to have formed an unfavorable opinion of their fidelity to the marriage vow; but Mr. Oviatt said that in his opinion they were worse in that respect than the negro women themselves.

After a long conversation, I returned to the habits of these people, and asked again, "Do they all smoke, or chew, or dip?" Mr. Oviatt did not remember a single exception. Not one. The lower strata of these lower classes, he said, take the tobacco leaf, dry it, and chew it, without any other preparation. Mr. Oviatt could not recall a single instance of women or good-sized girls who did not use tobacco in some form. A young girl, a refugee from Northern Alabama, who was present, was asked if she knew of any woman or girl among her acquaintances who did not smoke. "Only one—granddaddy's folks," she replied; "the old man 's opposed to tobacco. But his is the only family I know that don't smoke."

These people have one peculiarity that is generally supposed to be characteristic of the negro. When they fall sick, they rarely recover. They seem to have no tenacity of life.

I made enquiries as to the relative self-reliance of the poor whites and the negroes. Mr. Oviatt said that he had taken pains to gather the statistics touching on this point, and permitted me to copy a paragraph from a private letter that he had written to a philanthropist thereon. It was dated February, 1864.

"A few words, now," he writes, "about the refugees and the contrabands. I find that for the five days ending the 15th instant, the number of rations issued was, for refugees, 3,648; for city poor, 3,229; for contrabands, 972. The number issued during the five preceding days was, for refugees, 2,919; for city poor, 1,940; for contrabands, 474. Putting the two together, we have for ten days 5,169 of city poor and 1,445 of contrabands—being about three and one-half for city poor for one black, supposing that their numbers were equal. But when we learn the relative proportion, it speaks still better for the black; for we have 23,000 whites in Nashville, and only 9,000 blacks. We find, therefore, that we are feeding .02¼ per cent. of the whites, while we are feeding but .016 per cent. of the whole negro population. In counting city poor I only take into account those who were residents here previous to the rebellion, all the rest being under the head of refugees; and, at the same time, in taking the total number of blacks in the city, I have taken colored refugees and all. Take the white as I have the black, and the per-centage is about .036—telling badly for the whites.

"I promised you some statistics comparing the blacks and Irish. I am told the Irish population of the city is about 3,000. The population, therefore, is as one to three of the blacks. Now, more than 60 per cent. of the city poor are Irish; and, taking the comparative number relieved, we have 6 Irish to 1 negro; or a disproportion as against the Irish of 18 to 1—18 Irish paupers to 1 negro pauper. Truly it may be said, as one friend remarked to me a few days ago, 'Better let the blacks take care of themselves, and put some one to hiring out and providing for the whites.'"

So far Mr. Oviatt, with his experience of 10,000 of these members of the new ruling class South; and his wife, with her fourteen years' life among them. After taking their testimony, I called at the Refugee Home. I found it in charge of a colonel whose name I failed to note, and have since forgotten. He said that there had been an average of three thousand refugees a month pass through this house all summer long, and at the time of my visit they numbered at least 4,000 monthly. Since the date of its establishment no less than 35,000 persons had found a temporary shelter under its roof. I asked the colonel whether these people were intelligent or the reverse. "Lord!" he exclaimed, as if amazed that the thought of intelligence could be associated with them, "they don't know B from a bull's foot. Half of them don't know anything at all. You have to kick everything into them." He described the men in the same terms as Mr. Oviatt used—as good-for-nothing, listless, lazy, and stupid: and the women as dirty in their habits and in their morals worse. But it was the women, he quickly added, who did all the work.

A few months later, I met at Cincinnati the secretary of the Refugee Commission, who thus describes the refugees that passed through its Temporary Home: "Of these refugees," he writes, "about two-thirds are worthy people, though they are ignorant and apparently have always been poor; they are industrious and anxious to improve, and seem honest and simple-hearted. About one-third are lazy and dirty, and so apathetic as to leave little hope for improvement in this generation. Still they are not likely to swell the police reports of the North. The absolutely vicious make a very small proportion of the whole. . . . Three-fourths of the whole—the women—have been trained to till the soil, obtaining a scanty living among the hills of Tennessee and Georgia." This is written of an experience of less than five hundred refugees, but is valuable as far as it goes to illustrate the character of the new ruling class South.

Carlyle says that every human brain, no matter how brutalized, has got some dim theory of the universe which it would profit one to hear, if stated with a becoming brevity. So these degraded poor whites have their notions of the "rebellion, its cause and cure," which I often heard delivered with many an oath, and flushing of the cheeks, and flashing of the eye, and amazing grammatical blunders. When at Dalton, and at other points in Georgia, I saw hundreds of the home guards, all of whom were fully developed specimens of the poor white trash. They came chiefly from the hilly northern counties of Georgia, in which the loyalists—nearly the entire poor population—had been very cruelly persecuted by the rebel authorities. They frankly avowed that their sole purpose in seeking to be recognized by the Federal Government as regular, or rather legitimate, troops was to obtain revenge. They wished to have the power to hang, shoot, and destroy in retaliation of the wrongs that they had endured. They desired, in other words, to be Federal bushwhackers, supported, armed, and equipped by the National Government. They were equally ignorant and vindictive; yet they understood clearly enough the true philosophy of the rebellion. They never spoke of the rebels but of "these big nigger-holders;" who, they said with one accord, must be killed and their estates divided up, or the Union would never be secure. "You can't get a principle out of a man unless you kill him," said one of them to me. "That's a fact," said the other, "you must kill a man to get the principle out of him." The first speaker went on to show that the "big nigger-holders" were thoroughly aristocratic; that while they held the land and owned the labor, the poor man must necessarily be driven to the sterile mountain districts; and, as a consequence, that the same class who brought on the rebellion would be again in power, and constitute the State, and reproduce the present state of things within a few years. "For," he added, "this war has only ground the principle into them worse than ever." I found this to be the almost universal sentiment of the loyal poor whites of Northern Georgia, Northern Alabama, and Eastern Tennessee.

After visiting nearly every town from Athens, Alabama, to Atlanta, Georgia, and from Nashville to Chattanooga, I thus wrote last autumn of the habits and houses of the poor whites, and if my notes are rough and unpolished, they have at least the fidelity of a daguerreotype as to details, and may serve indeed as a pleasant change to the smooth and scholarly English of your other contributors:

"I have more than once incidentally alluded to the prevalence of dipping and snuffing as practised by the women down here. In travelling by railroad every one has chances enough to see women smoking. They do not seek to conceal this habit. They can be seen sitting very often, with their chairs tipped back, serenely smoking at the doors of their houses. The pipes that these daughters of the South delight to patronize are frequently, I think generally, made out of a corn-cob whittled down. For stems they use canes and goose-quills. The custom is not merely common, it is universal among the lower classes.

"I walked on foot from Decatur, Alabama, to Athens—twelve or fifteen miles—and during this trip first saw with my own eyes the practice and the apparatus of dipping. As this is an indoor pastime, the traveller has less chance to see it than its twin-sister vice—smoking. It was at McDonald's Station. I went into a house, a large log-cabin, and asked if they would get me a dinner. There were two girls and a few children in the house. One of the girls seemed to be about eighteen, the other about fifteen years of age. But I found that they were each three years younger than my estimate. They called the woman of the house, the sister of the elder girl. She came in, said that I mowt dine there if I could wait, and lay down on a bed in that one of the two rooms that served for kitchen and dining apartment. I will not stop to describe either room. It is enough to say that it—that everything in it—was cheerless and rude and dirty; that it had no cellar, no closets, and only a thin floor; and that through the walls and through the floor the wind might enter and the rain might enter, even if the king of England could n't enter. The woman was really sick. She spat blood—and snuffy saliva. When she wanted to spit—which she often did—she slightly raised her long lank form, and spat against the sides of the house. Sometimes she missed her mark and spat against the high head-board of the bed.

"After my dinner of bacon, corn-bread, and butter-milk was eaten, the girl who cooked it—quite a pretty young creature—before going out for some water went to her sister's bed and tried to slide a tin box that I saw under the pillow beneath her apron. I playfully protested, and asked her if she dipped snuff? The sweet sisters seemed to take it as a matter of course, and were not at all hurt by the insinuation. They both defended the habit. It saved the teeth, they said, and all the women in their country either dipped, or smoked, or chewed, and sometimes all three. 'But do the rich folks do so?' I asked. 'Hooh!' said the younger girl, 'I guess they do—and get drunk at home, too!' Notwithstanding this broadside, I still protested against young girls learning to dip. 'Did you notice that young girl that was in a little while since?' asked the recumbent matron. 'She can dip as well as any of them!' Now the girl referred to was not thirteen years of age, a sickly, yellow-skinned girl, in the last stages of consumption, a disease of which her father lay dying. Enquiries since that time have shown that the woman spoke the truth—that the habits of dipping, chewing, and smoking are all but universal here among the females, rich and poor. . . . . The men admit without hesitation that their women constantly use tobacco. Do you know how this dipping is done? A little rag is tied on the end of a stick about the size and form of a pen-holder. The rag is moistened in the mouth of the fair devotee, dipped in the snuff, and then the teeth or gums are rubbed with it!"

After the battle of Nashville I had an excellent opportunity of seeing the poor whites of Southern Tennessee and Northern Alabama in their own homes. I accompanied Gen. Stedman, now commanding in Georgia, in the movement which was designed to prevent Hood from recrossing the Tennessee. In returning we scoured the bottom lands between Huntsville and Stevenson, which are exclusively occupied by the poor whites. I find that I thus recorded my experience of the country and the people:

"The section that Gen. Cruft and I traversed on this ride was a part of what are known as the bottom lands and the bluffs of the Tennessee. It is inhabited almost exclusively by poor whites. There are very few slaves and no rich people anywhere. But poor as it is, and out of the way, it had not escaped the eagle-eyed conscription of the rebels, nor the visits of their guerrillas, nor the retaliatory calls of the home guards, who style themselves loyal, and are so, but refuse to do other than local duty, which enables them to plunder with the semblance of authority. It is everywhere the same scene—low, wet, wooded land; the trees leafless, tall, thick, with dwarfish, ungraceful branches; here a worm-eaten trunk, still standing; there a stray bunch of green bushes, to make everything around it appear the more dreary by contrast: a 'God-forsaken country,' if there ever was one, to look at on a cold, rainy day, from horseback and a-hungry! The cliffs, on the other hand, are steep, rocky, covered with dull, ashen-colored trees—the haunts of the guerrilla and the buzzard; they are as cheerless as the bottoms that they overlook.

"The people are like the country—as dull-eyed and stupid as the lowlands; as gaunt, angular, and vacant as the bluffs. Their dress is coarse; their food is coarse; their manners and their thoughts are coarse. I write not of the rebels only, but of the entire population. Rebel or loyal, it is all the same in quality. They have no love of culture, of civilization, or of truth. The schoolmaster was abroad when this section was first settled, and has never returned to stay, up to date. To find young women who can read and write is the rare exception—to find them as ignorant as the plantation negro is the common rule. They are not to be blamed. They have had no chance and no encouragement. The wealthy slaveholders frowned on all attempts to educate the people, and the prejudices they created, or the vileness of their social system, speedily drove away any wandering Yankee whom accident or philanthropy or a desire to better his condition drifted into these benighted regions.

"The houses of these people are rude log huts, mostly without the interstices properly filled up, and therefore as cold as they are primitive and cheerless. It is singular to see how little 'gumption' they have. One loses patience with them. Instead of going to work and filling up all the gaps in the walls, and thereby keeping out the cold, they pile cords of wood on fires on the hearth, beneath chimneys that are built outside of the cabin, and that thereby scoop up all the warm air as fast as it is made. So they shiver and roast, roast and shiver, freezing on one side and scorching on the other, turning themselves round like human spits, heating themselves by detail and cooling themselves by sections, instead of securing by a little labor a comfortable room, where they could make one job of it and be done with it, and then go to some other work 'like Christians.' To make the matter worse, the wind takes the liberty to visit them through the floor. I did not wonder at seeing so many pale, wan, consumptive women. Their style of living is barbarous enough to kill a civilized horse. There is a heathendom in America that we have got to redeem before we can lay a just and permanent claim to the character and reputation of a civilized land."

Although my notes are still unexhausted, I cannot intrude any further on your space. I had intended to show by another series of facts that there must be universal suffrage in the South; that the disfranchisement of any class, instead of helping to promote an enduring peace, will inevitably produce instead, not a war of sections as recently, but of classes and of races as in St. Domingo.

JAMES REDPATH.

MALDEN, MASS.

TRIP TO NORTHERN ALABAMA.

NASHVILLE, TENN., August 2, 1865.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Having just returned to this place, I sit down to report the conversations, observations, and facts of a journey as far south as Huntsville, Alabama. I have conversed with many active rebels, with large land-owners, with scores of private soldiers formerly in the Confederate army, with Northern speculators and plantation lessees, and, last but not least, with hundreds of the freed people of all grades of intelligence.

The single car which on these military railroads is allotted to passengers was crowded with a motley company—officers and soldiers mustered out or returning to their stations, and the inevitable speculative Jew. One thing was discernible, and it had a deep significance. I heard no harsh words used in regard to the ex-rebels. Out of the generous depths, flushed though he is with victory, came from no national soldier in my hearing a word of scorn, boasting, or triumph. We whirled on past Franklin, Duck River, Pulaski, Decatur—all names that lifted the veil from memory and brought back sounds of victorious battle. Confederate soldiers were on board; from the Union men came no words which could grate harshly. If there were any uttered, they were whispered. Everybody was unarmed, and few, I am told, were in the habit of carrying side-arms.

I was soon attracted to those in the car who seemed to avoid anything like conversation on public topics. These were the Confederates. It was these I wanted to know. Behind me sat a large, good-natured looking man, with coarse, strong, but not ill-favored features, shabbily dressed, and evi dently a man of note. Soon it was noised about that this was Brigadier-General Roddy, of Alabama, a rebel cavalry commander, who had figured in the Tennessee Valley. He was on his way home with a pardon. Decidedly seedy, even ragged in dress, with flushed coarse face, and brusque, reticent manners, he yet appeared like a man of fair ability and good judgment. Union men speak well of him, and his character seems respectable at home. I tried to enter into conversation with him, but was not very successful at first.

At Columbia, Tennessee, a clean, dapper little man, smooth-shaven and keen-eyed, with a head and forehead reminding me much of the Hon. Robert J. Walker, entered the cars. I found him to be a lawyer, and that he had been a major in the rebel army.

Another member of the group was a cotton speculator—an Alabamian Unionist—"jest from Washington," where undoubtedly he had aided in the reconstruction policy now developing. This man impressed me disagreeably.

As the major took his seat, which he did alongside of Roddy, after the first greetings, he commenced giving his friends a description of affairs in Northern Mississippi, which he had just left. The picture as he sketched it was severe. The rebels were rampant, and Union men's lives were in constant danger. He spoke of a half dozen murders in as many minutes. He deprecated the state of affairs, and, turning to Roddy, said, "General, we 've taken the oath; we 've been whipped out; and now we ought to submit in good faith;" to which Roddy responded affirmatively.

Finding the party friendly, I introduced myself, and the conversation grew general.

The statements and views of this Confederate were so candid and sagacious that I must endeavor to give them to you in substance. In reply to a remark of mine that the North considered this war waged mainly for slavery by the South, he said:

"That was true only incidentally. Slavery was entirely a secondary consideration. True, we believed in it. I do yet. I think it the best position for the negro. But the true question at issue in the war was that of sovereignty. With Calhoun, I believe there can be no such thing, sir, as divided sovereignty. We of the South considered the States as sovereign, in the last resort. We seceded on this; we have fought you for four years to establish a confederation, and we have failed completely. You have conclusively established the fact that the American Republic has become a nation, and not a mere federation. You have proved the strength of consolidation, and are on the road to centralization. I accept the result in all sincerity. I am not convinced, nor is the South convinced, that they are or were wrong. But they realize that you had the power. I take therefore what you choose to give. The States have no rights now. At least this is true of those you call rebel. They are only territorial States. For one I accept the conditions. I do so in good faith. I doubt not we shall grow fat and prosperous beyond what we were in old times. I fought conscientiously, have been wounded, impoverished; but I am not such an ass, sir, as not to appreciate the great advantages which we, as Americans, are ultimately to gain from this development and consolidation of power. I look for results yet unrecognized. We may be called a republic, but we shall not be so in reality. I go in now, sir, for power."

This was, in effect, what the major said during a long conversation. I wanted his opinions, and did not therefore trouble him with mine. The brigadier-general avoided much talk, seemed wearied, and confined himself to monosyllables. The speculator put in a word of opposition now and then. Presently the inevitable negro question came in. This time the usher was the general, who exclaimed: "Wall, major, what 'll you do with the niggah?"

The little major said that the question presented no difficulty in his mind. Turning to me, he said:

"Why, sir, treat them fairly and they 'll work well, at least in raising corn, wheat, and hogs. I believe the negroes will leave the cotton States. He is n't going to work at that crop, sir."

"Why?" I asked.

"For exactly the same reason, sir, that you and I would not. Cotton requires "thirteen months in the year" to raise. The negro will not work harder than other people if not compelled to. He can work on farms in this belt, in Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, Kansas, Southern Illinois, and earn a living at half the labor that will be required in the cotton and sugar States. You in the North have abolished slavery and turned the negro loose, and now I want you to have the full benefit of your action. The negroes will flock up here and further North."

The cotton speculator broke in with an emphatic denial of the proposition. He declared that white emigration would displace them in the middle belt, and compel them to move to the Gulf States, where they would be pressed to the sea, into which the race would disappear. They were doomed to extinction, according to our Alabama Unionist, who seemed much gratified at the prospect he vividly depicted. The general brusquely issued his fiat, which was that "the blarsted free niggahs could not live here, sah." The major did not seem to be driven from his position by this opposition, but launched out again on a question which I adroitly introduced:

"Yes, sir, I am in favor of giving the negroes the suffrage. You Federals have freed them by the bayonet. You have armed them. Making freemen, making soldiers of them, I wonder that there should be the slightest difference of opinion among you as to making them voters. You have got the power now. These States have no rights now. You can do it at this time with the least difficulty."

The general expressed his contempt of the idea of "niggah suffrage," saying, "I don't expect to vote for a long time to come, and if the niggahs are to vote, I never want to do so again."

"Wall, general," replied the major, "you would n't leave them to be legislated for without granting them a voice therein? I am a pro-slavery man—have always been—believed the system right. I never owned many slaves. They are all on my place in Mississippi, and I have made contracts with them. But now that the negroes have been made free, against my will, I believe they should have all the rights that belong to freedom."

"They'll be wanting to marry your daughters next," broke in the speculator.

"So much the worse for the nigger, then, if any white woman should marry one. I ain't afraid of such a result. My daughter will I trust be too well trained for that. No, gentlemen, the negro is free, and I want to have all the rights given him that can make him a valuable and useful citizen."

Asking if such views as his were at all common, he replied:

"No. But you'll find, captain, that the cultivated gentlemen of the South will generally come to these conclusions. They are the negroes' best friends. His worst enemies are the poor whites, who have a bitter, unyielding prejudice. Why, sir, I dare not express these views at home. (He lived in Columbia, Tenn.) As I said, I am a pardoned rebel, I have served and been wounded, yet I cannot express the views I've given you frankly to-day without danger of personal violence. They would declare that S—— was toadying to the Yanks. I am going to do what I can to help out these ideas in good faith on my place and among my people."

This may fairly be considered a remarkable conversation. Shortly after the major left the train, and I entered into conversation with an intelligent young man who occupied the same seat with me. I found he had been a Confederate soldier, but had taken the oath about a year ago. His testimony was emphatic that the rank and file of rebeldom were heartily sick and tired of the war. He had met but one of his old comrades who declared he would go into it again if the chance was given. Most of the privates realized that the objects of the war, on the part of Southern leaders, were not beneficial to them as a class. The "'ristocrats" were to gain all. This seems to have been a very general conviction. The only question upon which the leading Southern politicians can win power again will be that of negro suffrage. Settle it now, and all will acquiesce, because, perforce, they must. Leave it to become a bone of contention in the State politics, and the whole pack of demagogues who led the South into rebellion will begin to bay again.

I had an interesting talk with General Roddy after this, mainly in relation to the Mexican question and the crops. The latter were flourishing, though, because of a panic in prices last spring, there was not so large an area of cotton planted as was at first expected. A great deal of corn was being raised. The yield of both would be good. He thought Northern emigration desirable. Intended to remain in his State, and be a good and loyal citizen. Considerable cotton from the last crop was yet left in the country. As to Mexico, he said the sympathies of the Southern soldiers were altogether with Juarez. If we crossed the Rio Grande, he wanted to go there with Sherman. He liked and thought him a great man; agreed with his views as expressed at Indianapolis. The Southern people had no love for Napoleon or for England. They had been fooled by the idea of intervention until they declared those powers were treacherous. For his part, he did not believe Napoleon had ever promised or hinted at intervention, but he had taken occasion of our troubles to impose his puppet upon the Mexicans. It was, or appeared so to us, the interest of the great powers to see us divided, but they all "let I dare not wait upon I would." On the whole, I liked this man. He will make a good citizen. He is regarded as a soldier of fair abilities by our officers.

Decidedly the most dangerous and least desirable of the class was our cotton speculator, Captain N. He was a warm partisan of Judge Parsons, Provisional Governor of Alabama. Captain N.'s opinions were expressed at length; tersely told, without his expletives, they were that Northern emigration and wealth would rebuild the Southern waste places; that the negroes were idle, worthless brutes; that they never would be of any service, had n't sense enough to look out for to-morrow, and would finally, within a hundred years, become extinct, except in the American tropics. The negro never was a colonizer, nobody but the Anglo-Saxon, the Teuton, did that. From the scraps of personal history which drifted on the stream of his talk, I gathered that the captain was from the ranks of the poor whites.

Among the most interesting facts brought to my knowledge were those given me by a Northern planter, who, hearing our talk and seeing my purpose, introduced himself. He was formerly lieutenant-colonel of an Ohio regiment, and now, with the major of the same regiment, had leased and was cultivating a plantation in Limestone County, Alabama, upon the line of road on which we were travelling. In brief, his testimony about the negro's value as a laborer was this: "Our plantation retained its former slaves when we leased it in February last. We had six hundred acres of cotton under cultivation, paying the owners five dollars for every acre. This made a rent of $3,000, too heavy altogether. We have fifty working hands, to whom we pay $15 per month for first class, from $6 to $12 for other grades. Ten are first class hands; twelve receive $12 per month; the rest between that and the lowest rate. We commenced in February with the same people that were on the place before and during the war. During the whole time we have never had reason to complain of want of industry. All work eagerly. We try to labor ten hours each day. Not one has left. The owner, former overseer, and all the neighbors say we've got the best crop of cotton that has been raised on the place. Have never employed so docile, industrious, and good-humored a set of people in all our experience. Formerly hands worked from daylight to dark, from twelve to fifteen hours. Every one is eager to learn. There is not a man or woman on the place without a primer or spelling-book, with which every available minute is occupied." Said the colonel: "Every Northern planter within my experience has succeeded. All that is needed is justice and kindness."

The colonel expressed doubts as to the expediency of giving the ballot to the negro. He was abstractly in favor of it, but was afraid they would be wholly controlled by their employers. He said he could control all the men on his place. I asked if this was not due to the fact of his being a Northern man and treating them fairly. He said, somewhat; still he again expressed his fears of their ignorance. After a long talk on this subject, these were the conclusions we both came to: That the question of negro suffrage South was now one of expediency—of how much power was needed, and in what way to obtain it. The negro's instincts were thoroughly bound to us. When, as in Col. B.'s case, the intelligence of the employer led and consorted with the freedmen's instincts, the intelligent would control the ballot; otherwise not. These results might be seen more palpably, but they would not be any different from those in the Northern States. My friend the Northern planter concluded, that it was really vital to the Southern Unionists that the weight of the negro's ballot should be thrown into the balance.

THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

V.

LYNCHBURG, Va., July 31, 1865.

SIX miles below Lynchburg, a gray stone barn that crowns a hill near the river is pointed out to the traveller as the place where, in the summer of 1864, Hunter's men first showed themselves. There an advance party of his troops made an unsuccessful attempt to burn a railroad bridge. The little earthwork which beat them off still frowns from a neighboring eminence. Behind the city, upon the mountains two or three miles away, can be seen the spot whence a day or two afterwards the baffled Federal general turned back and began his hasty retreat up the valley.

The escape of the Lynchburgers at that time was a narrow one, but until after Lee's surrender the town had never been molested nor occupied by the Union army, and, except that a Confederate storehouse was then destroyed by Sheridan's soldiers, the actual ravages of war have never visited the citizens. But the more indirect evils which the rebellion brought upon all the South this city has evidently suffered. Trade is dead, the people have no money, nor is there a prospect of their soon getting any, for nothing but breadstuffs has been raised this season, and the stock of tobacco, more or less injured, which is all they have to sell, is in the hands of comparatively few men. The shelves of the shops are scantily supplied with poor goods, and several times after purchasing some small article I have been obliged to leave it untaken, because the merchant was not able to give me change for a five-dollar note. Silver and gold are, however, oftener seen in circulation here than in the ordinary trade of any Northern city, and the people show a somewhat extravagant preference for a specie currency. I was yesterday an eye-witness of the following transaction. Two soldiers bought a quart of buttermilk from a small negro boy. "What d'ye want for it?" said one. The prompt answer was: "Five cents in silver, or ten cents in greenbacks."

The method of the adult traders in computing the relative values of the two kinds of money is a little better than this. It is not perfect, however, and the aid of the provost-marshal is not unfrequently called in to settle disputes between buyer and seller. If gold is quoted in Richmond at 140, the dealer in small wares at Lynchburg, if I understand the process, deducts from the face value of a paper dollar the excess over one hundred in the price of gold, and considers the dollar greenback to be worth not seventy-one cents but sixty. He finds some who put up with the imposition, while others, familiar with general orders and not wholly ignorant of arithmetic, resist, and summon the military power.

The rough little city is built on several round-topped hills that descend abruptly to the banks of the James, which is here an insignificant stream at the bottom of a rocky valley hardly wider than the river's bed. The streets, which run towards the water, are almost precipitous, and all the streets, whether steep or not, are dirty and ill-paved. At present they are unlighted at night, and, though guarded by soldiers, are considered unsafe after nightfall. The warehouses, manufactories, and private residences are, for the most part, mean in appearance, and the stranger is surprised to learn that, before the war, in proportion to the number of inhabitants, Lynchburg was, with the single exception of New Bedford, Massachusetts, the richest city in the United States. But if there is little which, to the casual eye, is indicative of wealth, there are many signs that the reputation of the place as a famous tobacco mart was well deserved. In the business portion of the town the air is redolent of the favorite weed. The windows of half the shops make a display of earthen pipes, bundles of tobacco in the leaf, packages of smoking tobacco, and boxes of tobacco to be chewed. One is everywhere attracted by such titles as "the Celebrated Killikinnick," or "the Celebrated Garibaldi Smoking Tobacco," the "Tony Lumpkin," "Bob Lee," "Lone Jack," and "Billy Bowlegs, Last King of the Everglades." On the papers of this last named variety the inscription says that, "as Billy was without an equal in love for his tribe and hunting-grounds, so this tobacco stands unrivalled in point of delicacy." But, apparently, for all the varieties there are customers. Nearly every one uses tobacco in one or two of its forms, and no public place is without an array of spittoons. In the pews of the most fashionable church in Lynchburg I noticed spittoons in use.

The opinion seems to prevail among the people that the renown of their city as the tobacco metropolis has passed away with slavery, and that, for a long time at least, it will not return. They say that free labor cannot be profitably applied to the culture of tobacco on a large scale. This opinion may or not be of weight. The men who hold it express great contempt for free negro labor in general. "Free nigger labor may do on a trucking farm, or something like that, but it won't raise tobacco. You can't place any dependence on it. We may be able to do something with white labor by-and-bye."

These gentlemen firmly believe that the negro not only will be, but that in most parts of the South he to-day is, a pauper. Yet I find no man who does not admit that in his own particular neighborhood the negroes are doing tolerably well—are performing whatever agricultural labor is done. From the most trustworthy sources I learn that, in the vicinity of Lynchburg, of Danville, of Wytheville—in counties embracing a great part of southern and southwestern Virginia—the colored population may be truly described as orderly, industrious, and self-supporting. And this seems to be plainly shown by the reports, drawn up by Government officials, of the issue to citizens of what are known as "Destitute Rations." The exact figures I have in the case of two counties only. During the month of June, relief was furnished 961 persons in Bedford County: of these, 13 were blacks. In Campbell County 530 persons received sustenance from the Government: of these 530 persons, 12 were blacks. In other counties sometimes less, sometimes greater, numbers of persons than in Bedford and Campbell were supplied with food, and in them all the proportion of the negroes to the white people was substantially the same with that given above.

This distribution has been going on ever since the end of May, but very recently the general commanding in this district has deemed it proper to stop all issues of rations to citizens, except in well authenticated instances of actual pauperism.

The personal knowledge of the issuing officer that the person who asks for food is, by reason of age or infirmity, unable to earn his living, and that he has no relative whose duty it is to support him, is now made the only ground of bestowing the ration. Heretofore it could be obtained if the person demanding it would first swear allegiance to the United States, and then subscribe to an oath which set forth in the following words the requisite degree of poverty in the petitioner: "I do solemnly swear before Almighty God, the searcher of all hearts, that I am in destitute circumstances; that I have nothing to subsist upon; that I have no money to purchase subsistence; that I have made every effort in my power to obtain employment, and without success; that I am ———, with ——— helpless children, and that unless relief is afforded me I must perish: So help me God." But the fact that a man had taken these two oaths was found to be no perfect criterion of his honesty or poverty. Whatever may have been the case immediately after the occupation of this part of Virginia by the Federal troops, for some time past it has been plainly discernible that the very large majority of those claiming to be destitute might easily support life without taxing the charity of the Government.

One man was discovered to have come in from the country, drawn rations for himself and his family, and before leaving the city to have expended several dollars in purchasing apple-brandy. Another drew rations who had four adult sons, any one of whom might have kept their father from the necessity of begging, as all were at work and earning fair wages. An old lady coming to the place of distribution was accosted by the clerk with the enquiry if she were not the owner of several tenements in the town, the rents of which she was regularly receiving. After some hesitation she replied in the affirmative. The officer then asked if it was true that she had stood upon the bridge one day a little while before and cursed the Yankees? The old woman, finding denial vain, and perceiving that she was to have no more rations, replied in the affirmative to this question also, and went away declaring that she wanted no more Yankee rations, and that she still had sons left to fight for the Confederacy if ever there should be another war.

The continual occurrence of such cases as these; the enormous number of rations required; the evidence afforded by the face of the country that the crop now about to be gathered is a plentiful one; and the seeming certainty that, without regard to actual want, the demand for rations would continue as long as the Government would continue to give them away, caused General Curtis to prohibit the issue on and after August 1, 1865. An order made in May last, by General Gregg, which allows farmers, in order that they may be the better able to provide for the laborers upon their plantations, to buy supplies from the military stores, paying for them in cash, or giving bonds to pay for them in cash or in kind when the crops shall have been harvested, has not, I think, been rescinded by General Curtis, but is still in force. In the earlier part of the season many planters availed themselves of the permission thus granted, which was doubtless of advantage to them and to the negroes. In reference to the remarkable fact that so very few negroes of all the great number inhabiting the region round about Lynchburg have sought food from the Government, it is fair to say that the military authorities, when the matter was wholly in their hands, and in those of the agency of the Freedmen's Bureau recently established, have not permitted the planters to set adrift all or any of the negroes from their homes. It is considered that the crops, which in part were planted before the slaves became free, and which have all been worked by them throughout the year, are justly chargeable with the support of the laborers and those dependent upon them. Some planters have shown a disposition to turn loose all such negroes as were neither able-bodied themselves nor had near relations able to work, and whose labor could be taken as payment for the board and lodging of all. One gentleman, somewhat advanced in years and averse to the trouble of managing free negroes, wished to let his farm stand idle, and to send away at once about sixty people, who might, very likely, have become a burden on the community at large. He was very angry when informed that no such discharge could be permitted, and that for the present, at least, the negroes must stay where they were. But the large majority of farmers have kept with them those of their former slaves who would stay, and the large majority of these latter willingly remain in their old homes and work for wages. The amount of pay given them varies a good deal. When wages are paid in money, five dollars per month seems to be the usual rate. But it is believed that on many plantations nothing more is given than the food and clothes of the laborer and his family. Whether this is true or not, I do not know. The Superintendent of Freedmen in this district informs me that among the poorer farmers, whose operations this year are confined to raising food only, it is very probably true that the laborer gets only his board and lodging. Some plantations are "worked on shares." In one case which has fallen under my observation, the employer agrees to feed and clothe the laborers, to allow each family a patch of ground for a garden, and at the end of the year to divide among them one-seventh of the total produce of the farm. The crops planted are corn, oats, wheat, potatoes, and sorghum. The wheat has been already divided. On that plantation there is no dissatisfaction now existing. Not long since the blacksmith refused to do field-work, but afterwards agreed when not at work in the shop to work with the other hands. His view of the subject was that his labor was skilled labor, that it was necessary to the plantation, and that he was entitled to his share of the crop, even though he worked but one half of the time. There are a thousand questions of this sort which are very embarrassing to the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. They labor with the disadvantage of having as yet no very definite instructions to guide them in the performance of their perplexing duties.

The planters, the negroes, and they themselves have no certain knowledge of the precise nature and extent of the power lodged in their hands. The negroes go in blind faith to the superintendent or his local assistant, as the "head Yankee" of whom everything is to be expected, sometimes on a reasonable errand, as to complain that they have been beaten, sometimes with such a request as that the farm on which they live be divided amongst them. A few words of sensible advice usually settles the affair, though now and then warning and reproof are required. For example: a negro charges his employer with having knocked him down. The master being called on for his defence asserts that the negro was insolent. The insolence, however, consisting in nothing worse than his saying "Mister" Smith instead of "master," the employer is instructed that now, before the law, the colored man is the equal of the white, and that corporal punishment of farm servants is not allowed.

The white people are often very far wrong in their notions of the object for which the Bureau of Freedmen was organized, and the power committed to its officers. I was waiting the other day in the office of the superintendent when two gentlemen of respectable appearance entered and announced themselves as planters from the State of Mississippi. The conversation on their part was carried on by one, the other saying nothing. Both seemed to listen with very great interest to all that was said to them. The speaker said their business with the superintendent was to get from him about a hundred Virginia negroes to be taken down to Mississippi to work on cotton. They were informed that the officer had no power to send away negroes unless they chose to go. They asked if they couldn't get a hundred paupers or criminals. But the superintendent had not at command so many of either class or of both together. They asked if negroes could not be apprenticed to them for a term of years. But apprenticeship, except of boys in cities, who in exceptional cases may be put with a tradesman to learn his craft, is not permitted.

"Well, now," said the gentleman, "this is how the thing is. I've got land there, and I'm going to raise cotton. I've spent pretty nearly $20,000 for mules and harnesses and a complete outfit generally. What I want to know is this—you say you can't use compulsion to make these Virginia niggers go down there—what compulsion will the Government let me use to make them work when I've got them there, anyhow?"

"You seem to think all negro labor must be compulsory."

"Why, of course it must. How long have you lived in a slave State, sir?"

"I have lived within twenty-five miles of one a good part of my life. But you must look to the experience of those who have tried free labor. There is Mr. B. G——, on the James. He has about two hundred and eighty-seven negroes. They were with him as slaves, and he has employed them all since they were emancipated. Only three went away from his place, and the rest, he says, are doing very well indeed. One example like that is worth a great deal of theory."

"Yes, I know him very well. Didn't know he had so many as that, though. But I know the nigger. The employer must have some sort of punishment. I don't care what it is. If you'll let me tie him up by the thumbs, or keep him on bread and water, that will do. Over here in Rock bridge County, as I came along I saw a nigger tied up by the wrists. His hands were away up above his head. I went along to him, and says I, 'Boy, which would you like best now, to stay there where you are, or to have me take you down, give you forty good cuts, and let you go?' 'Rather have the forty lash,' says he. So he would, too. You folks used to make a good deal of talk because we gave our niggers a flogging when they deserved it. I won't ask leave to flog, if you'll let me use some of your Northern punishments. All I want is just to have it so that when I get the niggers on to my place, and the work is begun, they can't sit down and look me square in the face and do nothing."

The superintendent could not encourage him to hope that the Bureau would deport negroes to Mississippi, nor that it would allow him to use on his plantation the punishments which he seemed to think necessary. If the negro would n't work, he could be complained of. When a Northern laborer violated a contract he was sued.

"Ah! sue the nigger! Can he give his testimony in court? Will his testimony be taken?"

"It is taken here, sir; and it will be in Mississippi—at any rate, while that State is occupied by Federal troops."

"Why, no nigger can be believed whether he is under oath or not. No one that knows a nigger will ever think of believing him if it's for his interest to lie."

The gentlemen took their leave, very much dissatisfied with the state of affairs in Virginia, and with the prospects of planters throughout the Southern country. They were particularly severe upon the policy of obliging a master who wished to discharge his servants to keep them and feed them on his plantation till the Government might be ready to remove them. It was nothing more or less than a confiscation of white men's property to the use and benefit of the black man. It was a most unjust measure. They were reminded that the negro had done work on the crop, and had a lien upon it for his labor, and that it could be no great hardship to the landowner if the Government compelled him to relieve it of a heavy burden at no greater cost to himself than giving up to the use of the negroes some cabins and some land which would otherwise remain empty and uncultivated. But they were not disposed to look upon the matter as anything but an act of mere power on the part of the Government. Of course, it would have to be submitted to. The man did not free his own slaves. The Government freed them. Let the Government take care of them.

The gentleman in charge of the interests of freedmen who resides in this city is superintendent of nine counties. He has one assistant superintendent here in Lynchburg, another at Danville. Both of these are of the rank of lieutenant. At each county seat he has an infantry sergeant and four men, belonging to the company which is in garrison at the village. In these large Virginian counties people sometimes come from a distance of seventeen or twenty miles to make an enquiry or to answer to a complaint. The mere length of way to be traversed before a case can be examined must often prove an almost insurmountable obstacle to the proper or the speedy transaction of business. A negro, perhaps, comes in from a plantation ten or fifteen miles from the court-house, and makes a complaint of having been ill-treated. To the stories of negroes, as to those of most other men, there are two sides, but to hear the statement of the man's employer it will be necessary for the sergeant to make a journey of twenty or thirty miles. Probably the case is dismissed without investigation, or an investigation, if made, imposes on some one an undue amount of labor.

In quantity the business of a day is sometimes very great, for both the white men and the negroes make constant application to the officers of the Bureau, very many of the cases, of course, being trivial, but others being of importance and requiring for their settlement a good deal of tact and judgment. At present there seems to be need of more and somewhat better labor in this field. The higher officers of the Bureau, as it exists in this part of Virginia, are apparently men well qualified for their position. Generally they have served in the army as bonded officers (commissaries, quartermasters, etc.), and, by the terms of their commissions, being held in the service during the good pleasure of the President, are not mustered out of service with other officers of their rank, but remain and are available for the position and duties of superintendents. The lower offices are by no means so well filled. Probably, when it shall be no longer doubtful whether the civil or the military power is to have control of the affairs of freedmen, the local agencies will be made more efficient or replaced by something of a different nature. The agents of the Bureau may perhaps find all their energies taxed in the proper performance of their duties during the coming winter. They certainly will, if the prophecy to which I listened yesterday afternoon should be fulfilled. It was from the lips of a poor white with whom I talked for half an hour or so. He enlisted my services to read to him a hand-bill advertising a sale of Government horses and mules. Here and there, where the letters were capitals, he could spell out a word, but was unable to master the smaller type. I read it to him, and he asked me if the horses would probably be branded as condemned animals. I said I supposed they would be, in order that they might be distinguished from those marked "U. S.," as there would very likely be a good many Government horses in the South as long as the country was occupied by the Federal soldiers.

"That will be for more than one twelvemonth. Why, down in Georgia they is killin' each other yet. I'm told that them secessionists make threats that they 'll kill every Union man and every nigger as soon as the soldiers go away from thar. Why will they keep on contendin'? We Southerners will have it all to pay for. The niggers did n't make theirselves free. 'T was another man done that. But some do hate the niggers. You mark me, thar 'll be a heap o' trouble when Christmas comes, when the end o' the year comes, and the niggers' time 's out that they 's hired for. They 'll be awfully defrauded. I can see it goin' on right under my own observation. I know houses yer whar they keep a nigger till his month 's most out, and then they make a muss with him, and kick him out without any wages. Poor men like me has got to pay for it. Of course, if they do n't pay, the niggers can't keep themselves, and it 'll come on us. They 'll be cheated all kinds o' ways. Do n't I know it? You mark me, a heap o' them niggers 'll die like rotten sheep."

Walking along the main street the other morning, I met several parties of negro boys and girls with primers in their hands, evidently on their way to school. Turning about in my walk, I followed two grotesque-looking little creatures till I came to the door of a large brick tobacco warehouse or manufactory. Looking in, I saw that it was empty of merchandise, and fitted up with benches as if for a school. The scholars were there also, and two soldiers, to whom I introduced myself, and by whom I was invited to stay and see the school when in session. Both teachers were enlisted men, privates in a Pennsylvania regiment. They were detailed at their own request for this duty. No pay is given them, but while engaged in teaching they are relieved from all camp duties. One was without experience as a teacher, the other told me he had been a schoolmaster before entering the army.

By nine o'clock about one hundred and thirty children, of all ages between three and twenty, were assembled, and the school exercises began. "I want to be an Angel" was sung in clear and pleasant tones, and with great correctness of emphasis and pronunciation. The first stanza and the chorus all the children knew, and the rest of the hymn they sang two lines at a time as the teacher dealt it out to them.

While the singing went on, I amused myself by counting the faces which gave unmistakable evidence of their owners being of mixed blood. There were all tints and shades of yellow among the forty-nine boys present, and I could find but twenty-seven who seemed to me to be purely African. Among the girls the proportion was much the same.

After the singing a chapter of the New Testament was read, and then the alphabet class recited. They knew their letters backwards and forwards, they could pick out the letters by name, and they could tell which were vowels and which were consonants. I thought they had made rapid progress in the four weeks during which they had been under instruction.

A more advanced class then read a column of a child's paper. One or two of the little girls read exceedingly well. They had been taught, they said, when they were slaves.

In Lynchburg, besides this school, which contains about one hundred and fifty pupils, there is another, taught in the same way, which contains three hundred and fifty more children. It is a pleasant and encouraging sight to see the willingness with which the scholars apply themselves to their lessons, and the very respectable measure of success which rewards their efforts.

It is a sight, too, which has attracted some attention in Lynchburg. The Republican, urging upon its readers the importance of providing for the education of their children, speaks of the freedmen's schools, and says, "How utterly important is it that benefits should not accrue through governmental or other philanthropy to these children of a degraded race of which our own are deprived through our culpable neglect and thoughtlessness."

ENGLAND.—QUESTIONS FOR THE NEXT PARLIAMENT.

London, July 29, 1865.

I was somewhat amused in reading in the first number of The Nation, which reached me the other day, a complaint that the week had been barren of events. Lazarus in the same way might have wondered feebly at Dives grumbling that there was nothing he could eat upon his table. If you, with a rebellion only just suppressed, with political trials, confiscations, financial crises, reconstructions, emancipation, and a variety of the vastest social problems in actual solution, complain that there is little stirring, what would you say to us? Never within my recollection as a news-purveyor has there been so little stirring. Our one solitary "pièce de résistance"—the elections—is well-nigh bare to the bone. We have served it up hot and cold, grilled and broiled, and hashed and minced and stewed; and now we are eyeing it hungrily, to see if there is enough left upon it for a single meal more. And to-morrow! Ah! insufficient for the day is the meal thereof, and the morrow must take care of itself. Let me see what scraps there are left of electioneering news. The whole tale of six hundred and fifty-eight members has now been returned. Mr. Gathorne Hardy alone amidst his brother senators has been elected for two seats, Oxford and Leominster; but, on the other hand, there has been a tie in the Dumbartonshire election, so that there will have to be a new writ issued, when Parliament next meets, for this remote constituency. Accounts differ as to the proportions in which the new House should be divided between the supporters of the ministry and the opposition; and according to the fairest estimate, the Government will command a majority of upwards of forty votes. The political value of this majority is less easily calculated than its numerical one. The Morning Post, of course, assumes that any Liberal may be relied on to support Lord Palmerston, while the Standard takes it for granted that any Conservative will always vote with Mr. Disraeli. Both assumptions are equally erroneous. However, I have written to you before about my views as to the composition of the new House of Commons; and till the session opens, which in all likelihood will not be the case till February next, any discussion of this kind is mere guess-work.

Ireland, as usual, has disappointed the anticipations of those who professed to understand her best. Instead of the Tories gaining, as they had expected, in the sister kingdom, they have actually lost seven seats—fifty-six Liberals being returned against forty-eight Conservatives. But whether any definite principle can be adduced to account for this Liberal reaction, is a point about which I can express no opinion. To judge from the returns, the Papal Brigade is less popular in Ireland now than it was seven years ago. Three of its most conspicuous members have been rejected in constituencies where the power of the priesthood was thought to be supreme. Mr. Vincent Scully, who has sat for the county of Cork for many years, was unseated in spite of the fact that he was the recognized champion of the conventual system and the staunch opponent of every proposal for the inspection of religious establishments. Mr. Lever, the nominee of the famous Father Daly, of Galway, the gentleman who declared openly he would vote for any party in Parliament which supported the claims of the Atlantic Mail Company to a Government subsidy, has been turned out of the "Liverpool of the future," as Galway was described by the promoters of the ill-fated packet company; and, strangest of all, Mr. Pope Hennessey is in a minority of six in King's County. Of all the Catholic members in the House he was, more than any other, the representative of the Ultramontane clergy. Unless common report was more mistaken than usual, the late member for King's County owed everything to the priesthood, not only his seat, but the means of supporting the expenses of a Parliamentary career; yet in spite of the stigma which attached to this suspicion, Mr. Hennessey had worked himself into a recognized position in the House. Having an ungrateful task to perform, he did it gracefully, and whenever he could get on the popular side, consistently with his functions as representative of the priesthood, he did so spiritedly. Throughout the whole of the Polish insurrection he was the recognized Parliamentary champion of the insurgents. He stopped for some time at Cracow during the period when Austria was coquetting with the Poles; he was in constant communication with the Emperor of the French; and, like all political adventurers in this country, he was a warm partisan of the South and closely connected with the agents of the Confederacy. But, in spite of all this, the priests could not secure his re-election. However, he was too valuable an advocate of the Catholic clergy to be long left out in the cold, and, unless I am mistaken, Parliament has not heard the last of Pope Hennessey. Perhaps, however, the oddest incident connected with Irish elections is the return of Mr. Reardon, at Athlone. The new member is an auctioneer and house-agent in Piccadilly, London, somewhat known as a local vestry orator. He was taking a holiday journey through Ireland at the time of the elections, and happening to be at Athlone while the contest was going on, he took it into his head to make a speech at some election meeting or other. His oratory so delighted the men of Athlone that they then and there proposed to return him as their representative, and, on his saying he had no objection, they carried out their idea, and have sent him up to Parliament. Such, at least, is the current story. In the penultimate Parliament an undertaker called Townsend was returned for Greenwich, but his electioneering expenses ruined him, and he resigned his seat after a few weeks, went upon the stage, and played Hamlet, if I remember rightly, as ex-M.P., failed as an actor, and was heard of no more. I trust that Mr. Reardon's fate may be more propititious.

It is, in truth, earnestly to be wished that the Irish members in the new Parliament may be of a class to carry weight by their opinions as well as their votes. There is a general impression in well informed quarters that the "Irish question" will be a very prominent one next session. It would be unjust to assume that Englishmen are in any sense indifferent to the sufferings of Ireland. Our difficulty—I am speaking of the nation without respect to parties—is that we do not know how to deal with her. We have given her the same political and commercial privileges as we enjoy ourselves; and yet we find that the very diet which renders us healthy affords her no nourishment. The one single political privilege enjoyed by Englishmen and not by Irishmen is the right of forming volunteer regiments; but this is simply due to the fact that Irishmen cannot be trusted not to use their arms against each other in party strife. When a mob of Orange electors not only shoot a man dead in cold blood, as they did at Castle Blayney, and then put up triumphal arches to celebrate the event, how can you allow the formation of armed partisan corps? For the last twenty years the popular impression amongst educated Englishmen has been that, having done "justice to Ireland," we had done all in our power to do. We attributed her continued calamities to accidental causes, or to the effect of past misgovernment; but with free institutions and free trade, we felt sure that Ireland's regeneration was a mere question of time. This faith has received of late a severe blow. With all the good-will in the world, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that Ireland is becoming depopulated, and all the doctrines of political economy or constitutional freedom cannot convince honest men that there is not something radically wrong in the condition of a country from which the inhabitants fly daily by hundreds. Something must be done; but what that something is, it is not easy to say. The very system which works well here breaks down across St. George's Channel. For instance, the legal relations between landlord and tenant are exactly the same in both countries. Short leases are the custom in England as well as Ireland. Yet with us, as a rule, no landlord thinks of raising the rent year by year whenever there is a little better harvest than usual; and no tenant exhausts the land for the sake of a single crop. Lessor and lessee exercise a kind of mutual consideration, which renders their relations profitable to both. In Ireland, on the other hand, landlord and tenant are engaged in trying which can screw the most out of each other; and the former, having capital on his side, generally gets the best of the bargain. Similar instances might be enumerated by the dozen, in which the self-same institutions that suit the Anglo-Saxon race do not accommodate themselves to the genius of the Celtic.

In fact, of late years, a grave doubt has sprung up amongst thinking men whether our system of doing for Ireland as we do for ourselves is not based upon a fundamental error. This doubt has unquestionably been strengthened by the spectacle of the growth of France beneath the Napoleonic empire. There is no love in England for Cæsarism in itself, any more than there is with you. But still, as a nation, we are, I think, singularly amenable to the logic of accomplished facts. Now no honest observer, be his theories of government or his political predilections what they will, can refuse to acknowledge the fact that a government based on principles antagonistic to our own, founded on a denial of those truths we have been apt to consider as political axioms, has developed the material prosperity and the internal resources of France to a degree which beforehand we should have thought incredible. Imperialism, in fact, has done for France what the constitutional monarchy of Louis Philippe, framed after our English model, had failed to do utterly. For a long time we refused to believe the evidence of our senses. Can any good come out of the "coup d'état?" was our invariable answer to all arguments based upon the increased prosperity of the French empire. But gradually we have come to see that the prosperity created by the empire is, be the cause good or bad, of a solid character; and seeing this, the question has arisen in many minds whether there may not be some resemblance between the remedies required for Ireland and France. No sane man has ever dreamed of establishing a despotism across the Channel; but a great many very sane men have thought seriously whether the fundamental principle of imperialism was not applicable to Ireland. That principle I take to be, that the initiative in all public matters should be taken by the state, not by the individual. In England, as in America, we have found that the system of leaving everything to private enterprise has, on the whole, succeeded admirably. In Ireland it has failed; and there is much to be said in favor of the method of stimulating private industry by state control and assistance. To this view Mr. Gladstone is understood to be a convert. In the next Parliament, as I have before remarked, he will occupy a far more important position than he did in the last; and the idea of regenerating Ireland is one singularly attractive to a mind like his, influenced at once by a strong sense of duty and an extreme ambition for fame. My own impression, therefore, is, that the Tenant Right question, the position of the Irish Church, the expediency of state subventions for public works, will be actively discussed during the course of next session; and that the enormous influence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be exerted in favor of that party which holds that the "laissez faire" principle, though admirably adapted for England, is not applicable to Ireland. The advocates of this view will number in their ranks no small proportion of the advanced Liberals. The free trade views of Napoleon III. have won him considerable popularity with the Manchester party. The bitterest critics of the Empire have always been found amongst the Whigs, not amongst the Radicals; and the late Mr. Cobden was one of the staunchest supporters of the doctrine that the Napoleonic government suited the requirements of France. Mrs. Cobden, by the way, has just offered the Emperor a bust of her husband in a letter addressed to M. Chevalier. In this letter she says: "Knowing how firm and true my beloved husband found his Majesty in the great and beneficent work of the treaty of commerce between England and France, I am sure that he will feel a pleasure in recalling to his memory the face of one who fully sympathized with and comprehended all the greatness of France and the French people." The offer, I need scarcely say, was accepted as frankly as it was made gracefully.

Happily for the interests of newspapers, our social budget has been far fuller than our political one. Constance Kent has had her punishment commuted to imprisonment for life with hard labor, and is to be sent as a convict to Tasmania. It is clear now there is to be no further investigation, so that we shall never know in all probability exactly how the famous Road murder was committed. Much annoyance is felt at the obvious miscarriage of our criminal system in elucidating the truth in this memorable case; and it is expected that our criminal law will be altered shortly, so as to give the judge the power of directing a trial to be held even when the prisoner insists on pleading guilty. Yesterday, too, Dr. Pritchard was hung at Glasgow in the presence of the largest multitude—computed at 80,000—ever collected before a British gallows. The chief interest of the case arose from the social position of the murderer; but to lovers of psychological problems there was a sort of fascination about the utter absence of any moral sense in Dr. Pritchard's character. He seems to have been an amiable, kindly man enough in private life, whose only apparent defect was inordinate vanity. But it is clear that when a human life came in the way of his schemes or pleasures, he removed it with as little compunction as ordinary men show in killing an insect that annoys them. There is much reason to suppose that other persons besides his mother-in-law and his wife had been "improved" off the face of the world because they happened to come athwart the path of this strange moral phenomenon. It is characteristic of the man that he died as decorously as he had lived—outwardly.

Murders are subjects of interest everywhere; but there is a description of social scandals the interest in which always seems to me peculiarly English. When I was in the States, nothing in your papers struck me more than the absence of those full reports of police cases about which the main interest consisted in the social position of the parties inculpated. What may be the cause of this, whether the American newspaper-reading public does not like such highly seasoned reports as our own, whether the fact of social position is of less importance with you than with us, or whether, as I am inclined to believe, the comparative smallness of England and the concentration of our national life in one city makes the personal element of more weight than in the United States, I do not pretend to decide. All I know is, that if ever my evil fate should involve me, however innocently, in what is euphemistically called "an awkward business," I pray sincerely that my critics in the press might be American and not English. These remarks are called for by the fact that our papers have lately been filled with one of those social scandals which possess an especial attraction for the English newspaper-reading public. The other day a young Frenchwoman, obviously belonging to the "half-world" class, died in a quarter of London much affected by ladies of doubtful position. The poor girl died of a miscarriage, brought on, there was reason to suppose, by artificial means. There was nothing, unfortunately, uncommon in this occurrence, and the death of this unknown "waif and stray" of London; and the matter would have dropped if it had not come out that a gentleman of good position had had some connection with the dead girl, and if there had not been some reason to suppose that he might have been privy to the act which led to her death. The case made a considerable noise, and at last it has come out that the gentleman inculpated is a Mr. Mowatt, who represented the borough of Cambridge for many years on extreme Liberal principles. As soon as Mr. Mowatt made his appearance, he explained away satisfactorily enough the suspicions under which he labored. It seems that a couple of years ago, he and the late Lord Clyde—better known to the world as Sir Colin Campbell of the Crimea and India—made the acquaintance of the deceased girl accidentally in Paris, helped her out of some trouble into which she had fallen, and then found her more or less thrown upon their hands. It was clear that both of them had acted kindly and liberally; though whether the interest they took in the girl's fortunes was altogether Platonic, is a point on which opinions may and do differ. Told briefly, this was all; and yet this story, because an ex-M.P. and a man like the late Lord Clyde were in some way mixed up with it, has excited an amount of interest you will perhaps find it hard to understand. All the political events in the world never increase the sale of an English newspaper so much as a good social scandal.

A CONNECTICUT VILLAGE.

It was founded in 1639, and by a small colony of emigrants from Stratford-on-Avon. This fact alone might well make us respect the place, but there is not a town or village in New England that could better rest satisfied with its many attractions. It stands on the western bank of the Housatonic or Ousatonick River, on a level plain, with the Sound three miles away on the south, the city of Bridgeport a little further off on the west, and with a rolling, rich, well-cultivated, and picturesque country on the north; and although crossed by the line of the New York and New Haven Railroad, is one of the most quiet and lovely villages in the land. Its original name was Cupheag, and an Englishman named Fairchild purchased the land of the Poquanuck Indians, and was the first white man vested with authority over the town. When the purchase was first made, the whole township comprised what have since been known as the towns of Trumbull, Huntington, and Bridgeport, the last of which has become a flourishing city. The price paid for the whole grant is not known, but it is on record that a neighboring tract of land cost ten blankets, six coats, one kettle, and a small assortment of hoes, hatchets, knives, and glasses. It was on account of similar outlays, undoubtedly, that the authorities of Stratford, thirty years after its settlement, voted that the Indians should not be permitted to plant corn anywhere, have their weapons mended by the smith, nor be employed by any citizens to look after "the horses, hoggs, and other cattle." The town was named in memory of the English Stratford, is said to have been laid out after the same fashion, and, by those who have seen the two, the American town has been pronounced the more beautiful. The principal street is a mile long, runs north and south, and is intersected by a number of others, all of which are lined by unpretending houses, each one flanked by a handsome garden. The streets are wide, richly carpeted by a green sward, and fringed on either side by regular rows of elm and other trees, which are constantly composing themselves into beautiful pictures; while the rural beauty of the place is greatly enhanced by two or three of those open spaces which the old men of New England love to remember, in connection with their boyhood, as the village green. Two handsome churches with graceful spires, and another with less pretension, loom up above the sea of foliage; there is not a tavern in the place, nor any groggeries or drinking saloons; a local newspaper was never dreamed of; and the few shops, whose owners do not deem it necessary to hang out any signs, are stocked with very small and very miscellaneous assortments of merchandise. Birds build their nests in every direction, and their sweet singing may be heard through all the hours of the summer day. Each householder in the town seems to be the possessor of a cow, and these cattle are driven to pasture in the morning, watched during the day, and brought home at sundown by a regular herdsman; and were it not for the occasional whistle of the passing locomotives, the charming quiet of the place would be profound and unbroken.

Two stories are told, illustrative of the repose which reigns in Stratford.

Some years ago a strange gentleman and his wife arrived in the village in their carriage, and after driving from one end of it to the other two or three times without meeting a single person, they became alarmed, and fancied that a plague might have depopulated the place. On further reflection, however, the stranger determined to stop at one of the pleasant houses he saw on every side. He did so, and the sound of the knocker on the door almost startled him with its terrible noise. In due time a lady made her appearance, and was saluted with this question:

"Can you tell me, madam, if this town is inhabited?"

"Yes, sir, it is," replied the lady, "and by way of relieving your anxiety I will mention one fact. The reason why our streets are so quiet is this: the men of the place are all in the fields at work, the children are at school, and the housewives are at home preparing a good dinner for their families." The gentleman thus obtained a new idea, and was satisfied.

The other is as follows: A Stratford gentleman one day entered his house in a troubled manner, pale and fainting, and earnestly called upon his wife and daughters for some camphor or cologne. These things were promptly administered, and after he had fairly recovered his speech, his wife bent over him and said:

"What is the matter with you, my dear?"

To this the invalid replied: "Nothing very serious, I hope, but while passing along Elm Street I actually saw a man."
